INTRODUCTION

Ante oculos errant domus, urbs, et forma locorum;
Succeduntque suis singula facta locis.
Ovid, Tristia.

IF the historian's knowledge of his subject were complete, and his judgment unerring, the writing of history would be a simple matter, depending only upon the writer's power of expression, and the amount of space available. As, however, these ideal conditions practically never exist, his task usually resolves itself into an attempt to draw conclusions from too meagre records, and to reconcile or explain contradictory, or seemingly contradictory, statements. The result is that the facts are often complicated and obscured, sometimes even hopelessly distorted, and not infrequently quite overwhelmed, by the writer's individual interpretations and opinions, the expounding of which is apt to occupy as much space as the recital of the facts themselves.

It has long seemed to the author that the ideal method of presenting history would be to arrange all of the available worth-while material in strictly chronological order, and to allow the facts and the myths, together with the interpretations of competent authorities, and even the casual comments of intelligent observers, to speak for themselves. The present Chronology is an attempt to carry out this idea; in it are recorded, in brief form, but with sufficient detail to make easy reading, all procurable information of real importance or interest relating to the history and development of Manhattan Island, special emphasis being placed on information regarding the physical growth of the city of New York.

In the search for such material, all known and available sources have been examined, or at least inquired into, and a consistent effort has been made to trace each material fact or statement to its original source, and to quote from that source, retaining, wherever practicable, the language, and thereby the spirit, of the original, usually in condensed form, immaterial facts or statements being omitted. Even when this method has proved impracticable, if the subject has seemed of sufficient importance or interest it has usually been included, and reference given to the earliest and best authority found. This has sometimes led to the inclusion of material the authenticity of which is open to question, and occasionally even to the recording of statements which have been rejected by modern critics as belonging to mere tradition or mythology. The author cannot but feel that the modern fashion of excluding such material has robbed many a serious work, not only of local colour and picturesque interest, but of valuable suggestions and hints which would have proved useful in future researches.

John Addington Symonds, in his Renaissance in Italy ("The Fine Arts," pp. 102-3), has very well expressed the reasons for giving thoughtful consideration to tradition—even to myth—in the interpretation of history. He says: "I regard the present tendency to mistrust tradition, only because it is tradition, as in the highest sense uncritical. . . . Tradition, when not positively disproved, should be allowed to have its full value; and a sounder historic sense is exercised in adopting its testimony with due caution than in recklessly rejecting it and substituting guesses which the lack of knowledge renders unsubstantial. Tradition may err about dates, details, and names. It is just here that antiquarian research can render valuable help. But there are occasions when the perusal of documents and the exercise of what is called the higher criticism afford no surer basis for opinion. If in such cases a legend has been formed and recorded, the student will advance further toward comprehending the spirit of his subject by patiently considering what he knows to be in part perhaps a mythus than by starting with the foregone conclusion that the legend must of necessity be worthless, and that his cunning will suffice to supply the missing clue."

In the preparation of the Chronology, not only have the original sources, whenever available, been used, and full references given thereto, but references have also been furnished to later, and secondary, authorities. Even "popular" works have been drawn upon, where these add to our knowledge or understanding of the subject under consideration. Furthermore, frequent cross-references have been supplied, so that related subjects may be easily compared, without reference through the Index.

In most cases, quoted facts and statements have been allowed to tell their own story, with little or no comment by the author; occasionally, however, especially in connection with the periods of discovery and early settlement, where it is usually difficult to convey a clear and comprehensive idea by merely quoting from the fragmentary, scattered, and often very perplexing, records, it has seemed desirable to compare and discuss the meagre facts, and, when possible, to draw conclusions from them; and the author has even yielded to the temptation to formulate certain theories, which, in many cases, he is fully aware that he has been unable satisfactorily to sustain. They are given in the hope that in this way an occasional hint may be supplied which will prove of value in some more comprehensive or detailed investigation.

While the Chronology, in form and substance, is primarily a compilation, nevertheless, it contains a considerable admixture of new material; and even the old facts and statements will often be found to have acquired a new significance by being placed in their true chronological sequence, and viewed in relation one to another.

The Chronology is intended to form a complete work in itself, containing, as it does, sometimes in condensed and sometimes in extended form, all of the historical material found in Volumes I and III, and everything of real importance from Volume II, in addition to much that has been obtained since these volumes were written. Doubtless, more satisfactory results would have been obtained in the work as a whole had it been possible to complete the Chronology before writing the earlier volumes, as these are based primarily upon the very sources that have been developed, usually in more detail, in the Chronology.

As explained in the Preface (Volume I), considerable space has been devoted, especially during the early periods, and in connection with matters of topographical and antiquarian interest, to facts and occurrences which, in themselves, may sometimes seem of but little moment, for it not infrequently happens that these apparently insignificant trifles acquire interest and importance beyond themselves, through their association with people, events, or places, which have since become famous.

It has also seemed desirable to add occasional brief references to contemporary occurrences of outstanding importance, or of special interest, in other parts of America, and even abroad, so that the reader may be in a position to study intelligently the various factors which helped to form public opinion, at any given moment, on Manhattan Island, and thereby be better able to understand the underlying motives which prompted action on the part of the inhabitants.

In consulting the Chronology, an eye should be kept on the Addenda, which occasionally contains new material and corrections not referred to in the text or in the marginal notes.

Although new light has been thrown on some vexed questions, many still remain unanswered. Who, for example, was the first European to set eyes upon Manhattan Island? Was it Karlsfni, the Norseman, about the year 1020, or possibly the French explorer whose intimate knowledge of our bay was shown on the Cossin Map, five and a half centuries later? Who were the first foreign sojourners on our island? If neither the early Norse voyagers nor the projectors of the Cossin Map, were they, perhaps, the weather-stressed crew of some phantom ship driven for shelter into our splendid harbour on one of those mysterious clandestine voyages along the North East Coast which we know from casual references and from unidentified maps must have been of almost yearly occurrence during the 16th Century? Or does the honour perchance belong to the “pretended Dutch Governour,” and his followers, whom Samuel Argall is said to have found on the island in the Autumn of 1613, and who, it now seems, may well have been that famous pioneer in our waters, Adriaen Block, and his indomitable shipmates? Or, again, was the first permanent settlement on Manhattan begun by Minuit, in 1626, or by May and Tienpont in 1624, in accordance with Catalina Trico’s much maligned statements, which are certainly strengthened by the testimony of the recently discovered Van Rappard documents, as well as by the cumulative evidence of other records here grouped under these early years? Or is it possible that it was even earlier?—during that mysterious period between the founding of Fort Nassau in 1614 and the arrival of the “Nieu Nederlandt” in 1624. On the whole, this last date seems the most probable.

These, and many similar questions, rise in the mind of the student, and demand further investigation and analysis. On one point there is no longer room for reasonable doubt; the “Nieu Nederlandt” (the “Nieu Ver- driet” of the Van Rappard documents) arrived at Manhattan in May or June, 1624, with the first officially organized company of colonists for New Nether- land. The question which still puzzles historians is whether any of her passen- gers remained on Manhattan Island, forming the nucleus of a permanent settlement, the vanguard of that firmly established by Minuit, in 1626. On this point the information now available, although not absolutely conclusive, is distinctly affirmative.

One apparently important source, at least, has not been adequately exam- ined,—the collection of papers representing the semi-public records of Dutch notaries in the 16th and 17th Centuries. These records are contained in several hundred volumes, and are preserved in the National Archives at The Hague. This great mass of material has only recently become accessible. In 1919, Dr. F. C. Wieder made, for the author, a cursory examination of the records for the years 1623, 1624, and 1625, but without important results. It is hoped, however, that a more thorough inspection, covering a longer period, now being made for the author by Dr. A. Eekhof, may yield at least a few facts of interest for inclusion in the Addenda to the fifth volume of the Iconography. Other important Dutch and English sources will doubtless be discovered, and a further comparison and analysis of the known sources will surely bring out new information. Of one thing, especially, the author is convinced; a thorough study of the 16th and early 17th Century maps and voyages would richly repay the patient scholar. Harrisse and others have nobly blazed the way, but a great deal remains still to be done in this fascinating field.

After careful consideration, the difficult question of how best to deal with the perplexing problem of Old- and New-Style dates was settled by following the Gregorian Calendar (or New-Style) from October 5/15, 1582, when its use began on the Continent, until Sept. 6/16, 1664, when this method of dating was dropped from the city records, after the capture of New Amsterdam by the English. From Sept. 22/Oct. 2, 1664, when the Julian system of reckoning was first used in the court records, until Sept. 3/14, 1752, when England adopted the Gregorian Calendar, Old-Style is used. To avoid confusion, double dates are introduced during periods of transition, and also in connection with all English dates during the Dutch occupation of the city, and all Dutch and other Continental dates during the English occupation.

In bespeaking the indulgence of the reader in connection with the many faults which he is all too conscious this work contains, the author feels that a special word of apology is due for frequent inconsistencies throughout the four volumes in the use of upper- and lower-case; inconsistencies which are primarily due to the considerable number of persons who, from first to last, have collaborated in its production. These did not become conspicuous until the page proof of the Chronology was so far advanced that a revision was impracticable. This apology must be extended to include also, specifically, the gelatine plates in Volumes IV and V, which are far less satisfactory than those made in Holland for the second volume. Although the greatest care was taken in the preparation of the original photographs from which the plates were made, it has proved impossible to get from these, in this country, prints comparable with those made abroad.

In addition to the acknowledgments made in previous volumes, it is a pleasure to add here a further word of appreciation regarding the work of Mr. Thomas W. Hotchkiss, who has devoted more than ten years to researches for the Chronology, a large part of which is the direct result of his pains-taking labour and enthusiasm.

The author is also particularly indebted to Dr. A. E. Peterson, who has contributed much valuable material, especially in connection with the last decade under Dutch rule, and the Revolutionary Period, including extracts from the important collection of William Smith Papers recently acquired by the New York Public Library, and examined for the first time, critically, for this work; to Professor A. J. F. van Laer, who, in addition to supplying a number of translations from Dutch printed and manuscript sources, has read the proof of the Dutch Period, and made many constructive criticisms and additions; to Mr. Alexander Wall, now Librarian of the New York Historical Society; to Mr. Peter Nelson, Assistant State Archivist, who has cheerfully answered frequent inquiries regarding documents in his charge; to Mr. Samuel Oppenheim, who has furnished many important items regarding the Jews in early New York; to Miss Zula Ziebach, whose notes on the early taverns and their keepers shed new light upon a phase of our city's life which, from the earliest days, has been a potent factor in its development; and finally to Miss Ellen C. Ahern, for three years a keen and helpful collaborator in this work.

I f we except the legends emanating from Plato’s mythical island of Atlantis, perhaps the earliest definite suggestion of a voyage of discovery from Europe to the far west is embodied in the legend of St. Brendan. In or about A.D. 565, Brendan, an Irish monk, having heard of the existence to the west of an “Isle of Saints” (perhaps St. Kilda—from “Holy Cudées”—the Erse name of which was Hirta or Western land), and, seized with a pious desire to see it, embarked with seventeen other monks in an osier boat covered with tanned hides and well greased. After sailing for forty days the monks reached an island with steep scarped sides where they received hospitality and took in provisions. Thence they were carried by the winds to an island covered by countless flocks of sheep (perhaps the Faroes, from far, a sheep). They took a lamb and then continued to a barren island close by where they intended to celebrate the Easter festival. When they had landed and started to cook the lamb the island began to move. The monks fled to their ship and then discovered that they had been on the back of a whale instead of on an island. Next they came to an island where they found a multitude of birds. They remained here until Pentecost, then wandered several months on the ocean. At last they reached an island of which St. Patrick was patron; here they celebrated Christmas, embarking again after the Octave of the Epiphany. A year had passed in these journeys. During the next six, the monks continued the same round, visiting the same islands. During the seventh year they found, to the north, a rocky barren island of the Cyclops’ forges; this was the mouth of hell (perhaps Helga in Iceland). Finally, they entered a zone of mist and darkness, and discovered the long sought Isle of Saints. They remained here for forty days, and then an angel appeared and told them to return to their own country.

714 The next important legend relating to this subject records that, or in 714 or 734, the Archbishop of Oporto, with six other Spanish bishops, discovered Antillia or the Isle of the Seven Cities (evidently a revival of Plato’s Atlantis myth—vide supra), and settled upon it with a number of companions of both sexes.

Antillia, represented as a large island in the mid-Atlantic, in about 35° north latitude, first appeared on a map of 1424, preserved at Weimar, and is found on the principal maps made during the rest of the century. The sixteenth and seventeenth century maps show it as a smaller island, with the name of “Sete Ciudades.” Behaim gave the legend in a note on his globe of 1492.

Next in chronological order, and the first to be based on information susceptible of scientific analysis, came the discoveries of the Norsemen along the north-east coast of the American continent, in the tenth and eleventh centuries, starting from Greenland as a base. Our information regarding these discoveries is derived mainly from three sources, the Flatey Book, the Saga of Eric the Red, and Hauk’s Book. These documents will be described presently, and an attempt made to identify the principal features of our coast therein described. In the year 986, the Greenland Colony was founded, by Eric the Red of Jæren in Norway, who a few years before had settled in Iceland. In the summer of the same year, Bjarne, whose father, Herulf, had accompanied Eric, and had settled in Greenland, arrived in Iceland from Norway with a cargo, and, finding his parents departed, determined to follow them. (The following extract is taken from the Flatey Book.) With his crew he put to sea . . . and they sailed for three days before the land was laid but then the fair wind ceased, and north winds and fogs came on, and they did not know where they were going, and they went on for many days. After this they saw the sun, and so were able to get their bearings, whereupon they hoisted sail, and after sailing that day they saw land, and they discussed among themselves what land this could be, but Bjarne said he fancied that it could not be Greenland. They asked whether he would sail to this land or not, ‘I am for sailing in close to the land,’ he said, and on doing so they soon saw that the land was not mountainous, and was covered with woods, and that there were small knolls on it, whereupon they left the land on the port side, and let the sheet turn towards it. Then after sailing two days they saw another land. They asked Bjarni if he thought this was Greenland; he said that he did not think this was Greenland any more than the first place, "for it is said that the glaciers to Greenland. They sailed past this land, and saw that it was a flat country and covered with woods. At this point the fair wind dropped, whereupon the crew suggested that they should land there; but Bjarni would not. He ordered them to hoist sail, which was done, and they turned the bows from the land, and sailed out to sea for three days before a south-westly breeze, when they saw the third land; now this land was high and mountainous, with ice upon it. So they asked if Bjarni would put in there, but he said he would not, since—as he put it—this land appeared to be good for nothing. Then without lowering sail they kept on their course along the coast, and saw that it was an island: once more they turned the bows away from the land, and held out to sea with the same breeze; but the wind increased, so that Bjarni told them to reef, and not crowd more sail than their ship and rigging could stand. They then sailed for four days, when they saw the fourth land. Then they asked Bjarni if he thought this was Greenland, or not. Bjarni replied, 'This is most like what was told me of Greenland, and here we will keep our course towards the land.' So they did, and that evening they came to land under a cape, which had a boat on it, and there on the cape lived Herjulf, Bjarni's father, and it is from him that the cape received its name, and has since been called Herjulfshúsi.

As we shall presently see, there is good reason to believe that the first land sighted by Bjarni was within the limits of the present United States, and that he was therefore the first European to discover the new continent.

In the year 1000, Leif, son of Eric the Red, introduced Christianity into Greenland. In the following year, he bought a ship of Bjarni, engaged a crew of thirty-five men, and, in the year 1002, sailed forth, going first to the country last visited by Bjarni. (The following extract is taken from the Flatey Book.) There they sailed up to the land, having come a very long way, and there they said they saw no grass there. The background was all great glaciers, and all the intermediate land from the sea to the glaciers was like one flat rock, and the country seemed to them, destitute of value. Then Leif said, 'We have not failed to land, like Bjarni; now I will give this country a name, and call it Helluland (the land of flat stones). Thereupon they returned on board, after which they sailed to sea and discovered the second land. Again they sailed up to the land and cast anchor, then lowered the boat and went ashore. This land was low-lying and wooded, and wherever they went there were wide stretches of white sand, and the country seemed to them as full of grass as though it had been tilled. This land shall be given a name from its resources, and shall be called Markland (woodland), after which they returned to the ship as quickly as possible. And they sailed after that in the open sea with a north-east wind, and were out two days before they saw land, towards which they rowed. This land was divided in two by a large cape which ran north from the mainland they steered a westerly course past the cape. It was very shallow there at low tide, so that their ship ran aground, and soon it was a long way from the ship to the sea. But they were so very eager to get to land that they would not wait for the tide to rise under their ship, but hurried ashore where a river came out of a lake, but when the sea had risen under their ship they took the boat and rowed to the ship, and took her up the river and afterwards into the lake, where they cast anchor, and carrying their leather kibobs ashore they put up shelters, but not staying long in their landing place, they then sailed out of the country. The last part of this description of the surroundings of Leif's camp, as will appear later, is, in all probability, copied from the earlier and fuller description in the Saga of Eric the Red:

"There was no want of salmon, either in the river or the lake, and huge salmon they had seen before; the amenities of the country and the weather were so good that they divided the food there in the winter; there came no frost in the winter, and the grass did not wither there much. Day and night were more equally divided there than in Greenland or Iceland; on the shortest day the sun was up over the (Icelandic) marks for both none and breakfast time ['side infral].

Now when they had finished building their houses, Leif said to his men, 'Now I will divide the lands that I have explored; and one half shall stay at home in camp while the others explore the country, going no further than they can return by the evening, and not separating.' And so for a time they did this, Leif sometimes going with the explorers, and at others staying at home in camp."

It happened one evening that a man of their party was missing, and this was Tyrker the southerner [German]. But [returning] a little later he said in Norse, "I have found something fresh to report. I found vines and grapes." 'Is that true, fosterfather?' said Leif. 'Certainly it is true,' he replied, 'for I was born there where there was no lack of vines or grapes.'

"Now they slept that night, but in the morning Leif said to his crew, 'We will now do two things, keeping separate days for each; we will gather grapes and cut down vines, and fell wood, to make a cargo for my ship, and this suggestion was adopted. The story goes that their pinnace was full of grapes. So a cargo was cut for the ship, and in spring they made ready and sailed away [to Greenland] and Leif gave the country a name according to its resources, on a subsequent voyage (p. 9 infra) and called it Wineland."

The following extract is from the Flatey Book; other versions make Thorvald a companion of Leif's expedition, on a subsequent voyage (p. 9 infra). "Now [probably in 1004, the year after Leif's return] there was much discussion of Leif's expedition to Wineland, and Thorvald, his brother, thought that the exploration of the country had been confined to too narrow an area. So Leif said to Thorvald, "If you wish, brothers, you shall go to Wineland in my ship. . . . Thereupon Thorvald prepared for this expedition, taking thirty men. . . . Afterwards they made their ship ready and held out to sea, and there is no report of their voyage before they came to Wineland to Leif's camp. There they laid up their ship, and remained quiet that winter, catching fish for their food. But in the spring they made ready their ship, and ordered the ship's pinnace with some of the crew to go to the west of the country and explore there during the summer. It seemed to them a fine wooded country, the trees coming close down to the sea, and there were white sands. There were many islands, and many shoals. They found no traces either of men or beasts, except that on an island to the west they found a wooden barn. Finding no further human handiwork they returned, and came to Leif's camp in the autumn. But the next summer Thorvald sailed to the east with his trading ship, and along the more northerly part of the country: then a sharp storm arose off a cape, so that they ran ashore, breaking the keel of the vessel and making it unseaworthy. Then Leif said, 'This land shall be given a name from its resources, and shall be called Markland (woodland), after which they returned to the ship as quickly as possible. And they sailed after that in the open sea with a north-east wind, and were out two days before they saw land, towards which they rowed. This land was divided in two by a large cape which ran north from the mainland they steered a westerly course past the cape. It was very shallow there at low tide, so that their ship ran aground, and soon it was a long way from the ship to the sea. But they were so very eager to get to land that they would not wait for the tide to rise under their ship, but hurried ashore where a river came out of a lake, but when the sea had risen under their ship they took the boat and rowed to the ship, and took her up the river and afterwards into the lake, where they cast anchor, and carrying their leather kibobs ashore they put up shelters, but not staying long in their landing place, they then sailed out of the country. The last part of this description of the surroundings of Leif's camp, as will appear later, is, in all probability, copied from the earlier and fuller description in the Saga of Eric the Red:

"There was no want of salmon, either in the river or the lake, and huge salmon they had seen before; the amenities of the country and the weather were so good that they divided the food there in the winter; there came no frost in the winter, and the grass did not wither there much. Day and night were more equally divided there than in Greenland or Iceland; on the shortest day the sun was up over the (Icelandic) marks for both none and breakfast time ['side infral].

Now when they had finished building their houses, Leif said to his men, 'Now I will divide the lands that I have explored; and one half shall stay at home in camp while the others explore the country, going no further than they can return by the evening, and not separating.' And so for a time they did this, Leif sometimes going with the explorers, and at others staying at home in camp. . . .
advice is that you prepare to go away as quickly as possible, after carrying me to that headland which I thought the best place to dwell in: maybe it was the truth that came into my mouth that I should stay there awhile. Bury me there with a cross at my head and there let the hawks savage and gnaw me as they pleased.

"Now Thorvald died, but they carried out all his instructions, after which they went and met their companions, and told each other such tidings as they knew, and they stayed there that winter, gathering grapes and vines for their ships. Then in the spring they prepared to go back to Greenland, and arrived with their ships in Erikfjord, with great news to tell Leif."
and this time all the staves were waved widdershins, and all the savages yelled loudly. Upon this Karlshefni's men took a red shield and raised it in answer. The savages ran from their boats and thereupon they met and fought; there was a heavy rain of missiles; the savages had war-slings too. Karlshefni and Snorri observed that they had no chance of getting up on a pole to view the fight closely resembling a sheep's passport and dark in colour, and it flew from the pole up on land over the party, and made a terrible noise where it came down. Upon this a great fear came on Karlshefni and his party, so that they wished for nothing but to get away up stream, for they thought that the savages were setting upon them from all sides, and did they halt they came to some rocks where they made a determined resistance. . . .

"It now appeared to Karlshefni's party that though this country had good resources yet they would live in a perpetual state of warfare and alarm on account of the aborigines. So they prepared to depart, intending to return to their own country. They coasted northward, and found five savages in skins sleeping by the sea; these had with them receptacles in which was beast's narrow mixed with blood. They concluded that these men must have been sent from the country: they killed them. Later on they discovered a promontory and a quantity of rocks on the shore near which the appearance of a cake of dung, because the beasts lay there in the winter. Now they came to Straumsfjord, where there was plenty of every kind.

"Some men say that Bjarni and Freydis [Hauk's Book gives Gudrid] sailed there with a hundred men and went no further, while Karlshefni and Snorri went south with forty men, steering no longer at Hóp than a scant two months, and returning the same summer. . . . They considered that those mountains which were at Hóp and these which they now found were all one, and were therefore one opposite another, and that the distance from Straumsfjord was the same in both directions. They were at Straumsfjord the third winter. . . ."

"There Karlshefni's son, Snorri, was born the first autumn, and he was three winters old when they left.

"In the fall they laid the ship against a south wind, and came to Makkland. . . . Here they captured two boys, from whom they learned that "another country lay on the other side, opposite to their own, where people lived who wore white clothes, and uttered loud cries, and carried poles, and went with flags. It is thought that this was Hvitramannaland, or Iceland the Great. So then they came to Greenland, and stayed with Eric the Red for the winter. . . ."

The landnamabók, in the authorship of which Ari evidently played an important part, although dealing almost exclusively with the history of Iceland, contains also one statement of corroborative importance in this connection. Speaking of Ari Marsson, who is there said to have been cast upon Hvitramannaland, it continues, "in which some call it Great, it is called the Green Island by the men of Wineland the Good," from which casual reference it seems evident that the existence and position of Wineland were perfectly established and generally known.

Our prima-facie knowledge of the Wineland voyages is derived from two apparently independent sources, Hauk's Book, and the Flatey Book. The story as known to Hauk has come down to us in two very similar, but not identical, manuscripts, one contained in his book (Hauk's Book), and written partly in his own hand, probably in the first quarter of the fourteenth century, the other written in an early fifteenth century hand, and known as the Saga of Eric the Red. Both manuscripts are probably based on a common written archetype, dating from the early thirteenth century, and can therefore not properly be said to corroborate each other. The Flatey Book version, on the other hand, contains much internal evidence of an independent origin; although it was the last of the three to be so protected. In form, the written manuscript probably having been written between the years 1370 and 1375, whereas, from internal evidence, it is clear that the existing manuscript of Hauk's Book follows an immediate text written about 1355, and that similarly the Saga of Eric the Red probably embodies an even earlier and better intermediate text.

Leaving aside for the moment the question of the relative trustworthiness of the two sources, that represented by Hauk's Book, and that embodied in the Flatey Book, there can be no doubt that, on the whole, the latter contains the fuller and more interesting details of the Wineland voyages, although it is distinctly inferior to the other versions in connection with the most important of them all, Karlshefni's.

Quoting Gathorne-Hardy, the latest writer on the subject of the Norse voyages to America,—"Bjarni Herjulfson and his adventure are recorded in the Flatey Book, and nowhere else in literature. Leif the voyage is repeated in the Flatey Book, and nowhere else as being deliberately undertaken as a result of Bjarni's discoveries; elsewhere it is accidental, an episode of a different voyage. A separate voyage of Thorvald Ericson, terminating in his death, is detailed in the same account, whereas in the Saga of Eric the Red no such person is mentioned at all till the episode of his death, and to Hauk's Book and the companion manuscript he is represented as sailing and meeting his death under the auspices of Karlshefni's expedition. Finally, after Karlshefni's return, we have to the Flatey Book alone the story of Freyja's second visit to the newly discovered country. Furthermore, "numerous statements of a circumstantial nature are made in the Flatey Book version which find no place in the rival account. The important 'eyxtarsar' of a great river, and lake in it, which defended the Leif's description of Leif's camp was borrowed badly from the earlier description of Karlsefni's Höp, as it is entirely improbable that Leif ever reached so southerly a point. "The writer of the Flatey Book, imbued with the idea that Leif and Karlsefni occupied identical camps, has evidently felt himself at liberty to draw his description of the scene of Leif's landing from the fullest report available, which, as he tells us, was Karlsefni's. Given the notion [which exists in the Flatey Book] that all explorers made the same landfall, this was natural and legitimate enough, but it adds an [other] element of confusion to our already difficult task." While it is clearly impossible, with the information at our disposal, to harmonize or explain the many confusing, and often contradictory, statements contained in the sagas which have come down to us, and while it is therefore impossible to definitely fix the various localities therein referred to, nevertheless, the general conclusions here stated seem to the author, on the whole, to constitute the best working hypothesis, and to afford the most consistent and likely solution of this much vexed problem. At all events, there seems no sufficient reason to warrant the identification of Wineland as Nova Scotia, which is the only other location that can be seriously defended from a geographer's point of view.

As to positive and demonstrable facts regarding the Norse settlements in Wineland, Fischer is obviously right when he states, in The Discoveries of the Norsemen in America, that, "If we sum up in brief the result of previous researches, we arrive at certain definite facts: that Norsemen for centuries possessed tolerably thriving colonies in Greenland. For this we have historical, geographical and cartographical proof, supported by Papal Briefs, and the accounts of the Papal Legates, and there are also the numerous ruins of churches, homesteads, and other buildings, besides numbers of Norse relics. Wineland, Markland, and Hellaland in short, the continent of America, have only occasionally been visited but were not colonized as intended. Every theory in support of a lasting colonization of Wineland has proved untenable, and, most important of all, no amount of research has brought to light [there] any Norse remains or Norse ruins." The author is quite aware that the above conclusions differ in important particulars from those of the majority of recent writers on the Norsemen, who exclude altogether southern New England, Connecticut, and New York, when considering the location of Wineland.

Mr. George Parker Winship, who is entitled to speak with high authority on all matters regarding the early voyages to our coast, and who represents the point of view of advanced modern criticism, sums up briefly the facts, as he understands them, in a recent letter to the author, from which the following extracts are taken. He writes:

Before the end of the tenth century, Scandinavian voyagers had found their way to the land south-west of the colonies on the Greenland coast. This land seemed to them quite as good for purposes of settlement as the sea-coast villages in Iceland from which they came. An attempt was therefore made to establish here a new colony. By the year 1000 A.D. houses had been built, cattle pastured, and a child born at this westernmost outpost of mediæval European wanderings. The Norse seamen, who had first been carried to this land by the ocean currents during a prolonged and dense fog, were able afterward, on several successive voyages, to lay their course to the place selected for a settlement there and back again to the earlier outpost colonies in Greenland, apparently with comparative certainty. This much may be stated, with considerable confidence, as a summary of all that is known regarding the earliest European visits to America."

After reviewing briefly the voyage of Bjarni, Leif, Thorvald, and Karlsefni, in subdivided accordance with the narrative outlined above, he continues:

"In the original Saga text there are only two statements which lend themselves to serious statistical analysis as evidence regarding the region visited by the Norse explorers. One is that, at the settlement, on the shortest day in the winter, the sun rose and set in 'Dagmal' position. There can be no possible doubt that the seafarers knew precisely what this meant, and that their observation was trustworthy. Unluckily, the modern astronomer
The engraveland to which Chevalier Nicolò made his voyage was doubtless Greenland. If the story of his trip to East Bygd be true, or his visit has a peculiar interest as the last distinct glimpse afforded us of the colony founded by Eric the Red. From the description of Estotiland, it has proved impossible to identify the island with any assurance. The most common conjecture has identified it with Newfoundland. Concerning Dregoe, there is more certainty. Its description, and that of the vast stretch of country beyond it, peopled by naked savages who lived by hunting and who were ruled by chieftains, is doubtless a description of America.

The authenticity of the Zeno narratives has long been a subject of contention among geographers. By some, the story has been looked upon as a Venetian claim to the discovery of America, but Nicolò sets up no such claim. He gives the story simply as an interesting narrative of his ancestors' voyages. Fiske, in The Discovery of America, thinks it reasonable to conclude that Nicolò reproduced the ancestral documents faithfully, because his book shows knowledge that he could not have got in any other way. Beasley, in Dawn of Modern Geography, III: 456-60, and elsewhere, and Lucas, in Annals of the Zeno Voyages (1898), regard the narratives as sixteenth century forgeries, whereas Miller Callender's The Silver Map of the World (1900), at least partially accepts them.

The exploration and settlement of the Canaries by the French seigneur, Jean de Béthencourt, from 1402, and of Madeira by Zarco and Vaz, in the service of Prince Henry, from 1420, gave Europe a new and more advanced base for western expeditions. Last among the forerunings of the great Atlantic discoveries of 1492 and subsequent years, come the septennial colonization of the Azores, from about the year 1436, and the Portuguese expeditions, from the Azores as a starting point, into the far ocean beyond, in the hope of further discoveries. Before the death of Prince Henry (1460), exploration had pushed some way into the Atlantic, south-west as well as due west from Europe, in the direction of Brazil and the West Indies, and therefore towards the distant shores of North America.

Jean Cousin, of Dieppe, is claimed by Desmarquettes and other writers to have discovered South America in this year.—See Vol. II: 34.

1492
On Aug. 3, Columbus sailed from Palos with three ships, the "Santa María" (the flagship), the "Pinta," and the "Niña," and, on Oct. 12, landed at Guanahani (doubtless San Salvador or Watlings Island), one of the Bahama group, and took formal possession in the name of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. On the 18th, he landed on the island of Cuba, and shortly afterwards discovered Haiti and built a fort on the shore named "La Navidad." Here he left a garrison, and sailed for home on Jan. 4, 1493.

Columbus's account of his first voyage, in a Spanish letter to King Luis de Santangel, was first printed in April, 1493. See Churubusco Catalogue, p. 8. His journal and maps are lost, but extracts from the former are preserved in Historia de las Indias, by Las Casas. See also Rudolf Crowne, The Discovery of America and the Landfall of Columbus (N. Y., 1921).

On May 4, 1495, Pope Alexander VI, issued a "Bull" fixing the "Line of Demarcation" between Spain and Portugal on a meridian passing through a point 100 leagues west of the Azores. The convention at Tordesillas, on June 4, 1494, moved the line to a point 370 leagues west of the Cape Verde Islands.

On Sept. 7, 1495, Columbus sailed from Cadiz, with 17 ships and 1,500 souls, largely colonists. On reaching Cuba, he found it a waste, but at once started to build a city, which he named Isabella, a short distance to the east. He did not return to Spain until 1496.

On May 30, 1498 (p. e.), he sailed from San Lucas on his third voyage, and, on Aug. 5, set foot for the first time on the continent, on the north coast of South America.—Harriette, Dis. of N. Am.: Winsor, Narr. & Crit. Hist. of Am., Vol. II.

In this year, presumably shortly after May 2, John Cabot sailed from Bristol on his first American voyage, probably in the "Matthew," returning about Aug. 10, the date of the king's privy pursure reward "to him that found the new isle." Pasqualegio, writing On Aug. 31, says: "the Venetian, . . . who went with the ship—from Bristol, in quest of new islands is returned, and says that 700 leagues hence he discovered land, the territory of the Gran Cam.
He coasted for 300 leagues and landed; he saw no human beings.
. . . He was there some months on the coast, and it is more probable that Cabot's land all took place between Cape Breton and the Strait of Belle Isle. Although Harrisse, and other writers, have placed this landfall in New Foundland, north of Cape Race, it seems much more likely that it took place on Cape Breton Island, or at the north end of Nova Scotia; as, otherwise, it would be difficult, even making due allowance for fog and off shore winds, to explain why Cabot, in search of a western passage, should have passed by the entrance to the Gulf of St. Lawrence.
On this voyage, which lasted about three months, or more likely on the second, undertaken during the following year, with five vessels, or during both of these voyages together, he sailed along the North East Coast.
Cabot's journals and charts are lost, and our contemporary information in regard to this second voyage is confusing and contradictory, even such as is derived from Cabot himself. Indeed, the very existence of this voyage, or rather the arrival of the expedition in American waters has been questioned. It seems altogether probable, however, that the voyage took place and that Cabot followed the coast, at least as far south as Cape Hatteras, and very likely looked Sindy Hook. It is even possible that he coasted as far south as Florida, and there is good reason to believe that he landed, and explored the coast as a number of points.
The celebrated world-map drawn by Juan de la Cosa in 1500
(C. Pl. 1, Vol. II) is, doubtless, the first map to embody the results of Cabot's explorations on these voyages. This important map, with its mysterious and insinuating coast-line, is also the first to show any part of the North American continent. That this coastline was intended for America, and not for Asia, is evident, from the fact that the names which it contains are entirely different from those found at the time along the Asiatic coast, as well as for other reasons, fully discussed by Harrisse in Discurso of N. Am. (p. 6.)

On May 10, 1497, Vespucius sailed from Cadiz, and about July 1 sighted land, which he believed to be the continent, in 16° N.L. (probably in the Gulf of Honduras). Thence he followed the coast in a general north-easterly direction until he reached a place which is called Laripi in the Italian version of his journal (Letten), and Paria in the Latin version (Cosmographia Introductio). Vide infra.
This place, we are told by Vespucius, was "in 25° beneath the parallel of Cancer," and probably corresponds to the modern Tampico, the most westerly port on the Gulf of Mexico. The name Paria is found in this location on Schiner's globe of 1555. His globe of 1520 has Paria. See Thacher, The Continent of N. Am., Index, under Paria.

From this point, Vespucius says, he continued, always following the simooms of the coast, a distance of 870 leagues—about 2,000 miles—in a north-easterly direction. This is evidently an error for north-easterly, as otherwise he would have travelled, overland, almost to California. At the end of this course, he reached "the finest harbour in the world," where he remained 37 days.
Leaving here in July, he sailed 100 leagues in an E.N.E. direction to an archipelago, which he called the Bermudas, which is Bermuda, at which he has in equally good reason to identify with the islands off the coast of Maine. Thence he returned to Cadiz, reaching there Oct. 15, 1498 (the Latin edition gives 1499, evidently an error), after an absence of 17 months.

Vespucius' original journals of his four voyages, to which he several times referred, "Mundus Novus," and his Lettera, under the name "Quatro Giornate," as having been submitted to the King of Portugal, have disappeared. They were, however, mentioned by Jean Vespucius, his nephew and successor as pilot-major,
May as being, after his uncle's death, in his possession.

All the information that we have on the subject of the first voyage is contained in La Lettera (a letter addressed to Pietro Sodini, "Geofanfion Perpetuo") of Vespucius, and dated from Lisbon, Sept. 4, 1498.
This letter contains a résumé of Vespucius' four voyages.

The Lettera is known by two versions, the original, in Italian, with the title Lettera di Amore Vespucci delle isole nuovamente trovate in quattro suoi viaggi, being a small quarto of 16 leaves, unbound, but probably printed at Florence, in 1505 or 1506, for Pietro Paccini, by Gian di Carlo di Pavia. The only copy in America of this rare and important work is in the Princeton University Library. The first Latin version was printed in the Cosmographiae Introductio, by Walthermuller (Hylacynthas), at St. Dèe in the Vouges mountains, from a French edition, now lost, and is dated April 25, 1507. The best English translation of the Italian and Latin texts is that of Michael Kenney, published in 1893, and reproduced, on the same page, with the Italian and Latin texts, in John Boyd Thacher's The Continent of America, from which the following extract, describing Vespucius' first voyage, is taken—
"This land [Laripi] is within the torrid zone, close to or just under the parallel which marks the Tropic of Cancer; where the pole of the horizon has an elevation of 25 degrees, at the extremity of the second climate. Many tribes came to see us and wondered at our faces and our whiteness, and they asked us where we came and we gave them to understand that we were from Europe, and that we were going to see the world, and they believed it.
In this land we placed baptismal fonts, and an infinite [number of] people were baptized, and they called us in their language Carahi, which means men of wisdom. We took our departure from that port: and the province is called Laripi; and we navigated along the coast always in sight of land, until we had run 870 leagues of it, still going in the direction of the maestre [north-west] making in our course many halts, and holding intercourse with many peoples: and in several places we obtained gold and copper, but not in great quantity, for in that part we tuck don enough for discovering the land and learning that they had gold. We had now been thirteen months on the voyage: and the vessels and the tacking were already much damaged, and the men worn out by fatigue: we decided by general council to haul our ships on land and examine them for the purpose of staunching leaks, as they made much water, and of caulking and tarring them afloat, and then returning towards Spain and when we came to this determination, we were close to a harbour the best in the world: into which we entered with our vesles: where we found an immense number of people who received us with much friendliness: and on the shore we made a hasting barter with them: and in the same vessels: and in the same manner as we had come from heaven, and also, starting from the land, a race of people very cruel, and enemies of theirs:
and by means of treachery or of violence slew many of them, and ate them: and some they made captives, and carried them away to their houses, or country: and how they could scarcely conceive to defend themselves from them, making signs to us that they were an island-people and lived out in the sea about a hundred leagues away: and so piteously did they tell us that this we believed them:
and we promised to avenge them of so much wrong: and they remained overjoyed heretofore: and many of them offered to come along with us: and with their states: and in the part we tuck save that we took seven of them, on condition that they should come [i.e., return home] afterwards in canoes because we did not desire to be obliged to take them back to their country: and they were contented: and so we departed from those people, leaving them very friendly towards us: and having repaired our ships, and sailing for seven days and a half, the 15th month of May, at the end of the seven days we came upon the islands, which were many, some [of them] inhabited, and others deserted: and we 1497 anchored at one of them: where we saw a numerous people who called it Il. . . . We arranged our departure, and the seven men, of whom five were wounded, took an island-canoe, and, with seven prisoners that we gave them, four women and three men, returned to their own country full of gladness, wandering at our strength and wealth,丽the said sail for Spain, with 224 captives for slaves, and reached the port of Cadiz on the 15 day of October 1498, where we were well received and sold our slaves. Such is what beeld me, most noteworthy, in this my first voyage.

Starting at Larub, or Orta (Tampico), and following the sinuosities of the coast, at a distance of 80 leagues (measured on the globe, or on Lambert's projection), in a general north-easterly direction, carries us a little beyond New York, which may therefore be considered as the northernmost possible limit of Vespuccius' explorations. It is, however, perhaps, safer to identify the fine harbour which he mentions as the northern limit of this voyage as Chesapeake Bay, as, owing to the many bays and river mouths that he must have explored, he is more likely to have over-estimated than under-estimated the actual length of the coast-line between his starting point in 25° and the harbour which marked the northern limit of his exploration of the coast.

Varnhagen, in his Le Premier Voyage d'Amérique Vespucci Dénominé Expliqué (Vienne, 1869), maintains that 770 leagues, rather than 870, should be accepted as the length of the voyage, when we take into consideration the distance covered going into bays, rivers, etc., which he figures would bring the northern limit of his voyage about to Cape Hatteras. He draws attention to the fact that a cape, and not a harbour, marks the northern limit on the map of Ruysh, 1508, and on that in the Ptolemy of 1513.

The archipelago, which Vespuccius tells us lay 100 leagues from the fine harbour, and which they reached in seven days, sailing in a direction "between N. E. & E.," corresponds more nearly, in distance and direction, to the islands in the neighbourhood of the Penobscot than it does to the Bermudas, which, moreover, there is every reason to suppose were uninhabited at this time, as they are known to have been a few years later.

This voyage of Vespuccius seems undoubtedly to be embodied in the De Is Lasa cosa map of 1500 (C. Pl. 1, Vol. II) the northern portion of which is, with equal probability, derived from the Cabot voyages of 1497 and 1498, while the South American coast-line probably follows the accounts brought back by Hojeda and Pinzon, with the former of whom De la Isla himself sailed.

Vespuccius' first voyage is also the basis of the Cantino chart of 1501—2 (C. Pl. 3, Vol. II), and of the Cantino map of c. 1505 (C. Pl. 3, Vol. II), as well as of the large Waldseemüller map (C. Pl. 5, Vol. II) made to accompany the Cosmographiae Introductio, of 1507, on all of which the Atlantic coast is clearly shown. It is interesting to remember that the Cantino chart was made at Lisbon, at the very time when Vespuccius was there, on his return from his first voyage.

For a full discussion of Vespuccius, and of his first voyage, see Henry Vignaud, Amerique Vespucci (Paris, 1917), the various works of Herrero, especially his Discovery of North America, and the Iconography, Vol. II, page 6 et seq.

May Columbus sets out from San Lucas, Spain, with six ships, on his third voyage. On July 31, he discovered Trinidad, later entered the Gulf of Paria, in South America, and then sailed north along the coast of the mainland. He reached the southern coast of Hayti on Aug. 91, and returned home on Nov. 20, 1498.—Major, Select Letters of Christopher Columbus, with other Original Documents relating to his Four Voyages to the New World. 1500

In the early summer of this year, Gaspar Cortezeal sailed from Lisbon for a voyage to the north-west. He probably visited Newfoundland, the Hudson Straits, and Greenland. In December, he returned to Portugal.—Harrisse, Les Cartes. This voyage seems to have been followed by a second, in the same year, from which Gaspar never returned, and by a third, in 1501 or 1502, in which his brother, Miguel, lost his life. Although unsuccessful in finding a passage to Cathay, these expeditions helped to open up Portugal a source of profitable trade.

In this year, Juan de la Cosa, who had accompanied Columbus on his first and second voyages to the West, compiled his map of the world, on which he delineated all he knew of the discoveries in the New World, this information being undoubtedly derived, as we have seen, primarily from the voyages of Vespuccius and Cabot, probably with some help from those of Hojeda and Pinzon. This is the earliest map known on which the western discoveries are shown, and it therefore constitutes the starting point in a study of the cartography of the North-East coast. The original, drawn on an ox hide, is preserved in the Museo Naval at Madrid. As the names along the coast of North America show no Asiatic influence, and for other reasons, there can be no doubt that the author intended to represent America, not Asia.

This very important map is reproduced (in part) in Vol. II, C. Pl. 1, and is described on p. 131. See also Harrisse, Discovery.

The Cantino map or chart (C. Pl. 2, and pp. 6 and 131, Vol. II, Stevenson No. 5) was made in this year.

The Cantino chart (C. Pl. 5, and pp. 7 and 131, Vol. II) was made between 1502 and 1504.

In this year, the Casa de Contratacion was created. It was a state institution, intended to concentrate all transactions relating to the New World; it had its own pilots, under a pilot-major, and a school of cosmography. On Aug. 6, 1508, the Spanish government ordered the creation of an official pattern map, called the padrón real, by a commission of pilots (junos), chosen from among the most competent masters of the kingdom, under the leadership of Americus Vespuccius, who was then pilot-major, an office expressly created for him that same year. This model map was "to embrace all lands, and isles of the Indies until then discovered, and belonging to the Crown." Thenceforth, the use of other maps was forbidden, under penalty.

All pilots were required to report "every land, island, bay, harbour, and other things new and worthy of being noted," discovered by them, as soon as they returned to Spain. In this way the official map of the new world was intended to be always kept up to date, and copies of it could be obtained at a fixed price from the Casa de Contratacion.

On Aug. 2, 1527, Charles V ordered that the padrón real, thenceforth called padrón general, should be verified by the pilot-major twice a year. For further information on this subject, see Vol. II, Cartography; and Harrisse, Discovery of No. Am., 255 et seq.

The earliest book containing a collection of voyages to America was published at Venice in this year. It is entitled Libro de tutte la Navigazione del le di Spagna delle Isole, et Terreni nouamente scoperta. Per Alberto Fereiche. There is a copy of this book in the John Carter Brown Library. The only other copy known is a defective one which once belonged to Fernando Columbus, and is now preserved in the Biblioteca Marciana.—Harrisse, Bibl. Amer. The British Museum contains a unique small black-letter octavo (imperfect), once belonging to Garrick, and bearing the title A new Interlude and a Mery, of the nature of the iiij. Elementes (etc.). This little drama, which is one of the earliest of the English moral, or morality, plays, was reprinted by the Percy Society (Vol. XXIII) in 1848, edited by J. O. Halliwell. In the cosmographical part of the play, "Experience" relates to "Studious Desire" many things regarding "dyuers strange regions and of the new found landys" of America. The following extract is taken from this part of the book:

THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

Nov. 15, 1609:
Giovanni da Verrazzano, a Florentine, is sent by Francis I, King of France, in the "Dauphine," in search of a western passage to Asia. His point of departure was a "deserted rock" in the neighbourhood of the island of Madeira, probably the small island called now Porto Santo. From his letter to the king (the Collection, C. Pis., 60-81, and pp. 169-71, Vol. II), written at Dieppe on July 8, 1624, after his return, we know that he entered New York Bay, and saw the mouth of the Hudson River.

On March 7, after sighting the American continent in the neighborhood of Cape Fear, he took up his course southward, and coasting southward for about 80 leagues (presumably to a point just north of Charleston), Verrazzano, observing that the coast trended continually to the south, and finding no "port or any place where it was possible to stay with the ship," turned to the north, and having made a brief excursion on shore near the point of his first landing, proceeded again northward along the coast, to which he gave the names "Forest of Lauræus," and "Field of Cedars."

Skirting the coast, which he now found turned to the east, as far as Cape Lookout, which he named "Annunziata," he "noting an isthmus a mile in width and 200 long." These words accurately described the continuous sandbar separating the ocean from Panlico and Alhemarle Sounds, which Verrazzano evidently mistook for "the Oriental sea... which is the one without doubt which goes about the extremity of India, China, and Cathay." This the isthmus he gave the name of "Verrazzano," a name which it retained for more than 50 years.

After leaving Cape Lookout, and passing Cape Hatteras, "calling always the shore, which turned somewhat to the north [he writes], we came in a space of 50 leagues to another land which appeared much more beautiful and full of the largest forests." This is referred to as the land of vines, wild roses, violets, and lilies, and corresponds with the Accacom Peninsula of Virginia.
Up to this time, it will be noticed, no mention is made of anchoring at night, which probably accounts for Verrazzano not having named the entrance to the Great Bay, which, moreover, on account of its wide mouth, and the oblique direction of the river, has, from the sea, the appearance of a rather shallow indentation.

After remaining three days in the vine country, they proceeded, "always skirting the shore [the coast of Maryland... which we baptised America]" to the coast of the beauty of the trees, towards the north and east, navigating by daylight, and casting anchor at night."

Verrazzano next reached "a coast very green with forests but without ports, and with some charming promontories and small rivers [Delaware and New Jersey]. We baptised the coast of London by the first promontory of the sea... the second 'Bonavite' [Cape May], the largest river 'Vandomus' [the Delaware], and a small mountain which stands by the sea 'di S. Polo' [Navaeis Highlands]."

"At the end of 100 leagues [from the starting point in 34°], we found a very agreeable situation located within two small promontory hills [Navaeis Highlands] and the high ground at the east end of Staten Island, in the midst of which flowed to the sea a very great river [the Hudson]."

This is the first time that Verrazzano mentions hills to his account, and the Navaeis Highlands are, indeed, the first hills of any importance found on the whole stretch of coast from Florida northward.

Beyond these hills, he describes, "within the land about half a league [inside the Narrows], a very beautiful lake with a circuit of about three leagues [the Upper Bay]."

"Verrazzano called the bay [Lower] Suffort Margarita," and the river and the surrounding land "Aegolome," all in honour of the royal family.

In a small book (uno libretto), he collected technical observations made during his voyage, notably the longitudinal distances and the movements of the tides. This libretto is, unfortunately, lost.

It is interesting to compare Verrazzano's account of his approach to New York with the accounts of the same neighbourhood written in later years by Van Meteren, Joet, and De Laet. Van Meteren (Jameston, N. N. Nat., 1609) describes Hudson's entrance, on Sept. 16, 1609, as follows: "They found a good entrance between two headlands [at the Narrows] and entered... into as fine a river as can be found, wide and deep, with good anchoring ground [and vegetation] on both sides."

Joet (Jameston, N. N. Nat., 17) writes (Sept. 2, 1609): "We went to the Northward off us we saw high Hills... This is a very good Land to fall in with, and a pleasant Land to see." He adds (Sept. 3): "The Land is very pleasant and high, and bold to fall withall. At three of the clocke in the afternoone, wee came to three great Rivers" (the Raritan, the Arthur Kill, and the Narrows). Van Meteren (Jameston, N. N. Nat., 1609) describes Hudson's course along the shore [New Jersey], they observed a white sandy beach and drowned land within; beyond which the land was full of trees, the coast running northeast by north and southwest by south. Afterwards the direction of the coast changed to north by east, and was higher land than they had yet seen, along a lofty promontory [the Highlands], behind which was situated a bay
The discoveries of Verrazzano are found first on a map of the world by Veconste di Maggioro, dating from 1527 (C. Pl. 12, Vol. II); secondly, and most clearly, on a large sea-chart drawn by his brother, Gigli, the same year. [C. Pl. 13, Vol. II]; and thirdly, on a map of Nova Francia, in Ramusio, 1556 (C. Pl. 14, Vol. II), which is probably derived from some now lost map by Gastaldi, closely resembling his map of 1566 shown in outline on C. Pl. 17, and the unprinted Italian map of 1564 shown on the same plate, which also is probably by him.—See Vol. II, p. 15, foot-note 44 and Addenda, 1906.

For a description of these maps, and others of the "Verrazzano type," and a discussion of Verrazzano's voyage as therein depicted, see Vol. II, Cartography, page 15 et seq. See also pages 169-71, and C. Pl. 60 to 65, Vol. II, for a description and reproduction of the Celere Codes, and a discussion of Verrazzano's other letters and the texts based thereon; and also Prof. Bachiani's critica, with an introduction by Edward Hagan Ham, in the 15th Annual Report (1916) of the Am. Scenic & Hist. Preservation Soc. Dr. Hall's translation of the Celere Codes (occasionally modified, to make the meanings clearer), is given here in full, as follows:

(Note.—The letters R., F., C., and Rm. refer, respectively, to the Celere or Roman Codex [reproduced in full in Vol. II, C. Pla. 60-61], the Florentine Codex, the fragment in the Academy of Cimento, and the account in Ramusio. The italics in the text of the Celere or Roman Codex (R.) indicate words not found in the Florentine Codex (F.). The notes in parentheses are interpolations, marginal notes, etc., in R., in a hand differing from that of the amanuensis, and were probably written by Verrazzano himself. Variations from R., found in F., C., and Rm., are given in brackets. If these include additions to the B. text, such additions are in italics.)

"After the storm had moved towards the north, Most Serene King, I did not write to Your Majesty concerning that which was experienced by the four ships [The R. document uses the word 'ships', but uses 'sea' meaning something similar. In the following notes, which refer to similar variations which have no special significance, or which cannot readily be expressed in English, or which (as is sometimes the case) make nonsense, I have referred the reader to the Italian text following—Translator.] whom you had sent through the Oceans to discover new lands, thinking that you had been informed of everything—how we were compelled by the impetuous force of the winds to return to Britain with only the distressed Normanda and Dauphine; where having made repairs, Your Majesty will have learned of the voyage we made with them, armed for war, along the coasts of Spain [Rm.] and there we took cost and course along the coasts of Spain; which your Majesty will have learned by the profit which we made thereby. Later, it was ordered that we should continue the original voyage with the Dauphine alone [Rm. later, with the Dauphine alone, the discovery of new countries was considered in order not to lose in return the voyage already accomplished.—See Italian text] having returned from which, I will tell Your Majesty what we have found.

"We started from the deserted rock near the Island of Madeira belonging to the Most Serene King of Portugal [commencing 1524. (The same hand had written 1533, then changed the 3 to 4) with the said Dauphine, on the XVII of the month of January past, with fifty men, furnished with victuals, arms and other full necessaries of war and naval munitions for eight months; departing, we sailed westward with an east south-east wind blowing with sweet and gentle mildness [F. lightness]. In XXV days we sailed eight hundred leagues. The XXXIII day of February [Rm. on the 20 February] (perhaps 16 hours) we experienced as severe a storm as ever any man who has navigated experienced. From which, with divine aid and the goodness of the ship, enabled by its glorious name and fortunate destiny [F. goodness and praise of the glorious name and fortunate achievement. Rm. goodness of the ship together with the good fortune of its name] to resist the violent waves of the sea [Rm.] in a manner that almost increased its beauty and was favorable to us. We pursued our navigation continuously toward the west, bearing somewhat to the north. To XXV more days we sailed more than 400 leagues, where there appeared to us a new land never before seen by anyone, ancient or modern. There we first landed a little lower; having approached to within a quarter of a league, we perceived, by the great fires built on the shore of the sea, that it was inhabited. We saw that it extended toward the south; following it, to find [Rm. searching them to discover] some port [F. near port] where we could anchor with the ship and investigate its nature, in the space of fifty leagues we did not find a port or any place where it was possible to stay with the ship. And having seen that it trended continually to the south (in order, of course, to meet with the wind and the course), we decided to take it toward the north, where we found the same [place that we started from]—[Rm. where we found ourselves in the same difficulty]. We anchored by the coast, sending the small boat to land. We saw many people, who came to the shore of the sea and seeing us approach, fled, sometimes halting, turning back, looking with great admiration. Reassuring them by various signs, some of them showed, showing great delight at seeing us, marvelling at our clothes, figures and whiteness [See Italian text], making to us various signs where we could land more conveniently with the small boat, offering us their foods.

"We were on land, and I shall tell Your Majesty briefly what we were able to learn of their life and customs:"

"They go alogether naked except that at the private parts they wear some skins of little animals similar to martens, a girdle of fine grass woven with various tails of other animals which hang around the body as far as the knees; the two nude, the head likewise. Some wear certain garlands [F. similar garlands] of feathers of birds. They are of black color out much unlike the Ethiopians [Rm. they are of beretta color and not much different from the Saracens]; their hair is black and thick, and not very long, which they have cut to the head in the shape of a little tail. As for the symmetry of the men [F. likeness of the men], they are well proportioned, of medium stature, and rather exceed us. In the chest they are broad, their arms well built, the legs and other parts of the body well put together. There is nothing else to remark, except that they incline somewhat to broadness in the face; but not all, for in many we saw the face clear-cut. The eyes are black and large, the glance intent and quick. They are not very strong, [but] keen intelligence, swift and the greatest runners. From what we were able to learn by experience, they resemble in the last two respects the Orientals, and modesty is their distinguishing mark [F. regions of China]. We were not able to learn in detail of the life and customs of these people because of the shortness of the stay we made on land, on account of there being few people and the ship anchored in the high sea [See Italian text]."

"We found on the shore, not far from these, other people whose mode of life we think is similar. I will tell Your Majesty about it, describing at present the site and nature of said land. The sea-shore is all covered with fine sand XV feet high, extending in the form of little hills about fifty paces wide [Rm. rising about 15 feet, extending in the form of broad little hills]. After going ahead [Rm. After going ahead] about twenty leagues, and arms, (in which we entered through some mouths, courting the shore [Rm. washing the shore]) on both sides as it follows its winding [F. its shore. Rm. its turning]. Near by appears the spacious land, so high that it exceeds [overtops] the sandy shore, with many beautiful fields and plains [F. provinces], full of the largest forests, some thin and some dense, clothed with as many colors of trees [F. of various colors. Rm. various sorts of trees], with as much beauty and delightful appearance as it would be possible to express. And do not think, Your Majesty, that these are like the Herccanian Forest or the wild solitudes of Scythia [Rm. solitudes of Tartary] and northern countries, full of rugged trees [F. full of vines and trees. Rm. wild trees], but adorned and clothed with palms, laurels, cypresses [Rm. tall cypresses ('tall') was also written in R. but was cancelled], and other varieties of trees unknown in our Europe [We baptised this land "Forest of Laurel" and a little farther down on account of the beautiful cedars it was given the name "Field of Cedars"]; which, for a long distance, exhaled the sweetest odors [We smelled the odor a hundred leagues, and further when they burned the cedars and the winds blew from the land] the property of which we were not able to learn, for the cause above narrated, not that it was difficult for us to travel through the forests [F. through the forest], but that the trees were strong and difficult to cut. We think that, partaking of the Orient, on account of the surroundings, they are not without some drugs or aromatic liquor. And other riches: gold [F. gold and other], to which land of such a color has every tendency. It abounds in many animals, stags, deer, bears, and lions in lakes and pools of fresh water, with many kinds of birds, adapted and convenient for every delectable pleasure of the hunt [Rm. pleasure of the chase]."
The air salubrious, pure and with moderate heat and cold; in those regions gentle winds blow, and those which prevail most consistently are west-north-west and west [See Italian text], in summer time, at the beginning of which we were (in those regions); the south winds being: frequent rains, and if sometimes, being on the south winds the air gathereth in clouds or darkness [See Italian text], in an instant, not lasting, it is dispelled, and the air again becomes pure and clear; the sea tranquill and not boisterous, the waves of which are placid. And although the shore always tends to lowness, and is barren of parts, it is not troublesome to sailors [Rm. risorse for sailord, being entirely clear and without any rocks]; so deep that within only four or five fathoms from land are found, regardless of flood or ebb, XX feet of water, the depth of the sea increasing in uniform proportion [See Italian text]; with such good holding-ground [F. territory. Rm. anchorage] that any ship however affected by the tempest can never perish in those parts, unless it breaks its rope [Rm. cable]. And this we have proved by experience; because many times at the beginning of March when the full force of the winds usually prevails in all countries, being anchored in the high sea, oppressed by storms, we found the anchor broken before it dragged on the bottom or made any movement. The stars are visible, and the moon is seen continually on the coast, which we found turned to the east. Seeing everywhere great fires on account of the multitude of inhabitants, anchoring there off the shore [F. anchoring off that shore] because it did not contain any port, on account of the need of water we sent the little boat to land with XX fathoms of the very large rocks, on which the sea casts, on the shore, on account of the strand being open, it was not possible, without danger of losing the boat, for any one to land. We saw many people on shore making various signs of friendship, motioning us ashore; among whom I saw a magnificent deed, as Your Majesty shall hear.

"Sailing from shore by swimming one of our young sailors, carrying to them some trinkets, such as little bells [Rm. in order to send them some of our things, by the Indians commonly much desired and valued, as are sheets of paper, little bells, mirrors, and other pretty trinkets, and having approached within 4 fathoms of them, throwing the goods to them and wishing to turn back he was so tossed by the waves that, almost half dead, he was carried to the edge of the shore. Which having been seen, the people of the land ran immediately to him; taking him by the head, legs and arms, they carried him some distance away. Whereupon, the youth, seeing himself carried in such a way [F. in such shape, stricken with terror, uttered cries of despair, and Grave] they disdained in their body, which they did not seem to show him that he should not fear. After that, having placed him on the ground in the sun at the foot of a little hill, they performed great acts of admiration, looking at the whiteness of his flesh, examining him from head to foot [Rm. omits "examining him from head to foot"] taking off his shirt and stockings, leaving him naked, they made a very large fire near him, placing him between the heat. Which having been seen, the sailors who had remained in the small boat, full of fear, as is their custom in every new experience, thought that they wanted to roast him for food. His strength receded, having remained with them awhile, he showed by signs that he desired to return to the ship; who [the native], with the greatest kindness, holding him always close with various embraces, accompanied him as far as the sea, and in order to assure him more, stationing themselves on a high hill, stood watching him until he was in the boat. Which young man learned of this people the true tokens: that of black color like the others, the flesh of a very lustrous, of medium stature, the face more clear-cut, much more delicate of body and of limb, of much less strength and of keener intelligence. He saw nothing else [Rm. I saw nothing else]. (It is called Annuaents from the day of arrival, wherever is found an island a mile in width and about 200 long, in which, from the ship, was seen the oriental sea between the west [before had been written "the east"] and north. Which is the one, without doubt, which goes about the extremity of India, China and Cathay. We navigated along the said island with the constant hope of finding some state [after which is written, but cancelled, "to the end of [or, in order to find—"] or true prosperity at which the land would end toward the north in order to be able to penetrate to those blessed shores of Cathay, To which island was given by the discoverer [the name] of Arcadia: as all the land found was named Arcadiae after our Francis.

"Having departed thence, following always the shore which turned somewhat toward the north, we came in the space of fifty leagues to another land which appeared much more beautiful and full of the largest forests. Anchoring at which, XX men going about two leagues inland, we found the people through fear had fled to the woods. Searching everywhere, we met with a very old man and a young woman, and the old man, aged about 17, and the young man about 15. They had two little girls whom she carried on her shoulders, and back on her neck she carried a boy, all of eight years of age [F. of about eight years. Rm. a little boy of about eight years]. The young woman had as many but all girls. Having approached towards them, they began to look at the old man, in order to make signs to us that the men had fled to the woods. We gave them to eat of our food, which the old woman accepted [F. they accepted] with great gustom; the young woman refused everything and with anger threw it to the ground. We took the boy away from the old woman to carry him to France, wishing also to take the young woman, who was of much beauty and of tall stature, it was not however possible for us to conduct her to the sea, on account of the very great criques which she uttered. And having to pass through some woods, being far from the ship, we decided to leave her, carrying only the boy.

These we found lighter colored than the previous ones, dressed in certain garments, which presently continued on the coast, which, after we had left, we never saw again. Which is very common in the region, which they weave with various ends of wild hemp [Rm. cords of wild hemp]. The head bare in the same way as the others. Their food in general consists of pulse which they have in abundance, differing in color and size from ours, of excellent and delightful flavor; besides, they also eat other things which they take with bows and with snares. They make [the bow] from selected wood, and arrows of reeds, placing at the extremities bones of fishes and of other animals. The beasts in this part are much wilder than in our Europe because they are continually molested by the hunters. We saw many of their boats constructed from a single tree twenty feet long, four wide, which are not fashioned with stones, iron or other kind of metals, because in all this land, in the space of two hundred leagues which we traveled, only one stone of any kind was seen by us. They aid themselves with the fourth element [Rm. they help themselves with fire], burning such part of the wood as is necessary for the hollowing of the boat, also of the stern and prow, so that, sailing, it is possible to plough the waves [Rm. to endure the waves] of the sea.

The land in situation, goodness and beauty, is like the other; the forests open [arces—f]; full of various kinds of trees, but not of such fragrances, on account of being farther north and colder. We saw in that land many vines growing wild, which, rising, entwine themselves around the trees, as they do in Cispaline Gaul [Rm. as, they are accustomed to do in Lombardy]; which, if they had a perfect system of culture by agriculturists, without doubt would produce excellent wines, because we found many times the dry fruit of those [Rm. dry fruits of those] vines, and the dry fruit of those [vines] sweet and agreeable, not different from ours. They are held in esteem by them [the inhabitants], because wherever they grow, they lift up the surrounding bushes [See Italian text] in order that the fruit may be able to mature. We found wild roses, violets, lilies, and many sorts of herbs, and fragrant flowers different from ours. We did not learn about their habits on account of their being within, inland. We think, on account of many signs which we saw, they are composed of wood and grase, and we believe also from various indications and signs that many of them, sleeping on the ground, have nothing for cover except the sky. We did not learn anything else of them. We think all the others of the land [by which we passed lived in the same manner.

"Having remained in this place three days, anchored off the coast, we decided, on account of the scarcity of ports, to depart, always skirting the shore [which we baptized Arcadia on account of the beauty of the trees. In Arcadia we found a man who came to the shore to see what people were who stood hesitating and ready for flight. Watching us, he did not permit himself to be approached. He was handsome, nude, with hair flowing back in a beard, of olive color. We were, about 2X [in number] others, and yielding to our coercing he was pressed to within about 100 paces, and finally as still as if we offered to fire. And we made fire with powder and flint-reeked and he trembled all over with terror and we fired a shot. He stopped as if astonished and prayed, worshipping like a monk, lifting his finger toward the sky, and pointing to the ship and the sea he appeared to bless us] toward the north and east, navigating only during the day.

and casting anchor at night (see followed a coast very green with forests but without ports, and with some charming promontories and small rivers. We baptized the coast "di Lorraine" after the Cardinal; the first promontory "Lucerne," the second "Bontocchio," the largest river
"Pamouiro," and a small mountain which stands by the sea "di S.
Polo" after the Count).

"At the end of a hundred leagues we found a very agreeable situation located within two small prominent hills [Rm. among little hills], in the midst of which flowed to the sea a very great river [Rm. very three hundred], which was full with both the mouths; and from the sea to the hills of that [place] with the rising of the tides, which we found eight feet, any laden ship [Rm. any great loaded ship] might have passed. On account of being anchored off the coast in good shelter [Rm. restrict. Rm. in a place well protected from wind], we did not wish to adventure in without knowledge of the entrance [the mouth]. We were with the small boat, entering the said river to the land, which we found much populated. The people, almost like the others, clothed with the feathers of birds of various colors, came toward us joyfully, uttering very great exclamations of admiration, showing us where we could land with the boat more safely. We entered said river, within the land, about half a league, where we saw it made a very beautiful lake with a circuit of about three leagues [the Upper Bay]; through which they [the Indians] went, going from one and another part with XXX of their little boats, with innumerable people, who passed from one shore and the other of the lake itself; and then, in the same time, and at the same occasion, a gale of unfavorable wind blowing in from the sea, we were forced to return to the ship, leaving the said land with much regret because of its commodiousness and beauty, thinking it was not without some properties of value, all of its hills showing [Rm. some wealth showing indications of minerals (Called Anglicu from the principalty which they attained in lesser fortune [as a minor part of thy fortune—], and the bay which that land makes Santa Margarita from the name of thy sister, who vanquishes the other matrons in modesty and intelligence).

"The anchor raised, sailing toward the east, as thus the land turned, having traveled XXXX leagues [Rm. and so go leagues] always in sight of it, we discovered an island triangular in form, distant ten leagues from the continent, in size like the island of Rhodes, full of hills, covered with trees, much populated [judging] by the continuous fires which we saw they made along all the neighbor-ingshore. We baptized it in the name of your most illustrious mother (Maysta), not anchoring there on account of the unprofitableness of the weather [Rm. on account of the coarseness of the weather].

It is interesting to compare this last passage with the corresponding text of De Lact's account of Verrazzano's voyage, in his Nuova World, p. 58 Book, Chap. I, p. 90 (edition of 1696). He says:

"The coast, being observed toward the sea, having traveled XXX leagues [Rm. and so go leagues] did not show any beauties, but the land turned, having traveled XXX leagues [Rm. and so go leagues] all the time, we observed an island triangular in form, distant ten leagues from the continent, in size and form like the island of Rhodes, full of hills, with trees, much populated, which they called Claudio." De Lact names Halkゅy among his sources, and probably derived his account from Halkьy's publication. It is interesting to notice that he uses the name Claudio, which appears on the Dutch maps of the period.

The Gillese Codex continues:

"We came to another land, distant from the island XV leagues, where we found a very beautiful port, and before we entered it, we saw about XX small boats of the people who came with various cries of wonder round about the ship. Not approaching nearer than fifty paces, they halted, looking at the edifice [i.e., the ship. Rm. the workmanship, our figures and clothes; then all together they uttered loud shouts, signifying that they were glad. Having reas-ured them somewhat, imitating their gestures, they came so near that we threw them some little bells and mirrors and many trinkets, having taken which, regarding them with laughter, they entered the ship. We went on the ship for various reasons, among which the capacity and form as it would be possible to tell; the first of about XXXX years [Rm. of 20 years], the other a young man of XXIII years, whose clothing was thus: the older had on his nude body a skin of a stag, artificially worked like a damask with various embroideries; the head bare, the hair turned back with various bands; the feet adorned with broad chains with many stones of diverse colors. The young man was almost in the same style. This is the most beautiful people and the kindest in manners that we have found on this voyage. They excel us in size; they are of bronze color [Rm. of very white color], some inclining more to whiteness, others to tawny color; the face sharply cut, the hair long and black, upon which they bestow the greatest study in adorning it; the eyes black, and all manner of forms, being and gentle, imitating much the ancient [manner]. Of the other parts of the body I will not speak [Rm. I do not speak] to Your Majesty, as they have all the proportions which belong to every well built man [Rm. to one well built. Their women are of the same beauty and charm [Rm. form and heart and beauty; very numerous, handsome, and gentle, imitating much and agreeable aspect; of habits and behavior as much according to warmly custom as pertains to human nature; they go nude with only one skin of the stag embroidered like the men [Rm. nude except the private parts, which they cover], and some wear on the arms very rich skins of the lynx; the head bare with various arrangements of braids, composed of their own hair, which hang on one side and the other of the breast. Some use other hair-arrangements such as the women of Egypt and of Syria [Rm. Soria] use, and these are who they are who are advanced in age and are joined in wedlock.
They have in the ears various pendent trinkets as the orientals are acquainted to have, the men like the women, among which we saw many plates wrought from copper, which is prized by them more than gold; which, on account of its color, they do not esteem; but among all [colours] it is held by them the most worthless [Rm. because it is held very worthless on account of the yellow color which they consider to be most tainting blue and green]. The things which they were given by us and which they most valued were little bells, blue crystals and other trinkets to place in the ears and on the neck. They did not prize cloth of silk and of gold nor cloth of other kind [Rm. kind of cloth], nor did they care to have them; likewise with metals like steel and iron; for many times showing them our arms they did not conceive admiration for them nor ask for them, only examining the workmanship. They did the same with the mirrors; suddenly looking at them, they refused them, laughing. They are very liberal, so much so that all which they have they give away. We formed a great friendship with them, and on our stay, before we had entered with the ship into the port, recording on account of the unfavorable weather conditions anchored a league at sea, they came in great numbers in their little barges to the ship, having painted and decked [Rm. tattooed and bedecked. Rm.
all painted] the face with various colors, showing us it was evident of good feeling, bringing us of their food, supplying us where for the safety of the ship we ought to anchor in the port, continually accompanying us until we cast anchor there.

"In which [Rm. on account of which] we remained XV days, supplying ourselves with many necessities; where every day the people came to see us at the ship, bringing their women, of whom they were very careful [Rm. and rree], not to permit them to take care of themselves, remaining a long time, they made their women stay in the boats, and however many entreaties we made them, offering to give them various things, we did not succeed in persuading them to allow them to enter the ship. And one of the two Kings coming in many times with many attendants and refusing to see us, at first always stopped at a place distant from us two hundred paces, sending a boat to inform us of his coming, saying he wished to come to see the ship; doing this as a kind of safeguard [Rm. security. Rm. sign of security]. And when they had the response from us, they came quickly, and having stood awhile to look, hearing the noisy clamor of the sailor crowd [Rm. hearing the shouts and clamor of the mariners], sent the Queen [Rm. madam the Queen . . . remained] with her damsels in a very light boat to stay on a little island distant from us a quarter of a league; he himself remaining a very long time, expressing himself by signs and expressures of various fanciful ideas, examining all the equipments [Rm. all the apparatus and furniture of the ship], asking especially their purpose, imitating our manners [Rm. he also took pleasure in seeing our clothes], tasting our foods, then parted from us amicably. And one time, our people remaining two or three days on a little island only to visit it as things were then, our people came with seven or eight of his attendants, watching our operations, asking many times if we wished to remain there for a long time, offering us his every help. Then, shooting with the bow, rashing, he performed with his attendants various games to give us amusement.

"Many times we were from five to six leagues inland where we found as pleasing as it is possible to express, adapted to every kind of cultivation,—grain, wine, oil. Because in that place the fields are from XXV to XXX leagues wide [F. broad], open and devoid of any impediment of trees, of such fertility that any seed in them would produce the best crops. Entering then into the woods, all of which are penetrable by an army of any size in any way whatsoever. We passed through oak forests, ashes, cypresses, and trees which are their principal arms. Whose arrows are wrought with great beauty, placing at the end, instead of iron, emery, Jasper, hard marble, and other sharp stones, which they used instead of iron in cutting trees, making their boats from a single trunk of a tree, hollowed with wonderful skill, in which from fourteen to XV men [F. and Rm. 10 and 12 men] may go comfortably; the oar short, broad at the end, worked solely with the strength of the arms at sea without any peril with as much speed as pleases them.

"Going further [See Italian text. Rm. omits], we saw their habitations, circular in form, of XIII to XV pages [F. and Rm. 10 to 12 pages] compass, made from semi-circles of wood [i.e., arched saplings, bent in the form of an arrow] separated one from the other, without system of architecture, covered with mats of straw ingeniously worked, which protect them from rain and wind. There is no doubt that if they had the perfection of methods [Rm. the system of building and the perfection which we have, they would build magnificent edifices [Rm. grand and superb edifices], for all the maritime coast is full of blue rocks [See Italian text], crystals and alabaster; and for such cause is full of ports and shelters for ships [F. shelters for animals. Rm. for ships]. They change said houses [F. they change said things. Rm. they transport the said houses] from one place to another according to the fertility of the site and the season in which they live. Carrying away [F. experience of the site and the season. Having lived in that (place) they carry away] only the mats, immediately they have other habitations made. There live in each a father and family to a very large number, that is to say, some we saw XXV and XXX souls. Their food is like that of the others of pulse (which they produce with more system of culture than the others, observing the full moon, the rising of the Pleiades [F. Inade. Rm. some stars], and many customs derived from the ancients), also of the chase and fish. They live a long time and rarely become ill; if they are oppressed with wounds [F. sign of omission], without crying [Rm. with any infirmity without physician] they cure themselves by themselves with fire, their end being old age. We judge they are very companionable and charitable toward their neighbours, making great lamentations in their deaths, so that in the grief of them all there is no less. The relatives, one with another, at the end of their life use the Sicilian lamentation [Rm. omits "Sicilian"], mingled with singing lasting a long time. This is as much as we were able to learn about them.

The town is situated in the parallel of Rome, in forty and two-thirds degrees [F. and Rm. parallel of Rome in forty-one and two-thirds degrees], but somewhat colder on account of chance and not on account of nature, as I will narrate to Your Majesty in another part, describing at present the situation of said port. The shore of said land runs from west to east. The mouth of the port (which on account of its beauty we called "Refuge") looks toward the south, half a league wide, after entering which between east and north it extends XII leagues, where, widening itself, it makes an ample [F. very ample] bay of about XX leagues in circuit. In which are five little islands of much fertility and beauty, full of high and spires of beautiful trees, in which there are several and others, in which inlands any number of fleet [Rm. any huge armada], without fear of tempest or other impediment of fortune, could rest securely [F. secure]. Turning thence toward the south to the entrance of the port, on one side and the other are very charming hills with many brooks, which from the height, to the sea discharge clear waters.

"In the midst of the mouth is found a rock of petra viva produced by nature, adapted for the building [on it] of any desired engine or bulwark for its protection [Rm. fortress for protection] (which with bounding the nature of the rocks and on account of the family of a gentleman we called "La Casa de la Punta") on which said height at said mouth of the port is a promontory which we called "Jesse Promontory".

"Being supplied with our every necessity, the 6th day [Rm. 5th day] of May we departed from said port, following the shore, never losing sight of the land. We sailed one hundred and fifty leagues (within which space we found shoals which extend from the continent into the sea green and others, are over 3 feet of water; on account of which great danger in navigating, we survived with difficulty and baptized it "Arondelli [the shoals off Cape Cod]") finding it of the same nature and somewhat higher with some mountains (with a high promontory which we named "Pallavisino") which all indicated minerals. We did not stop there, because the favorableness of the weather served us in sailing along the coast [Rm. omits "in sailing along the coast"]; we think it must conform to the other [people]. The shore ran to the east.

"Within the space of fifty leagues, holding more to the north, we found a high land full of very thick forests, the trees of which were pines, cypress [F. and Rm. cypresses] and such as grow in cold regions. The people all different from the others, and as much as those passed were of kind manners, these were full of uncourtesy [F. rusticity] and vices, so barbarous [F. faces so barbarous] that we were never able, with howsoever many signs we made them, to have any intercourse with them. They dress in the skins of bear, lynxes, sea-wolves, and other animals. The food, according to that which we were able to learn through going many times to their habitations, we think is of the chase, fish and some products which belong to a species of roots which the ground yields by its own self. They do not have pulse, nor did we see any signs of cultivation, nor would the ground, on account of its sterility, be adapted to produce fruit or any grain. If, trading [F. refusing] at any time with them, we desired their things, they came to the shore of the sea upon some rock where it was very steep, and— we remaining in the small boat—with a cord let down to us what they wished to give, continually crying on land that we should not approach, giving [F. demanding] quickly the barter, not taking in exchange for it except knives, hooks [See Italian text] for fishing, and sharp metal. They had no regard for courtesy, and when they had [Rm. we had] nothing more to exchange, departing from them the men made at all the barter, contempt and shame [F. immodesty] which any brute creature [Rm. any inhuman and discourteous creature [such as showing the . . . and bawling]) could make. Contrary to their wish, XXX of our armed men were inland two and three leagues (they are in 45°), and when we descended to the shore they shot at us with their bows, sending forth the greatest cries, then fled into the woods. We do not know any thing of any considerable value in this land except the very great forests, with some hills which possibly have some metal, because on many [boats] we saw "pates-nosters" of copper in the ears.

"We turned to the continent both east and west and north, which we found very beautiful, open and bare of forests, with high mountains back inland, growing smaller toward the shore of the sea. In fifty leagues we discovered XXXII islands (among which we called the three larger "The Three Daughters of Nature"), all near to the continent, small and pleasing appearance, high, following the curving [F. greenness. Rm. many turns of the land, among which were formed most beautiful ports and channels, as are formed in the Adriatic Gulf, in the Illyrias [Rm. in the Adriatic Gulf in Slavonia] and Dalmatia. We had no knowledge of the peoples and think they were [F. they stand], like the others, devoid [Rm. omits "devoid"] of morals and culture.

"Navigating between east-south-east and north-north-east, in the space of CL leagues we came near the land which the Brionis found in the past [See Italian text, which stands in fifty degrees, and having consumed all our naval stores and victuals, having discovered six hundred and one leagues, and after of any size [F. and Rm. of new land, furnishing ourselves with water and wood, we decided to turn toward France.

"How much religion these peoples whom we have found have, we were not able to learn, through lack of language, either by signs or by gestures. We could only learn the manner of their sacrifices we know a first cause or author [F. nor know one by one cause and author], nor worship the sky, stars, sun or moon or other planets nor have any species of idolatry, nor did we learn that they make sacrifice or other prayers; nor that their people had temples or sacrifices for prayer.

"We think they have not any creed and live in entire freedom [F. in this freedom, and everything proceeds from ignorance, for they are very easy to persuade, and did with such enthusiasm
"I hope in a short time we shall have (we ourselves) the utmost certainty (for the benefit of posterity) of it."

"On the other hand, we, in this voyage, made by order of Your Majesty beyond 92 degrees, etc., from said meridian toward the west to the land we first found in 34 degrees (land near Temis-titas), navigated 500 leagues between east and north and almost 400 leagues to the east uninterruptedly along the shore [See Italian text] of the land, attaining to 54 degrees [F. 50 degrees], leaving the land that the Lusitanians (that is, Bucalain, so called from a fish) found a long time ago, which they viewed further north as far as the Arctic circle leaving the end unknown. Therefore the northern latitude joined with the southern, that is, 54 degrees with 66 degrees, make 120 degrees, more latitude than Africa and Europe contain, because joining the extremity of Europe, which the limits of Norway [See Italian text] form, [and] which stand in 71 degrees, with the extremity of Africa, which is the Promontory [F. promontory of the Cape] of Good Hope in 35 degrees, makes only 66 degrees, and if the terrestrial area of said land corresponds in extent to the seashore, there is no doubt it exceeds Asia in size.

"In such way we find the globe of the Earth much larger than the ancients have held and contrary to the Mathematicians [See Italian text], who have considered that relatively to the water it [the land] was smaller, which we have found by experience to be the reverse.

"And as for the corporeal area [F. for the air] of space, we judge there cannot be less land than water, as I hope on a better occasion by further reasoning to make clear and proven [F. I hope on a better occasion with further reasoning to experiment and demonstrated to Your Majesty.

"All this land or New World which above I have described is connected together, not adjoining Asia nor Africa [F. adjoining Asia and Africa] (which I know to a certainty), it may join Europe by Norway [See Italian text] and Russia; which would be false according to the ancients, who declare almost all the north [See Italian text] from the promontory of the Cimbri to have been navigated to the east, going around as far as the Caspian Sea [F. going around about the Caspian Sea. C. Casiano Sea itself] they affirm. It would therefore remain included between two seas [F. alone included between two seas situated], between the Eastern and the Western, and that, accordingly (secondo,) [F. and those two] shuts off [C. guides] one from the other; because beyond 54 degrees from the equator toward the south it [the new land] extends toward the east for a long distance, and from the north [See Italian text] passing 66 degrees it continues, turning toward the east, reaching as far as 70 degrees.

"I hope we shall have [F. we shall have soon] better assurance of this, with the aid of Your Majesty, whom God Almighty proper in everlasting glory, that we may see the perfect end of this our consanguineous, and that the clear word [See Italian text] of the evangelist may be accomplished; their sound has gone out into all the earth, etc.

In April a council convened at Badajas to determine whether the Moluccas were on the Spanish or the Portuguese side of the line of demarcation, and to consider the probability of finding a strait north of Florida by which they might be reached. The congress broke up on May 31, having accomplished nothing in the way of an agreement between the powers.—Navarrete, Collection de los viajes y descubrimientos que hicieron por mar los Españoles desde fines del siglo XV, Vol. IV; Winsor, Nav. & Crit. Extrem Gomez, a Portuguese pilot of the Casa de Contratacion of Seville, under orders from Charles V of Spain, sailed from Coroua, in a caravel of 20 tons, probably toward the close of the year 1524, and in the winter or early spring of 1525 cruised along the east coast of North America, and probably sighted Cape Cod and possibly Sandy Hook, although there is no definite information on which to base a positive assumption in this connection. Un-

Fortunately, we have only very incomplete knowledge of this voyage, as the original journal, which we know Gomez, soon after his return, handed to the king at Toledo, is lost.

The most ancient data concerning his voyage is found in Oviedo’s Historia General, vol. II., published at Seville in 1526, and also in the work of Harrisse, B. A. Y., No. 119. Oviedo here tells us that Gomez “went to the northern parts, where he discovered an extensive country, which is a continuation of the one called the Baccalao, and continued westward, reaching 46° and 47° more or less. He thought that that country several Indians, who are at present in this city.” (Seville).

In his Historia General, published in 1535, the limit reached by Gomez is changed without explanation to 42° 30′. Peter Martyr adds the information that Gomez “sailed from Cuzoa to Cuba, thence to Florida, and, navigating only in the daytime to avoid shoals and reefs, steered northward as far as the 44° Latitude. From this point he returned to Spain with a cargo of kidnapped Indians to be sold as slaves.”

In the Itinario, written in 1580 by Alonso de Santa Cruz, who must have known Gomez personally in Spain, we are told that Gomez was absent ten months, “in search of and to discover Cathay . . . as well as the passage or strait so much desired, and leading to the sea commonly called the South Sea,” also that “he discovered on that coast a great many islands near the continent and particularly a very large and deep river, which he called Deer River . . . He sailed up the river for a considerable distance, thinking that it was the strait which he desired to discover, but ascertained instead that it was a grand river with a very great flow of water, from which he inferred that it belonged to the continent of immense size which is there. And although firmly believing in the existence of the aforesaid canal or passage, close to the Codfish Continent [Baccalao] and the country called Labrador, he was also convinced of the im possibility of proving it experimentally, as the obstacles arising from the cold temperature of the neighboring regions would prevent the passage from being used. This opinion and plea was deemed sufficient to prevent in the future any further attempt to effect the object. . . . The country is quite temperate, containing many trees, such as oak, birch, oaks, wild vines with grapes of great quantity, and many plants and herbs like those of Spain. . . . Passing beyond those islands and that river, westward, near the coast, there are many islands, all deserted and poor, which were discovered by the licentiate Ayllon . . . All those islands are of 43° and 44° . . .”

We learn further from the Itinario that, “Passing beyond the islands of the Eleven Thousand Virgins, towards the sea, there is a large bay, called ‘the bay of the Britons.’. . . Passing the bay, more towards the west, and close to a point of land named Cape Breton the [coast] begins to extend towards an island which is east and west, called ‘Saint Joan,’ 56 leagues long by 20 leagues wide. The island extends from 46° to 48°.” This was probably Cape Breton Island.

It will be noticed that the order of the narrative here, as well as in most of the other sources quoted, seems to indicate a voyage from north to south, which is the interpretation accepted by Harrisse and most other modern historians. It seems, however, to the author, that sufficient importance has not been given to the fact that Gomez sailed for America during the winter season, from which fact it appears much more natural to suppose that he would have chosen to begin his explorations in the south,—an interpretation which, it will be noted, is supported by more than one statement of the sources quoted.

The results of Gomez’ explorations appeared for the first time on the planisphere of Mantua, also styled the Castigliani Map, probably completed toward the close of 1525 (see C. P. S. 7 and 8, Vol. II.) on the anonymous Weimser map of 1527 (C. P. 9, Vol. II.); the Oviedo maps of 1529 (C. P. 10, Vol. II.), and the Peter Martyr map of 1535 (C. P. 7, Vol. II.). They also appear on a map which accompanies an early manuscript of the Itinario of Alonso de Santa Cruz, a work written in 1560, but not published until 1708, by F. von Wiessner at Innsbruck. This map is reproduced and described by the author in the Discovery of North America, p. 241. See also the Terra Nova, p. 87 et seq. This map includes a much less extensive area than the others mentioned, extending from 58° to 45°, or from the Chesapeake to Nova Scotia.

A comparison of these maps with those containing the discoveries of Verrazzano shows that the explorations of these two pioneers together form a complete whole, the combination constituting a fairly accurate survey of the east coast of North America from the sea to Nova Scotia.

For further discussion of Gomez’ explorations, as shown on these and other maps of the Gomez type, see Vol. II, Cartography, page 18 et seq., and authorities there cited.

The explanation of the principal difference between the Verrazzano type and the Gomez type perhaps lies in the fact that Gomez, coming from the north, and tacking along the coast, was accompanied by a Cape Cod, which he, therefore, very distinctly noted, whereas Verrazzano, approaching from the south, evidently kept off shore, and, therefore, missed the cape itself, although he clearly records, under the name "Aremelline sittes," the extensive shoals lying to the south and east of it. A glance at the modern map shows that the cape is not nearly so prominent when approached from the south as from the north. That Gomez apparently gives no exact information regarding the coast southwest of Cape Cod may be explained by supposing that he feared the shoals, which must have been clearly visible as he rounded the Cape, and therefore, having first stood well out to sea, laid a straight course for Cape Hatteras.

Early in this year, Ayllon, in order to preserve his rights under the royal cédula granted him on June 12, 1525, and extended on March 23, 1524, to cover the year 1525, dispatched two caravels under Pedro de Quexos to that land, which his expedition of 1525-26 had visited. Quexos succeeded in regaining the good will of the natives, and explored the coast for a distance of 250 leagues, setting up stone crosses bearing the name of Charles V and the date of taking possession.—Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., II: 240, and authorities there cited.

Ayllon himself sails, with three ships and 600 colonists of both sexes, from Puerto de la Plata. He reached the coast in about 33° 40′ N. L., where he lost his largest vessel, which he replaced by a "gavarna," the first recorded instance of ship building our coast, and then sailed northward until he came to Guanaappe. There he started the settlement of San Miguel where the English in the next century founded Jamestown. Before the colonists were housed, winter came on and sickness broke out. Ayllon died on Oct. 18. The others decided to return to St. Domingo, but only about 150 succeeded in reaching home.—Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., II: 240 et seq., and sources there cited; Harrisse, Disq. of N. Am., 159 and seq.

In this year, the sack of Rome took place. This event is sometimes given as marking the end of the Renaissance.

In this year, Gines Navarro was told by John Rut that, while fishing off the Banks of Newfoundland, he had seen more than 50 Spanish, French, and Portuguese fishing vessels.—MS. cited by Navarrete, in Harrisse, Terra-Nueva, LV.

The so-called "Veman-Spanish Map" (C. P. 9, and pp. 18, 152, Vol. II; Stevenson No. 9) is made.

The Maggido Map (C. P. 12, Vol. II., and 13, 153; Stevenson No. 10) bears this date.

In this year, the Riberro Maps (C. P. 10, Vol. II., and 12, 1531 Stevenson No. 11); and Girolamo Verrazzano’s Map (C. P. 13, Vol. II., and 15, 1533 Stevenson No. 12) were made.

Jacques Cartier, with two ships, sets out from the port of St. Malo on his first voyage to America. On May 10, he reached Newfoundland, and from then until Aug. 15, he explored the Gulf and the coast as far north as Labrador, discovering the Straits of Belle Isle, but he failed to discover the mouth of the St. Lawrence River. At Gaspe Bay he met the Iroquois Indians, and fortified the harbour of St. Croix. He returned to St. Malo on July 6, 1536.—Hakluyt, Principal Navigations (London, 1600), III: 201-11.

With three ships, the "Great Hermina," the "Little Hermina," and the "Merimillon," given to him by Francis I, Cartier starts from St. Malo on his second voyage to the new world. On this trip he discovered and explored the St. Lawrence from its mouth to Hochelaga, made friends with the Indians, and fortified the harbour of Ste. Croix. He returned to St. Malo on July 6, 1536.—Hakluyt, Principal Navigations (London, 1600), III: 212-32.

Three manuscript versions of the narrative are preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale.

— Some time shortly after May 20, 1535, Queen Isabella of Portugal called upon Fernando Columbus to cause the immediate completion of the revision of the padron real, ordered by Charles V in 1526. Probably this was not actually accomplished until the following year, when a junta of pilots and cosmographers met at Seville for the purpose of composing a very accurate sea-chart, which should be the model from which all maps for navigating the Indies should in future be copied, as we are told by Alonso de Santa Cruz, in his Historia. The padron general of Alonso de Chaves was probably the direct result of this junta. Unfortunately, this important map has been lost, and was until quite recently known to us only by the references to it found in Oviedo's Historia de las Indias, written probably in 1537, but not published until the nineteenth century. In this work, Oviedo gives a description of the coast, following Chaves' map, as he expresses states. Although more or less unsuccessful attempts have been made, by Kohli, De Costa, and others, to reconstruct from this description the outline of the North-East Coast, no really serious effort has yet been made to compare Oviedo's text with existing maps, or rather, no thorough search has been made for a map or maps which might correspond with that text. Recently, however, the discovery in Florence by Dr. Wieder of the world-chart drawn by Lopo Homem in 1534 (C. Pl. xi, Vol.II), and in Madrid of a hitherto unknown manuscript by Chaves himself, containing a very complete description of the American coast, has thrown new light on the subject, and, from a comparison of these new documents with Oviedo's text, it is now possible, for the first time, to judge, with much precision, how our coast must have appeared on Chaves' lost map. This comparison is shown in tabulated form in Vol. II, following p. 40. See also p. 23 et seq.

Hernando de Soto sails from San Lucas, Spain, with about 600 men, five ships, two canoës, and two pinasses. He reached Cuba safely; in May, he sailed from Havana. On May 25, he arrived at a bay on the Florida coast, to which he gave the same name as the one the Jolo Indians had named. This was the bay now known as Tampa Bay. This was the first landfall of a Spanish expedition on the coast of the United States. On this same expedition were Domingo Martin, Juan de la Cosa, Juan de la Cueva, and José de Mendoza, the last named remaining in the country and becoming the first governor of Florida. Soto crossed the Apalachicola River, and in December, 1539, he was drowned in a skirmish with the Chickasaw Indians.

Esparisi Satou; on the 30th, he landed his army, and, on June 1, took possession of the country. Then he began his long and toilsome journey in search of a land rich in gold and precious stones. He passed through what is now the states of Florida, Georgia, the Carolinas, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, fighting with the Indians every step of the way, and losing half his men. In June, 1541, he crossed the Mississippi River at the lowest Chickasaw bluffs, and marched northward to Little Prairie. Despairing of finding his El Dorado in that direction, De Soto finally turned south, and then south-west and, on Sept. 1, 1541, reached Coliqua. Here the expedition reconquered the Mississippi and began to march south-east, arriving at a town at the mouth of the Red River on April 17, 1542. At this place De Soto fell ill of fever, died on May 21, and was buried in the Mississippi.—Wise, New, & Crit. Hist. of Am., II: 244-53, 588-92, 294-95, and authorities there cited.

In 1541, the prospect of the settlement of Canada under the French gave such a stimulus to merchants that, in January and February, 1541, no less than 60 ships went from France to wait for cod off the Banks. In 1541, 1544, and 1545 half hall was sustained, and during the months of January and February about two ships left every day from Havre, Rouen, Dieppe, and Honfleur.—Gosselin, Documents authentiques et inédits pour servir à l'histoire de la marine Normande et du commerce Rouennais, pendant les XVIe et XVIIe siècles (Rouen, 1850).

Cartier starts on his third voyage to America. He reached Ste. Croix on Aug. 23, soon after started a fort four leagues above it, at Charlesbourg Royal, and then continued his ascent of the river. He stayed awhile at Hochelaga, then went on to the Lachine Rapids and Suffet de St. Louis, and finally returned to the fort, where he spent the winter of 1541-2. In the summer of 1542, Cartier returned to France.—Hakluyt, Principal Navigations (London, 1600), III: 212-44.

Jean Alleonse de Saintonge sails from Honfleur as pilot to Aug. Roberval on a voyage to Canada. On this voyage, or possibly on an earlier one which we have no record of, he claimed to have explored the Atlantic coast from Labrador to Florida, and to have made several maps and sketches of the region. The original manuscript, entitled "Cosmographie avec espée et regime du Soleil et du Nord en notre langue françois," signed by Alleonse, and dated 24 May, 1544, is in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris. An abridgment of this manuscript was first printed in 1569, with the title Les Voyages aventurées du Capitaine Jean Alleonse, Saintonges. An account of this voyage is also found in Hakluyt's Principal Navigations (1590-1600), and in Champlain (1613 ed.).

The following account of that part of the voyage of Saintonge, which takes the North-East Coast is taken from the printed text (translated of the "Cosmographie," published and annotated by George Musset, Paris, 1801, and entitled La Cosmographie... par Jean Fonteneau, dit Alleonse de Saintonge, Capitaine-pilote de François 1er...; it contains several maps.

After leaving Canada, the first feature of the coast that can, with reasonable assurance, be identified is the Penobscot. From this point the narrative proceeds as follows:

"From the river Norumbega (probably the Penobscot) the coast turns to the W.S.W., full 200 or more leagues, to a great bay which runs up into the land about 20 leagues and is fully 29 leagues wide, and within this bay there are four islands, joined one to the other (possibly the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound, and the large islands lying between it and Cape Cod)."

"The entrance to the bay is in about 43° [sic], and the said islands are in the neighbourhood of 39°. I did not see the said [island] of this bay, and do not know whether it passes beyond. The water rushes out as does the river of Norumbega. This entire coast is peopled but I did not communicate with them, and do not know what law they follow. . . . [Although at this point no mention is made of any prominent cape, the manuscript contains an earlier reference to "(Cape de la Françoise,"") 10 leagues SW. of "Cape de Norumbega" (Cape Sable?), which should probably be identified as Cape Cod."

"From the said bay the coast turns to the W.S.W. [sic], about 46 leagues, and here there is a great river of fresh water [Hudson River—], and there is at its entrance a sandy island [Shadys Hook—] which island is near the 49th [sic] degree.

"From this river the coast turns N.E. S.S.W., a quarter East and Aug. 15 N.W. 60 leagues, and here is a cape which juts out into the sea full 56 leagues [Cape Henlopen as part of the Acacome peninsula, etc.]. The cape is in about 36° latitude, and is high, with a white cliff [a conspicuous object on entering Delaware Bay]; and hence here the coast turns to the W.N.W. [sic], 46 leagues, as far as a large river full 20 leagues [sic] in width [Chesapeake Bay?—]. It has many reefs at its entrance, which is in river about 37°. I know not whether this river runs far into the main. The surrounding land is very low . . . and very beautiful, with fine trees, which seem to be chestnuts and cedars. Here the coast turns to the S.W., a quarter west, about 50 leagues; and here there is a cape [Cape Hatteras?—], and behind it a great gulf [Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds—]. I don't know how far it enters into the main. At its entrance there are several reefs. Said cape is in about 36°.

From here I was quite a day and a half with the cape in the west without seeing land until reaching 35°. And I estimate sailing about 35 leagues before I reached the coast again.

"And from this point the coast turns toward Florida, N.N.E. and S.S.W., and the distance from here to Florida may be 100 or 150 leagues, the whole being straight . . ., and along that entire stretch of shore there are islands large and small. I was unable to make out any rivers. The Cape of Florida is in about 25°, and is more than 25 leagues wide, and in front of it are several islands of sand, and there is a reef that juts out into the sea two or three leagues from the main-land, and is no broader at one end than at the other, and extends more than 20 leagues along the shore in a N.N.E. and S.S.W. direction; and between the land and the reef there seemed to be good sailing, but I could find no good anchorage. At the end of this reef there is a cape, and a good port . . . The said cape is in 25°, and is at the N.N.E. of Florida, a fine country, . . . Along this whole coast from N.N.E. to S.S.W., as far as Florida, one dare not approach the shore nearer than 3 leagues because of the reefs, etc."

Although the above description contains many inaccuracies in latitudes, distances, and data, and several irreconcilable statements, nevertheless it constitutes, in the main, a fair description of the North-East Coast, and is, I believe, based on personal observations, notwithstanding Haringue's circumstantial evidence to the contrary (see his Terre-Neuve, 155 and seq.).

Mary was crowned on Oct. 11, and reigned until 1558.

The first collection, in English, of accounts of the various voyages to America was published at London in this year, by Richard Eden. The book was called The Decades of the Newe World or West

India.—Church Catalogue, No. 101. It was a translation from

Peter Martyr's De Orbe Novo . . . Decades, of 1530—ibid., No. 62. André Thevet, a Franciscan monk, sails from Havre to England by the Committee sent out by Admiral Coligny to Brazil under the command of Villegeagus. The French made a settlement, in November, near the River Ganauba, but Thevet remained with the colony only about ten weeks, leaving on his homeward voyage, Jan. 31, 1556. He claimed to have coasted, on this voyage, along the entire eastern shore of the United States—Thevet, Les Singulari-tes de la France antarctique autonome Américques & plusieurs terres & îles découvertes de notre temps (Paris, 1558) Thevet, La cosmographie universelle d'André Thevet, cosmographe de roy (Paris, 1572). The following interesting extract (translated) is taken from his Cosmographie, reprinted by Kohl, who has added the explanations in parentheses:

"Having left La Florida on the left hand, with all its islands, guls, and capes, a river presents itself, which is one of the finest rivers in the whole world, which we call Norumbegue, and the aborigines 'Agomye,' and which is marked on some marine charts as the Grand River (meaning Penobscot Bay). Several other beautiful rivers enter into it; and upon its banks the French formerly erected a little fort about ten or twelve leagues from its mouth, which was surrounded by fresh-water, and this place was named the Fort of Norumbegue. "Some pilots would make me believe, that this country (Norum-begue) is the proper country of Canada. But I told them that this was far from the truth, since this country lies in 43° N., and that of Canada in 50 or 52°. Before you enter the said river appears an island (Fox Island) surrounded by eight small isles, which are near the country of the green mountains (Camden Hills), and to the Cape of the islets (Cabo de muchas islas). From there you sail all along unto the mouth of the river, which is dangerous from the great number of thick and high rocks; and its entrance is wonderfully large. About three leagues into the river, an island presents itself to you, that may have four leagues in circumference (Long Island, now Islesboro), inhabited only by some fishermen and birds of different sorts, which island they call 'Alayascun,' because it has the form of a man's arm, which they call so. Its greatest length is from north to south. It would be very easy to plant on this island, and build a fortress on it to keep in check the whole surrounding country. Having landed and put our feet on the adjacent country, we perceived a great mass of people coming down upon us from all sides in such numbers, that you might have supposed them to have been a flight of starlings. Those which marched first, were the men which they called 'Anuquassas;' after them, the women, which they called 'Peragueuanas,' then the 'Adegestas,' being the children, and last were the girls, called 'Anuissistas:' And all these people were clothed in skins of wild animals, which they call 'Rabatara.' Now considering their aspect and manner of proceeding, we mistrusted them, and we wished to lay hands upon them. But they, perceiving our fear, lifted their hands into the air, making signs that we should not mistrust them; and for making us still more sure, they sent to our vessel some of their principal men, which brought us provisions. In recom pense of this, we gave them a few trinkets of a low price, by which they were highly pleased. The next morning I, with some others, was commissioned to meet them, and to know whether they would be inclined to assist us with more victuals, of which we were very much in need. But having entered into the house, which they call 'Canoque,' of a cerant little town of theirs, which they called 'Havannah;' we saw several killed animals hanging on the beams of the house, which he had prepared (as he assured us) to send to us. This chief gave us a very hearty welcome, and to show us his affection, he ordered to kindle a fire, which they call 'Arresa,' on which the meat was to be put and fish, to be roasted. Upon this some rogues came in to bring to the king the heads of six of their men, which they had wounded and massacred, which terrified us, fearing that they might treat us in the same way. But toward evening we secretly retired to our ship without holding good-by to our host. At this he was very much irritated, and came to us the next morning accompanied by three of his children, showing a mournful countenance, but at the thought that we had been diseatisfied with him; and he said in his languages: 'Carigno, Carigno Canoy danga adagria' (that is, let us go let us go on land: my friend and brother); 'Cosquena Aue Coasacen Kazacenn' (come to drink and eat, what we

Seeing the good affection and will of this old man, some twenty of us went again on land, every one of us with his arms; and then we went to his lodgings, where we were treated, and presented with what he possessed. And meanwhile great numbers of people arrived, admiring us and offering themselves to give us pleasure, saying that they were our friends. Late in the evening, when we were willing to retire and to take leave of the company with actions of gratitude, they would not give us leave. Men, women, children, all entreated us zealously to stay with them, crying out these words: "Cazigno agyada hoa" (my friends, do not start from here; you shall sleep this night with us). But they could not harangue so well as to persuade us to sleep with them. And so we retired to our vessel; and having remained in this place five full days, we weighed anchor, parting from them with a marvellous contentment of both sides, and went out to the open sea.—Kohl, Discovery of North Am., 416-19. If the "Grand River," to which Thetivet refers, is the Penobscot, as Kohl believed, and not the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and if Thetivet is right in regard to the fort, this must have been the first settlement of Europeans in New England since the Norsemen. Harrisse, however, and other modern critics, place it nearer the western part of the Great Lakes.

With four ships, John Hawkins sets out from Plymouth on a voyage to the West Indies and America. After spending some time in Guinea and the West Indies, carrying on the slave-trade, he began to explore the coast of Florida in the summer of 1565. He came to the relief of Laudonnière's struggling colonists on the "river of May," and left them a ship in which they might return to France. Hakluyt records, from the account written by "John Sparkle the Younger," who accompanied Hawkins, that on the Florida coast they anchored every night, and in the day time, in the ship's pinnace, sailed along the shore, and went into every creek. In this case they were particularly searching for good fresh water, but the specific recital of the fact that they anchored at night indicates that this was not the usual custom, and therefore helps to explain how so often important landmarks were passed by unseen, and were therefore not recorded in the journals or on the maps.

On July 25, Hawkins left Florida, and, probably keeping at no great distance from the coast, sailed north to Newfoundland, which he reached on Aug. 25. Thence he continued his journey homeward, and arrived in England on Sept. 20.—Hakluyt, Principal Navigations (London, 1589), 525-45.

A sentence of the Inquisition condemns to death, as heretics, all but a few of the inhabitants of The Netherlands.—Motley, Rise of the Dutch Republic, II: 158.

David Ingram, who, with two companions, had been set on shore on the northern coast of the Gulf of Mexico by Sir John Hawkins, in the autumn of this year, claimed, in an account of his adventures, reported "unto Sr. Fraunces Wasingham Kt. . . ." in 1582, and first printed by Hakluyt in 1589, to have traversed the south, central, and eastern portions of what is now the United States, and to have reached the head of a river called Gartuda, which is now the Mississippi. Between Cape Breton and Cape Sable, they made their repair to the sea-side, and there found a French Captaine named Monseur Charpeny, who took them into his shippe and brought them unto Newhaven, & from thence they were transported into England, Anno Dom. 1589, &c. In the course of his travels, which extended over a period of about twelve months, of which about seven were spent north of the "river of May," "in which time (as the said Ingram thinketh) he travelled by land two thousand miles at the least . . . towards the North, found the maine sea [Great Lakes?] upon the Northside of America, and travailed in the sight thereof the space of two whole dayes, where the people signified unto him, that they had seen shippe on that coast, and did draw upon the ground the shape and figure of shippes and of their sailes and rigges, Which thing especially proueth the passage of the Northwest, and is agreeable to the experience of Vaquers de Coronado, who found a shipe of China or Cattia upon the Northwest of America."

One of several contemporary manuscript accounts of this journey is preserved in the British Museum (Sloane MS. No. 1447), and is printed in Weston, Documents connected with the history of South Carolina (London, 1876). The narrative as printed by Hakluyt in 1589 (from which version the above extracts are taken), was omitted from his 1599-1600 publication, probably because of its dubious veracity, as we are told by Purchas, IV: 1179. This date is found on a beautifully executed small world map in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris which map is signed by Jean Cousin, a well known cartographer of Dieppe. The map is remarkable for its unusual representation of the coast in the neighbourhood of the Hudson River, which is shown in greater detail and more accurately than on any other map of the period. This representation proves, without question, that the author, or the voyager whose map or notes the author used, not only penetrated into the inner harbour of New York, but actually sailed around Staten Island, and perhaps through Long Island Sound, which seems to be laid down on this very interesting map, which is reproduced in Vol. II, C. Pls. 15 and 16, and described on pages 33 et seq., and 134.

Oct. 10 The Duke of Anjou (see 1584) arrives in the Netherlands.

In this year, Pope Gregory XIII reformed the calendar to conform to the true solar year. Ten days were dropped out of this year, October 5 becoming October 15. Leap year was removed from the calendar at the close of each century (except when it was a multiple of 400), thus gaining three days in 400 years, or 11 minutes in a year.

The Gregorian calendar was introduced into Spain, Portugal, and part of Italy, on the same day as at Rome (Oct. 5). It was accepted in France in December 1582, and in the Catholic states of Germany in 1586. In the various provinces and cities of the Netherlands, New Style was adopted at different times between 1582 and 1701. In the Protestant states of Germany, the Julian calendar was adhered to until 1700, when the dict of Regensburg decreed that the New Style he adopted. Denmark and Sweden also accepted it about 1700. In England, Scotland, and the American colonies, the Gregorian calendar was established by the parliamentary act of March 18, 1751 (g.v.), and went into effect Sept. 3, 1752 (g.v.). Ireland followed in 1788. Russia retained the Julian reckoning until 1918, when the revolutionary government adopted the New Style. From 1585 until the surrender of New Amsterdam to the English, in 1664, the Chronology follows the Gregorian Calendar, or "New Style." From the beginning of English rule in New York until 1752, when England adopted the Gregorian Calendar, "Old Style" is used. To avoid confusion, double dates are introduced during periods of transition (the year, being O.S. or N.S., or the lower, or denominator, N.S.), and also in connection with all English dates during the Dutch occupation of New Amsterdam, and all Dutch and other continental dates during the English occupation.

Richard Hakluyt wrote in this year his Discourse on Western Planting, the original manuscript of which he presented to Queen Elizabeth, probably at the request of Sir Walter Raleigh, who sought Elizabeth's assistance for his colonization schemes. Hakluyt, in twenty-one chapters, described the discoveries already made along the North-East Coast, and propounded the various reasons why England should establish colonies in America. The original manuscript is lost, but a duplicate contemporary copy, evidently in the hand of a scribe and probably made for Walsingham, has preserved for us its contents. This duplicate was found in the library of Sir Peter Thomson, after his death in 1770, and is now in the author's collection. It was printed, 1577, as Vol. II of Main Hist. The first three ships equipped by the general to search for a north-east passage to India sail from the Texel. They are commanded, respectively, by Willem Barendsz, Gerrit de Veer, and Jan Huysgen van Linschoten. After having reached the Wyagat Strait, the ships separated on July 21 and took different directions. The strait was open, but farther on the passage was so obstructed by ice that three commanders decided to return to the Wyagat. They met there on Aug. 15. On Aug. 18, they started on their homeward trip, arriving in the Texel on Sept. 16.—Versteeg, Manhattan in 1628, 57-88. The first printed account of this expedition is contained in Voyage, of Schip-Tvent van Jan Huysgen van Linschoten (1601), Church Catalogue, No. 324.

In this year, Gerrit Bicker Petersz., of Amsterdam, and Jan Cornelisz. Leyen, of Enckhuysen, under the patronage of the States of Holland, organized separate companies for the West India trade. 1598
— Perhaps the earliest reference to a possible sojourn of Europeans in the neighborhood of Manhattan is probably contained in a complaint addressed on Oct. 25, 1634, by the "Assembly of XIX" to the states-general, in relation to the representation of one Jacob Jacobsen Elvens, a trader, who, in April, 1633, came to the North River in the service of one William Klobery, an Englishman, with the ship "William," and, although refusing to exhibit "his Majesty's Instructions or Commission," made public claim that "said river and adjacent country were in, and of, the Domain of his Majesty of Great Britain." Although the complaint states that "the said river and adjacent countries had been discovered in the year 1609, at the cost of the East India Company," it adds: "...Likewise, that one or more little forts were built also under your High Mightinesses' chief jurisdiction, even before the year 1614, and supplied with people for the security of the said trade; Further, that, after these countries had passed into the hands of the incorporated West India Company, not only were the above named forts renewed and enlarged, but said Company purchased from the Indians, who were the indubitable owners thereof, the Island of the Manhattans, situate at the entrance of the said river, and there laid the foundation of a city."—N. T. Col. Doct., I: 93. This reference to an early fort on the North River is repeated, and the date 1598 assigned to the first frequenting of these parts, in a "Report and Advice on the original of New Netherland..." drawn up from documents and papers placed by commission of the Assembly of XIX, dated 12th Dec. 1644, in the hands of the General Board of Accouets. "...This report begins as follows—"New Netherland... extending from the South river lying in 41° degrees, to Cape Malabar, in the latitude of 41° degrees, was first frequented by the inhabitants of this country in the year 1598, and especially by those of the Greenland Company, but without making any fixed settlements, only as a shelter in the winter. For which purpose they erected on the North and South Rivers there two little forts against the incursions of the Indians. A charter was afterwards, on the 11th of October, 1614, granted by their High Mightinesses..."—Ibid., I: 149.

There is no proof, or even suggestion, that such a fort, even if built on the North River, was on Manhattan Island. No record has been found of a "Greenland Company" at so early a date as 1598. If such a company existed, it was probably composed of a small group of merchants who sent out expeditions to Greenland (probably Spitzbergen) prior to the organization of the Noordsche Compagnie in 1614. In this connection, the following statement is found in the Historie Der vermaerde Zee-en Koop-stads Enthuusias, by Geerardt Bracq, 2 ed. enl. ed. by Sebastiaen Centen (Hoorn, 1747), suppl. p. 192. "For some time there had been discussions regarding the formation of a Groenlandische Maatschappij (Greenland Company), and to that end various subscriptions had been made in Holland and Zealand. At last, in this year (1644), this company took its beginning under the name of the Noordsche Compagnie." It is also possible that there was some confusion in the minds of the authors of the report of 1644 between the North and South Rivers in New Netherland and the West and South Rivers mentioned by De Laet in his Nieuwe Wereld (1610), 567-68, in describ-

During this year, steps were taken to bring about the formation of the Dutch East India Company, the first of the great Dutch trading companies of the seventeenth century, which in less than fifty years built up a world empire comparable to the British Empire. Time and again, partly in response to the extraordinary expansion of Dutch commerce and navigation, which occurred in the very midst of the war with Spain, is explained partly by the geographical situation of The Netherlands and partly by the political conditions of the surrounding countries.

Situated midway between the Danish Sound and the Strait of Gibraltar, the Dutch people from an early date had carried on an extensive trade between the countries of northern and southern Europe. During the first years of the war with Spain, this trade suffered a serious setback, but with the destruction of the Spanish Armada, in 1588, the chief danger to Dutch shipping disappeared, and from that time trade began to revive.

The fall of Antwerp, in 1585, caused thousands of the ablest and most industrious citizens, among them such men as Usselincx, Plancius, De Moucheron, De Laet, Blommaert, and others, to emigrate to Holland, especially to Amsterdam. This large increase of population, which forced the city of Amsterdam twice within a decade, in 1585 and in 1593, to extend its walls, gave a fresh impetus to Dutch commercial enterprise. The Baltic trade soon rose to an unprecedented height, Dutch merchants applied themselves with energy to the development of the Muscovy trade; ships were built in Holland more cheaply and in greater number than anywhere else in the world, and to the ancient Scottish wool staple established at Veere was added the once famous wool staple of Antwerp, at first transferred to Middelburg, then moved to Delft, and finally located at Dordrecht. The king of Spain issued sudden orders to seize all Dutch vessels then found in Spanish and Portuguese harbours, and in 1598 all trade with the rebel provinces was formally forbidden. These measures resulted in much clandestine trade and forced Dutch merchants to seek out new routes of commerce. To obtain the indispensable salt for the herring fishery, which hitherto they had procured at Lisbon and Seutual, Dutch merchants sailed to the Cape Verde Islands. In 1593, ships from Enkhuizen visited Guinea, and soon after Zeeland traders began to make frequent voyages to Brazil. In 1590, the first Dutch ships were seen in the Mediterranean, and from that time on they became regular visitors, first in Italy, and then in the Levant, where, through the business connections of the Portuguese and Spanish Jews who had established themselves at Amsterdam in 1590 and 1601, the Dutch were soon mistress of the trade.

The extremely profitable commerce which Spain and Portugal (united from 1580 to 1640) carried on with the East Indies now turned the thoughts of Dutch traders to those distant parts. Hoping to find a shorter route than that around the Cape of Good Hope, which, while respecting the Spanish monopoly of that ancient route, would also lessen the danger of attack by Danish pirates, Dutch ship owners sent out a number of expeditions to seek a north-east passage. The results were discouraging, but soon another way was presented itself. After Cornelis de Houtman’s return from Lisbon (in 1598), Dutch merchants, in consultation with Petrus Plancius, organized the Compagnie van Verre (the Company of Distant Parts), which sent out four ships in 1595. Houtman, after a voyage of about a year, succeeded in reaching the coast of Batanam, on Java, by way of the Cape of Good Hope, on June 21, 1596 (some authorities say June 24), and the winter returned on September 1597. Immediately a number of similar companies were organized in various places of The Netherlands, and before the end of 1601, 15 fleets, with a total of 65 ships, had sailed to the East Indies. These companies engaged in a destructive competition with each other, and became evident that measures must be taken to combine them into some form of organization resembling a modern trust or cartel. Oldenbarnevelt took the initiative and the Dutch East India Company was the result. The charter of this company, which was granted on March 20, 1602, became the model for that of other companies first, that of the Northern Company, organized on January 27, 1614, and later that of the Dutch West India Company, chartered on June 3, 1621, all three of which companies have played a part in the discovery and settlement of Manhattan Island.—See chapters on “Handel en Nijverheid,” by Dr. H. Brugman, in Amsterdam in de Zeventiende Eeuw, vol. II; S. Muller, Ed. De Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Compagnies der seventiende Eeuw. In this year, Herrera published his Historia general de las hechaz de los Castellanos, the earliest work based on Spanish state documents, which, by an order of Charles V, dated Feb. 19, 1543, were preserved in the national archives at Simancas. This edition contained seven American maps.—Winrow, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., I: 1, 67, 213, 466, and authorities there cited; Sabín, No. 51, 539. Queen Elizabeth grants a charter to the English East India Company. This charter is for 15 years. It empowers the company to trade to all places in the East Indies unless claimed by other Christian nations, to buy land for factories, to make by-laws, etc.

For trading purposes, they carried clothing, hardware, and trinkets. The expedition was in no sense solely a voyage of discovery, one of its objects being to procure sassafras, in search of which Firing coasted in and out among the islands in the neighbourhood of 43°50', and at length anchored in a harbour on the south shore of Cape Cod Bay in 41°42', to which he gave the name Whitsono Harbour, which, although it lies in 41°, 45', in other respects exactly corresponds with Purchis's description). Here they erected a "small baricado" for shelter and protection. Seven weeks were spent gathering sassafras and experimenting with the soil, which they ploughed up and planted. On Aug. 8 or 9, they left "this excellent Haven" and returned to England, reaching there early in October.—Purchas His Pilgrimes, IV: 1654-56. This voyage of Firing stimulated another English awakening interest in New England. For his later voyage, see Aug. 12, 1606.

Apr. 3 : Queen Elizabeth died on March 24/April 5.

July : Sir Walter Raleigh, after impoverishing himself in unsuccessful efforts to add to his native kingdom an effective American plantation, was consigned, under an unjust judgment, to a lingering imprisonment in the Tower of London; which was followed, in 1618, by prison terms (moved 1621).—Brodehead, op. cit., 1: 9; citing Rymer, Federia, XVI: 516. He was proclaimed on Oct. 24, 1624, "King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland."

Jan. : The Hampton Court conference of prelates and Puritan discombers begins, for the purpose of effecting a union of the Church of England. The king resolving to make no concessions to the Puritans, it led to little besides the production (in 1611) of the King James version of the Bible.

Aug. : England makes a formal treaty with Spain, which resulted in time of the abandonment of the preceding expeditions which English mariners had so long carried on against the American possessions of their recent foe.—Brodehead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 9. 1605

— In this year, a settlement was made by the Spaniards at Santa Fe.—Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., VIII: 354, and authorities there cited.

Mar. : Capt. George Waymouth, during this period, explored the coast of New England. His expedition, which was fitted out at the expense of the Earl of Southampton and his brother-in-law, Lord Arundel, was intended for the coast of Maine. Sailing from the Downs, Waymouth struck the American coast near Nantucket, July whence, running northerly along the coast, he sailed for "sixty 18 miles the most useful and beneficial river of Sacadocel."

28 : After an absence of four months, Waymouth returned to England, having with him five natives, two or three of whom were immediately "settled upon" by Ferdinando Gorges, who afterward declared that "this accident must be acknowledged the means, under God, of putting on foot and giving life to all our plantations" (see Aug. 12, 1606). The account of this voyage is contained in A True Relation of the most prosperous voyage made this present year 1605 by Captain George Waymouth, in the Discovery of the Southland (London, 1605).—Brodehead, op. cit., I: 11.

Nov. : Guy Fawkes is discovered in the act of blowing up the House of Parliament, and the "Gunpowder Plot" is frustrated.

— In this year, John Smyth, a Separatist minister, and many of his congregation emigrated from Gainborough, Eng., to Amsterdam, because of persecution.—Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., III: 357 and authorities there cited.

King James, by patent, divides Virginia into two colonies, the southern, called "the first colony," being granted the privilege of occupying and governing a strip 100 miles long extending along the coast between the thirty-fourth and thirty-first degrees; he grants to the London Company; the northern, called "the second colony," lying between the thirty-eighth and the forty-fifth degrees, he grants to the Plymouth Company. In order to prevent collision between the two colonies, the charter expressly provides that the colony which shall be planted farther north than 44°30' has priority; and at least 100 miles from that of the prior establishment.—Hazard, Historical Collections, consisting of State Papers and other Authentic Documents, I: 51-52.

Cap. Henry Chaloung (Challons) is sent by Sir Ferdinand Gorges and others on a voyage of discovery to the north-New England coast, accompanied by two Indians who had been brought to England by Waymouth, and who had imparted to Gorges much information regarding that country, and especially its principal rivers. Soon after leaving the Canaries, Chaloung fell ill, and his ship was carried by the prevailing winds to St. John De Porterando. Shortly afterward, the ship and crew were captured by a Spanish fleet coming from Havana, and carried to Spain.

In October, Martin Firing was dispatched from Bristol by Popham to join Chaloung "where by his instructions he was assigned," but not finding him, after he had "sounded the coast above...", and had made a perfect discovery of all those Rivers and Harbours [of which] he was informed by his instructions, (the season of the year requiring his return) brings with him the most exact discovery of that Coast that ever came to my hands since, and indeed he was the best able to perform it of any I met withali to this present, which with his relation of the Country, wrought such an impression in the Lord Chichester Justice, and us all that were his associates, that (notwithstanding our first disaster) we set up our resolutions to follow it with effect, and that upon better grounds, for as yet, our authority was but in motion."—Ferdinando Gorges, "A Briefe Narration," etc., and "A Description of New England," in America Printtida in the Life (1659).

A very full account of Chaloung's voyage, written by John Stoneplan, pilot, is printed in Purchas His Pilgrimes, IV: 1831-37.

It is not clear how far south Firing's explorations on this voyage extended. His instructions provided that, after they had discovered the Main... as high as Cape Britton, they were to "bear it up to the Southward, as the Coast tended, till they found by the Natives they were near the place they were assigned unto...", possibly the Hudson, the Delaware, or Chesapeake Bay. Chaloung, on a voyage of exploration from Canada along the coast of New England, leaves "Port Fortune" [See plan in Champlain, 1613 ed. p. 152]... in 41 degrees & one third latitude, & some 12 or 13 leagues from Malebarre" (Naussett Harbour, or Pleasant Bay, on Cape Cod. See plan in Champlain, 1613 ed. p. 88.) From this point, he continued some six or seven leagues in sight of an island (which he named "Isle aux Coudes") where he stated he made "a very considerable appearance; evidently he at first took it for a part of the main land. On the 20th, having been driven back by a storm, he again left Port Fortune and skirted "the coast to the south-west about 12 leagues," to a small river and one difficult of approach because of shoals and rocks at its entrance. At this point, a strong and contrary wind caused him to turn toward the "water" (the open sea).

A careful comparison of the maps contained in the 1613 and 1614 editions of Champlain's Voyage with the modern map, taken in connection with the distances and directions noted in Champlain's several descriptions indicates that Champlain seems to indicate that Port Fortune was the modern Stage Harbor; that "la souponcresse" was perhaps Point Gammon, or possibly some island now submerged, such, for instance, as Bishop and Clerk's Island; and that the deep gulph which, on the map of 1612, marks the southern limit of his explorations, was in all probability Vineyard Sound, which presents a land-locked appearance from a point a few miles east of its entrance.

1607: William Uselton, who had already (in 1592) suggested a Dutch association to trade in the West Indies, now urges the immediate establishment of a West India Company modelled after the East India Company, which new company, however, did not materialize until June 3, 1621 (q.v.).—Brodehead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 23.

Colonists, under Capt. Newport, dispatched to America by the London Company, start the first permanent English settlement in the western hemisphere, with a settlement at Jamestown, Virginia. "The fourteenth day of [May] we landed all our men, which were set to work about the fortification [James Fort], and others some to watch and ward as it was convenient."—Observations by Major George Percy, 1607, printed in Tyler's Narr. of Virginia, 15.

The "Gift of God," under George Popham, and the "Mary and John," commanded by Raleigh Gilbert, the nephew of Sir Walter Raleigh, sail from Plymouth with 130 colonists to make a settlement on the Kennebec River. They arrived in August, and began their settlement at the mouth of the Sagadahoc. They named their fort "Saint George." In a short time, 50 houses were constructed, and a "pretie Barke" built—perhaps the second vessel constructed by Europeans in the territory now known as the United States, the only earlier one recorded having, apparently, been built by Aylton on the coast of South Carolina in the summer of 1526 (p. 22). The winter of 1607–8 was very severe, and in the midst of it fire destroyed their store-house, provisions, and most of their lodgings. On Feb. 5, Capt. Popham died and was succeeded by Raleigh Gilbert. In the following summer, several vessels visited New England, by one of which Gilbert learned of the death of his brother and the necessity of his return to England. Thereupon, the colonists, discouraged by their sufferings (to which, doubtless, the mosquitoes contributed largely), and disappointed also because of their failure to discover any valuable minerals, abandoned the colony and returned to England, being assisted in this by the vessel they had built, the "Virginia."—A brief Relation of the Discoverie and Plantation of New-England, in Purchas His Pilgrimes, IV: 182–253; Ferdinand Gorges, A Brief Narration, 1608.

In this year, the Separatists, of Scrooby, Eng., emigrated to America. At Amsterdam, in 1609, they removed to Leyden and established their church—Winstor, Nar. & Crit. Hist. of Am., III: 261–62 and authorities there cited.

Quebec. "The rock and the surroundings of the old Iroquois city of Stadocon [Stadacona] attracted Champlain as it has fascinated millions since his day. So Champlain cast anchor there on July 3, 1608, and laid the foundations of a city which he called Quebec, from the Indian name meaning the Narrows."—Tracy, Tercentenary History of Canada.

In the latter part of this year, at the invitation of the directors of the East India Co., Henry Hudson, having been unsuccessful in two expeditions, sent out respectively in 1607 and 1608 by the London Company, to seek a shorter passage to the Orient by way of the north, apparently embarks the information possessed by Hudson when he undertook his memorable third voyage. The stretch of coast which was unknown to the author of this map is exactly that portion which was still unmapped when Hudson sailed, and which he evidently intended to explore, should his ship have gone from Sp. Zembla, or from Hudson River, the Orient by Hudson's route having been unsuccessful.

On this chart, we find recorded for the first time a relatively accurate knowledge of the coast-line north and east of the suspected passage in the neighbourhood of 40° N. L., including Cape Cod, and extending to a point midway between the 43rd and 44th degrees.

The directors of the Amsterdam chamber of the East India Co. issue seven years' credit to their agents, and with the proceeds purchase two ships, Brass, and a small vessel, the "Saint George," of which the fleet was dispatched to the East.

December

The directors of the Amsterdam chamber of the East India Co. commission three of their members to draft a contract with Henry Hudson, and prepare the necessary letters to the other chambers. At the same time the East India Company instructs Holland to look out for a suitable vessel of from 25 to 35 lasts (50 to 70 tons) for Hudson. The contract was made out and signed on Jan. 8, 1609 (p. 29),—Resolutien van de Kamer van Amsterdam, trans. in Murphy's Henry Hudson in Holland, 115, 142.

"... the voyage [to Virginia] is not long nor tedious, five weeks at ease will send us thither, whereas five months suffice not to some other places where wee Trade: our course and passage is through the great Ocean, where is no fear of Rocks or Flattes, nor subject to the straights or restraint of forraine Princes: most Winds that blow, are apt and fit for vs, and none can hinder vs: when wee come to the Coast, there is continuall depth enough, with good Bottome for Anchorhold, and the Land is faire to fall with all, full of excellent good Harbours, the world affords no better for Ships of all bulks, many pleasant lands great and small, and the winds of Easterly, or Westerly will serve, and the trade of fish will be so much the greater, as so many men will doe fishe there.EM. Four score miles within Land, upon the Northside of the River. .."—Robert Johnson, Nova Britannia (1609), page 9 (unnumbered).

Henry Hudson enters into a contract with the Dutch East India Company for a voyage of discovery (his third in search of a short route to the Orient), in which he is to seek a new route to the Indies, by way of the north-east, that is along the northern coast of Russia and Siberia, passing "around by the North Side of Nova Zembla," and then the Straits of Anian (Bering Strait). The original contract has disappeared, but a copy, made by Pieter van Dam, counsel of the company from 1625 to 1706, for his unpublished history of that corporation, is preserved in the archives at The Hague (see Pl. 1, Vol. IV), together with an abstract of certain "Instructions," which Van Dam states were issued to Hudson at the same time. The contract and "Instructions" are printed in Dutch and in English by Murphy in his Henry Hudson, 1609 (p. 24) and "Instructions for the Hudsons and other necessary, the above named Hudson shall about the first of April, sail, in order to search for a passage by the North, around by the North side of Nova Zembla, and shall continue shall along that parallel until he shall be able to sail Southward to the latitude of sixty degrees. He shall obtain as much knowledge of the lands as can be done without any considerable loss of time, and if it is possible return immediately. In order to mark the chart and relation of his voyage to the Directors, and to deliver over his Journals, log-books and charts, together with an account of everything whatsoever which shall happen to him during the voyage without keeping anything back, for which said voyage the Directors shall pay to the husband and wife of Henry Hudson, to the amount of 800 crowns, to which sum shall be added the amount of any travel or service, as well as for the support of his wife and children, the sum of eight hundred gilders [850.] and, in case (which God prevent) he do not come back or arrive hereabouts within a year, the Directors shall furnish his wife and two hundred gilders [850.] in cash; and upon them they shall not be further liable to him or his heirs, unless he shall either afterwards or within the year arrive and have found the passage good and suitable for the Company to use; in which case the Directors will reward the above named Hudson for his dangers, trouble and knowledge in their discretion, with which the before mentioned Hudson is content. And in case the Directors think proper to prosecute and continue the same voyage, and agreed and the before named Hudson, that he shall make his residence in this country with his wife and children, and shall enter into the employment of no one other than the Company, . . .

The following reference to the original "Instructions" to Hudson is to be found in Vol. II of the Hakluyt Society's edition of Hudson's reports, 1853: "And Hudson says that Mr. Henry Hudson, an Englishman, and a skilful pilot, as master thereof, with orders to search for the aforesaid strait, with the North and North-West winds towards the lands or straits of Anian [Bering Strait] and then to sail at least as far as the sixtieth degree of North latitude, when if the time permitted he was to return from the straits of Anian again to this country. And he was further ordered by his instructions, to think of discovering no other routes or passages, except the route around the North and North-East above Nova Zembla; with this additional provision, that if it could not be accomplished at that time, another route would be the subject of consideration for another voyage." See also the Eleventh Annual Report of the Am. Scien. Hist. Preservation Soc. (1863), p. 47.

5 The Jamestown settlement. At the end of the letter he says: "I have also been told that two vessels are leaving Plymouth with men to people that country which they have taken, which is farther of." In a footnote, Brown remarks: "This was certainly an expedition for North Virginia." It may have had as its object the re-establishment of the colony of Sagadahoc, which had been abandoned the preceding year, or it may have been directed to some other goal, possibly to the south, toward the Hudson River.

6 We do not know whether this expedition actually started, or not, but undoubtedly at about this time, Brown remarks, expeditions were sent from England to North Virginia of which no accounts have been found.—Brown, Genesis of the U. S., I: 243-47.

Hudson, with his crew of 18 or 19 English and Dutch seamen, sails from Amsterdam in the ship "De Halve Maen" (Half Moon), which had been fitted out for him by the Amsterdam chamber of the East India Company.

7 Not being able to force a passage by the north-east, because of the ice and cold encountered in the neighbourhood of Nova Zembla, and harrassed by dissensions among his crew, which, as we shall see later, he probably accepted as a ready excuse, he turned westward and sailed to the Bering Strait and continue the same voyage. Before turning, however, he let before the ship's company two alternative proposals: "The first of these was to go to the coast of America, to the latitude of 40°, moved thereto mostly by letters and maps which a certain Captain Smith had sent him from Virginia, and by which he indicated to him a sea leading into the western ocean, by the north of the southern mountains which he supposed to be in Virginia, which he had determined some time prior to Feb. 17, 1609, had been divided into two parts, the southern part lying between 36° and 40°, N. L. so that the mouth of the Hudson, lying as it does in 40° 18', coincides exactly with the location here indicated. . . . The other proposition was to direct their search through Davis's Straits."

The maps sent by Captain Smith, which probably represented comparatively recent discoveries, perhaps included a map containing such information of the coasts of Virginia, New England, and Canada as are found for the first time combined on the "Virginia Company Chart." (C. Pl. 27, Vol. II). They can hardly have included the original of the Velasco Map before the addition of Hudson's discoveries and those of his immediate successors, as in this case Hudson would naturally have sought a northern passage by way of the St. Lawrence, rather than through Davis Straits. They may have included a copy of the Jehan Cossin Map of 1570 (C. Pl. 16), which clearly suggests the possibility of a passage through the Hudson River, as well as the extreme north-west.

The collection had, doubtless, been supplemented before Hudson left Holland by copies of such important maps as Michael Lok's map of 1582 (outline on C. Pl. 17), which shows the western sea, or the Sea of Vascureno; the Molineux Map, published in 1600 (outline on C. Pl. 32), and perhaps a later edition of the map of Octavio Pisanus (C. Pl. 21), which important map actually shows a passage to the western sea, in the neighbourhood of 40°. N. L. Hudson was also, no doubt, familiar with the maps depicting the discoveries of Verrazzano, Goumer, and other early explorers along our coast. See Vol. II, Cartography, Chap. I.

Alexander Brown, in his Genesis of the U. S., I: 184, suggests that Hudson may have taken with him to Holland, in the latter part of 1608, a copy of Smith's True Relation and his sketch map of the neighbourhood of Chesapeake Bay, which accompanied it. It is not inconceivable, since that of the "Relation," and which was probably most fitting, was "Written by Captaine Smith Cornellon of the said Collony, to a worshipfull friend of his in England," was actually addressed to Hudson, and that the map and the manuscript referred to by Van Meteren as having been sent to Hudson from the "Relaiton," was of the same date. Smith himself was deeply interested in the question of a passage to the western sea, the existence and location of which he frequently discussed with the Indians, who successively led him to seek for it via Chesapeake Bay, the Susquehanna River, and the Potomac, and finally suggested that the passage was by way of "the river of Canada." From various statements made by the Indians, and quoted by Smith, Strachey, and others, it is clear that the sea which they had in mind, and which Smith and others mistook for the western ocean, was in reality Lake Ontario, which is evidently the sea that Strachey tells us "should be about ten days [above the falls of the James River], allowing, according to a month, some fourteen or sixteen miles a day."—"The Historie of Travailse into Virginia Britannia," Hakluyt Soc. Publ. (1848), 34. It is true that Velasco, in his letter of March 22, 1611, to the King of Spain (reproduced in Brown, Genesis of U. S., I: 455 et seq.), says that "North it is more than 100 leagues off, and many high mountains are there and vast deserts which the Indians themsevles never yet have explored." Among other references to this unknown sea are Smith's statement that "Beyond the mountains from whence is the head of the river Patawomecke, The Savage report, inhabit their most mortal enemies, the Massawomekes upon a great salt water, which by all likelihood is either some part of Cammanda [Canada] some great lake, or some inlet of some sea that falleth into the South sea."—A Map of Virginia (etc.) (1612), 26. King Powhatan evidently realized that any statements made by the Indians to the effect that a salt sea existed beyond the mountains, to the west, were without foundation, as he told Smith that "for any salt water beyond the mountains, the relations you have had from my people are false."—Smith, The General Historie of Virginia (etc.), 68.

It is altogether likely that the Relation, which came to a somewhat abrupt end on the February 1, 1609, was actually forward to a "Phoenix," which sailed on that date, and reached England early in July. From this document, which was entered for publication on Aug. 11, we know that Smith had, by June 2, explored most, if not all, of the possible approaches to the western sea in the neighbourhood of Chesapeake Bay, and it is quite possible that the passage to the perfect South Sea which Smith had in mind, was defined as "to be private," contained the reference to "a sea leading into the western ocean, by the north of the southern English colony," to which Van Meteren refers; or, it is possible that Hudson may have received some further information from Smith on this subject.

In the "Report of What Francisco Megan, an Irishman, learned in the State of Virginia, during the eight months that he was there," probably from Sept., 1607, to April, 1608 (reproduced under ccxxi, in Brown, Genesis of U. S., I: 395-99), we find the following statement: "... the natives of Virginia assure the English that they can easily take them to the South Sea by three routes. The first route on which they will take them is by land, from the head of that river, on which the English have a fort, to the South Sea, as the Natives affirm [six days' march]. The second route is, because to a day's march and a half from the head of that river inland, there is another river so long that it falls into the South Sea. The third route is that twelve leagues from the mouth of this river, where the English are, towards the N. W. there are four other rivers, to which there came [seventy] one of those English Captains in a pinnace, who says that one of these rivers is of great importance, and the Natives affirm, that fourteen leagues run from there a river towards the N. W., there is another great river, which flows very far into the country, until it meets another large river, which flows to the South Sea." Cf. the Pisanus Map (C. Pl. 21, Vol. II).
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

Hudson also had with him copies of George Waymouth's journals, describing his attempt, in 1602, to discover a north-west passage through Davis Strait, and more particularly through Lumley's (Hudson's) Straits, in 41° 40', which he penetrated to a distance of 100 leagues, and returned through. At the beginning of the next season he made several discoveries along the New England coast as far south as 41° 30', in 1605. These journals had been furnished him by Peter Placius, the great Dutch geographer, with whom he consulted in 1605-9, before his departure, and with whose own maps of the north-east coast of America, Plancius, executed the theory of a western passage in this direction to be fallacious, "from the account of one who had explored the land in the west and had declared it to be continuous" (i.e., to contain no strait or passage).—Hessel Gerritsen, Description del disegni Geographici Dedicati Preti Sio, Translato in Occision, super terra americana, in Chinas ayt Toponyma ductari, in Asher's Henry Hudson the Navigator, 59, 191-92.

A full translation of this tract will be found in Murphy's Henry Hudson in Holland, p. 49 et seq. This translation contains some errors: for example, in the sentence "Hence the opinion prevailed that by that way alone there was a passage open to the Indies," the important word alone is omitted; and, further, the passage beginning "Hudson . . . sailed Westwardly, in order that he might see if there were any hope remaining, not in a direct course, as is perhaps supposed, but that the northern and southern Directors" can better be rendered: "Hudson nevertheless seeing that towards the East, and Nova Zembla, the way was closed by ice and snow, sailed towards the west, so that he might investigate whether any hope remained; not by a direct route (as is related) that this our country and the Directors might profit, only that he might in New France exchange his merchandize, for stints, he returned safely to England, where he was accused . . ."

From Juet's account, it is clear that, after leaving the Fire Islands, Hudson shaped his course south west, rather than towards Davis Strait, which would have required a more northerly passage. When he had reached the coast of Newfoundland, the "Half Moon" passed a "great Fleet of Frenchmen, which lay Fishing on the Banks," and that from this point on, until they reached the coast of America, ships were sighted at frequent intervals. Having landed, on July 18, in the neighbour- hood of Pemobscot Bay, to replace a broken forecast, and his crew, after a few days sojourn there, having quarreled with the natives, he again sailed south-west, with the probable purpose of making land in the neighbourhood of Chesapeake Bay, where Smith and his 500 colonists were settled, at Jamestown, in "the sound West River in Virginia," and not searching the little known coast, to a northerly direction, for a passage which should lead to the western sea. Waymouth, in 1602 and 1603, and Gosnold, in 1602, had pretty well explored the coast between the entrance to Hudson's Straits in the north and Nantucket in the south, and explored from the southern colony of Virginia had coasted as far south as 38°. No previous explorer, however, had actually examined the intervening coast, although Verrazano, Goméz, Alfonse de Saintonge, perhaps Jehan Cossin, or the explorer whose discoveries his map records, and several others about whose voyages even less is known, had sailed along this stretch of shore.

Approaching Cape Cod from the north, Hudson became embayed, and, in seeking to pursue his southward course was greatly harrassed by the shoals lying off its eastern extremity. Finally reaching the open sea, he did not again approach land until he found himself in the neighbourhood of Cape Charles. Probably, on several occasions, for perhaps as far as the vicinity of the White House, where he is said to have landed, not being in his confidence, did not record, to resist the temptation of calling upon his friend, John Smith, in Chesapeake Bay, he turned his bows northward, in order to see the so much desired passage that should give access to the western sea, or the "Sea of the Indies," as he called it, which was doubtless due to the fact that its shoal waters convinced him that this could not be the entrance to the sought for passage. It seems clear that, from the information in his possession, he looked rather for success in the neighbourhood of 40°, probably having in mind Verrazano's "grotto" clearly shown in a map. Thence, doubtless, it was that Hudson, following closely in the track of his predecessor, Giovanni da Verrazano, entered in his turn, on Sept. 11, 1609, the land-locked harbour which Verrazano had visited eighty-five years before, adding, however, to Verrazzano’s discovery of that great river which still proudly bears Hudson’s name.

On the 4th of April, and the 27th of April, 1609, after the Old Account, we set sail from Amsterdam; and by the seventh and twentieth day, we were done at the Texel: and by twelve of the clocke we were off the Land, it being East of vs two leagues off. And because it is a journey vastly knowne, I omit to put downe what passed, till we came to the height of The North Cape of Falmarke, which we did performe by the signe of May (stille waes) being Tuesday. On which day we observed the height of the Pole, and found it to be 71 degrees and 46 minutes; and found our Compass to vary six degrees to the West: and at twelve of the clocke, the North Cape did bear South-west and by South, tenne leagues off, and wee steerred away East and by South, and East.

There is no further entry until the 19th, when, without a word of explanation regarding the sudden abandonment of the original intention of seeking a north-east passage, or the breaking of the contract, Juet records the “Hull Moon” again off the North Cape, on a westerly course. They reached Strimgle, in the First Islands, on the 30th, and left again on the first of June, steering “South-west and by West,” until on the 22d they found themselves in 44° and 58’. From here they “steered away West for Newfoundland Land.” On July 12, they “had sight of the Land” between 43° and 44° (the south coast of Nova Scotia). “The sixteenth, in the morning it cleared up, and wee had sight of five Islands lying North, and North and by West from vs, two leagues. Then wee made ready to set sailze, but the myst came so thickly, that we durst not enter in among them.

The seventeenth, was all mystie, so that wee could not get into the Harbour, but kept in the mouth of it. Bartrams come off vs, with sight of the Sauages of the Country, seeming glad of our comming. Wee gave them triblets, and they eate and dranke with vs; and told us, that there were Gold, Sliver, and Copper mynes hard by vs; and that the French-men doe Trade with them, which is very likely, for one of them spake some words of French. So wee rode still all day and all night, the weather continuing mystie.

“The eighteenth, faire weather, wee went into a very good Harbour” (Penobscot) where, on the 23d, they rigged their new forecast. After fishing and trading with the natives, they finally, before departing, all three in the month of July, and by the cleare of their Houses, and took the spoyle of them, as they would haue done of vs.” On the 26th they came out of the harbour and sailed again south-west. On the 3d of August they “went on Land [on the north side of Cape Cod], and found goodly Grapes, and Rose trees.” On the 27th they cleared the cape, which they recognized as Cape Cod, and on the 6th they lying shoall, and “steered away South and by East.” On the 9th they found themselves in 38° 39’, “in an unknowne sea.” On the following day they talked about to the westward. On the 17th, at sunrise, they began to look for land, which they sighted about 1 o’clock, in 37° 26’, just north of “the entrance into the Kings River in Virginia, where our English-men are.” From the 18th to the 26th, they cruised about off the shore in a storm. On the latter date, at noon, their “height was 57 degrees 15 minutes. And wee found that we were returned to the same place, from whence we were put off at our first seeing Land.” On the 27th, Juet records: “The Coast lyeth South South-west, and is a white Sandie sharo, and sheweth full of Bayes and Potos. The stremme setheth West South-west, and East Northeast. At site of the clocke at night, we were therat an Harbouro or River [Chincoteague Inlet—or Bay], but we saw a Barre lye before vs. At Oce, the Land to westward, the waies being full with many Islands in it. At site of the clocke we Anchored, and sent our Boate to sound to the shoreward, and found no lesse then foure, and a halfe, fife, six, and seuen fathomes.

“The eight and twentieth, faire and hot weather, the winde at South Westward, the Sunne shone most hot, the clocke weighed, and steerred away North twelve leagues till noone, and came to the Point of the Land [Cape Henlopen]; and being hard by the Land in fife fathomes, on a sudden wee came into three fathomes; then we beare vp and had but ten foote water, and joynted to the Point. Then as soone as wee were ower, wee had fife, six, seuen, and eights foote, and the same fowme about.” Then wee found the Land to trend away North-west, with a great Bay and Ruiers [Delaware Bay]. But the Bay wee found southe, and in the ebbing wee had ten fathones, and had sight of Breaches and drie Sand. Then wee were forced to stand backe against; so we stood backe South-East by South, three leagures of the clocke we Anchored in eight fathomes water; and found a Tide sete to the North-west, and North North-west, and it rised one fathome, and showeth South South-east. And here that will thoroughly Discover this great Bay, must have a small Pinasse, that must draw but foure or fife foote water, to sound before him. At fawe in the morning wee weighed, and steerred away to the Eastward on many courses, for the Northier Land is full of shoals.”

On the 29th they coasted along the shore, which they “found to bee all Islands.” On the 30th they “stood to the Eastward,” and were out of sight of land until the 2d of September. On this day, early in the morining, they “saw a great Fire, but could not see the Land, then we came to ten fathones, whereupon we brought our tackles aboard, and stood to the Eastward East South-east, four Glasses” (4 hours). Then the sun arose, and, says Juet: “wee steerred away North againe, and saw the Land from the West South-west, and North, all South, and about vpon the second our soundings were eleues and ten fathomes.” This corresponds exactly to the formation between Atlantic City and Little Egg Inlet. “Then wee boote in for the shoare, and faire by the shoare, we had seuen fathomes. The course along the Land we found to be Northeast by North,” which correspondeth to the map. They continued from “the Land which we had first sight of, till we came to a great Lake of water, as wee could judge it to bee, being drowned Land, which made it to rise like Islands, which was in length ten leagues [Barnegat Bay]. The mouth of that Lake hath many shoalys, and the Sea breakest on them as it is cast out of the mouth.” And from that Lake or Bay, the Land lyeth North by East [which again corresponds exactly with the map], and wee had a great streame out of the Bay; and from thence our soundings was ten fathomes, two leagues from the Land.”

At five o’clock they anchored, probably a few miles north of Barnegat Inlet. From this point Juet records, “For [far] to the Northward off vs we saw high Hile” (Navesink Highlands, and perhaps the Staten Island hills) and, he adds, “This is a very good Land to fall with, and a pleasant Land to see.” The next day, September 3rd, they weighed anchor at ten o’clock, and, with the wind south-west, stood to the Northward, until three in the afternoon, when they came to “three great Ruiers,” which can have been none other than Rantin Bay, the Narrows, and Rockaway Inlet. From this point the narrative continues: “So we stood along to the Northernmost [the Narrows] thinking to have gone into it, but we found it to have a very good barre before it [Rockaway Inlet], and wee cast up our anchor to the Southward [towards Sandy Hook] . . . till we came to the Souther side of them [the shoals] . . . and Anchored a short distance to the north of Sandy Hook. So wee sent in our Boate to sound [towards the Hook], and they found no lesse water then foure, fife, six, and seuen fathomes, and returned in an houre and a half. So wee weighed and went in, and rode in fife fathomes, Osie ground” (probably just inside the Hook). Here Juet records the latitude or “height” as 40° 30’.

“The fourth, in the morning as soone as the day was light, we saw that it was good riding farther vp, . . . and found that it was a very good Harbour; and foure and fife fathomes, two Cables length from the shore [this undoubtedly was Horsehoe Bay or Harbour]. Then weighed and went in to our ship. Then our Boate went on Land [Sandy Hook], . . . At night the wind bled hard at the North-west, . . . and wee dron on shoare, but toke not bushe, thanked bee God, for the ground is soft sand and Osie.”

“The fifth, in the morning . . . wee heased of our ship againe into fufe fathomes water, and sent our Boate to sound the Bay, and we found that there was three fathomes hard by the Souther shore. Our men went on Land there, and saw great store of Children, who with the clocke weighed, and steerred away the east comming on Land. So they went vp into the Woods [Navesink Highlands], and saw great store of very goodly Oakes, and some Currants. For one of them came aboard and brought some dried, and gave me some, which were sweet and good. This day many of the people came aboard, some in Mantles of Feathers, and some in Skins of divers sorts of good Furres. Some women and children brought Tobacco pipes, and other things of Copper did wear upon their necks. At night they went on Land again, so we rode very quiet, but durst not trust them.

The sixth . . . our Master sent John Colman [doubtless the same John Colman who is mentioned as master's mate in the account of Hudson's first voyage, with four other men in our Boate ower to the Northside, to sound the other Riper, being foure leagues from vs visibly the Narrows. They found by the way should water two fathoms [Romer Shoal, etc]; but at the North of the Riper eighteen, and twenty fathoms, and very good riding for Ships [He probably refers here to Quarantine]; and a narrow Riper to the Westward between two Bands [the Kill Van Kull, between Staten Island, of the insularity of which Hudson probably had been informed by the Indians, and Bergen Neck, which, from its shape, they might easily have mistaken for an island] . . . . So they went in two leagues and saw an open Sea [Newark Bay] and returned; and as they came backe, they were set upon by two Canoes, the one having twelve, the other fourteen men . . . . and they had one man slaine in the fight, which was an Indian named John Colman, . . . . and two more hurt. It grew so darke that they could not see their Cables, nor knew what labor'd too and fr'd on their Oares. They had so great a streame, that their grapnells would not hold them [This evidently refers to the very strong tide setting through the Narrows].

The seventh . . . by ten of the clowke they returned aboord the ship [which was still at anchor near Sandy Hook], and brought our dead man with them, whom we carried on Land and buryed, and named the point after his name, Colman's Point." [This must have been on Sandy Hook.]

The eighth they rode at anchor all day. "The people came aboard vs, and brought Tobacco and Indian Wheat, to exchange for Knives and Beadles, and offered vs no violence."

On the ninth they "weighed and went off into the chan-nell of the Riper [towards the Narrows], and Anchored there all night."

At noon on the tenth they "weighed and went ouer, and found it should all the middle of the Riper . . . . and rode all night in soft Ozie ground. The banke is Sand." (It is readily seen from an examination of the government coast chart that these conditions correspond closely with those existing between Sandy Hook and Coney Island.)

On the eleventh, at one o'clock in the afternoon, they "weighed and went into the Riper [the Narrows] . . . . Our soundings were seven, six, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, twelve, thirteene, and fourteen fathomes [Such depths can only have been found in the Narrows]. Then it should againse, and came to place fathomes [which corresponds to conditions existing a very shallow Bay and Ridge]. Then wee Anchored, and saw that it was a very good Harbour for all windes . . . . (the Upper Bay).

On the twelth, at two o'clock in the afternoon, they weighed and "turned into the Riper two leagues and Anchored" (This would bring them to the mouth of the Hudson, off the Battery.).
This morning at the first (watch) they rode in the river and "there came eight and twenty Canoes full of men, women and children . . . . (probably from Manhattan Island). Just here records: "At the river florest South-east by South within," which, of course, is contrary.

On the thirteenth they weighed anchor again and turned four miles into the river and in the afternoon ran up 23 leagues farther and anchored all night. (This would correspond to a point near Fort Lee.) From here Just records that they "had an high point of tide, the 24th at vs, hearing the East fives leagues off vs." (This was undoubtedly the highland back of Tarrytown which has this appearance from Fort Lee.)

Hudson proceeded to the "end of the Riper Nauigatennesse," which Van Meteren gives as in latitude 42° 49', and De Laet as "about 45°" and, having sent the master's mate and four men in a small boat eight or nine leagues higher, they sailed north, but on the confines of the Mohawk, to sound the river, was convinced that it could not afford a passage to China, and therefore retraced his course, passing out of sight of Sandy Hook on October 4th, thus reluctantly relinquishing his cherished hope, and returning with the sad conviction that the thoroughfare which he had hoped to find did not exist, at least in those parts. Further explorations were, for this voyage, out of the question, and from the bay of this mighty river they turned round, or else, as happens in the volume of Paulus Huydecoper's third voyage and, without seeing any Land by the way . . . . And on the seventh day of November, stil vs, being Saturday: by the Grace of God . . . .
safely arrived in the Range of Dartmouth in Devonshire, in the year 1609."—Purchas His Pilgrimes, III: 591-93, 59.

The only other known contemporary account of Hudson's third voyage, of course, is that of the Whitson, voyage, of which the first time in the 31st book, pages 275-76, of the folio edition of 1610 of his celebrated work, with the title Commentarijus de Memorien Van den Nederlantyn. Start, Handel Overtoghen ende Gier-schoordens van onen tyden, [etc.], the preface of which is dated "Anno 1610 in Februario."—See Nijhoff's reprint of Murphy's Henry Hudson in Holland, 64, 79; the same authority contains a transcription from the 1611 edition, and a rather unsatisfactory translation. Jameson's translation (Nov. N. Neth., 6-9), which is "revised from the text of the 1614 edition," shows that this edition differs materially from that of 1610, which was the last revised by Van Meteren himself, the 1611 quartos being a pirated edition, issued by the same publisher, and bearing the same title, as the well known issue of 1614. For notes regarding the various editions of this important book, see Bibliography. For reproduction, see PI.B,Vol.IV. The narrative in the Whitson is very much inferior to what was written in London, apparently in the early part of 1610, soon after Hudson's return to England, and contains some facts which Juet does not give. It was probably based on information obtained from Juet's Dutch mate. It begins (translated by A. J. F. Van Laer):

"We have had in the preceding book [an error, as the last book contains nothing relating to this subject] that the Directors of the East India Company in Holland had sent out last March [1609], in order to seek a passage to China by the northeast or the northwest, a brave English pilot, named Henry Hutson, with a Vlie boat, having a crew at about 18 or 20 men, part English and part Dutch, well provided.

"This Henry Hutson sailed from Texel the 6th of April, 1609, had doubled the Cape of Norway the 5th of May and kept his course northwards. He had been in the East Indies could hardly endure, they, being English and Dutch, fell to quarrelling among themselves, whereupon, on account of the cold, which some who had been in the East Indies could hardly endure, they, being English and Dutch, fell to quarrelling among themselves, whereupon the skipper, Hutson, proposed to them two things.

"The first was to go in latitude of 46 degrees to the coast of America, moved thereto mostly by letters and charts which one Capt. Wain Smith had sent him from Virginia, whereby he indicated to him a sea which would enable him to sail around their southern colony on the north side and from there to pass into a western sea, which, if it had been true (since [albeit] experience as yet points to the very adventitious character of such routes) would have been a very advantageous route to sail to India. The other proposition was to seek a way through Davis's Straits, to which they generally agreed; hence they sailed thitherward on the 14th of May and with a fair wind arrived on the last of May at the island of Faro, where they stayed but 24 hours to take in fresh water. After leaving [there], they sailed until, [on] the 18th of July, [they came] to the coast of Nova Francia, in [latitude of] 44 degrees, where they were obliged to run in to get a new forecast (having lost theirs), which they found there and set up. They found this place suitable for cod-fishing and also for the traffic of good hides and furs, or game, which were too be had there for trifling things. But the ship's crew behaved badly toward the natives, taking things by force, about which they began to quarrel with each other, the English fearing that they were outnumbered and the weakest and being therefore afraid to explore further. So they left there on the 26th of July and continued at sea until the third of August, when they approached the land in latitude of 42 degrees. Thence they sailed off until, [on] the 12th of August, they again came near the coast in latitude of 37° 45' [just north of the entrance to Chesapeake Bay].
Thence they sailed along the shore until they reached 40° 45', where they found a river not far from a point where they had touched in the previous year. They entered it on the 12th of September [and discovered] as beautiful a river as one could find [the Hudson], wide and deep, with good anchoring ground, and vegetation [mii], probably for genus on both sides. Finally they came in latitude of 42 degrees and 40 minutes with their big ship, but their ship's boat went higher up the river. Near the entrance of the river they found bold and warlike people, but inland, at the farthest point, they found friendly and civil people, who had an abundance of provisions and many skins and peltries, martens and foxes and many other commodities, birds, fruits and even white and red grapes. They traded politely with the people and brought a little of everything with them. Now when they had been about fifty miles (leagues) up the river, they returned on the fourth of October and again put to sea. More could have been accomplished if there had been good-will among the crew and if the want of some necessary provisions had not been so great.

At sea, they held counsel together and were of different opinions. The mate, a Dutchman, advocated to winter in Terra Nova [Newfoundland] and to explore the northwest passage of Davis. The skipper, Hutsone, was opposed to this; he feared his mutinous crew, because they had at times threatened him roughly, and also that in the cold of winter they would consume their entire provisions and then be obliged to return, many of the crew being weak and sickly. No one, however, spoke of returning home to Holland, which gave the skipper various grounds for suspicion, so that he dismissed the baker, the man of the deck, and the mariner, whom he suspected, and discharged the seven of his crew changed, bringing the number up to 20 men, etc. They were to sail from Dartmouth about the first of March, to be in the northwest toward the end of March and to spend there the month of April and the half of May in killing whales and [other] animals near the island of Panan and then to sail to the northwest, to pass the time there until the middle of September and thereafter to return to Holland around the northeast of Scotland. Thus this voyage ended and before the directors could be advised of their arrival in England a long time elapsed through contrary winds. They ordered the ship and crew to close home at the first opportunity and as this was about to be done, the skipper, Henry Hutsone, was by the authorities there ordered not to depart, but to serve his own country, [the same being required] also of the other Englishmen who were on the ship. To many, however, it seemed strange that the skippers were not allowed to render an account and make a report of their services and doing, etc., and the masters, having been sent out for the general benefit of navigation. This took place in January 1610, and it was thought that the English themselves wished to send him with ships to Virginia to explore the to the aforesaid river further.

Although not strictly contemporary, Julian de Lasa, in the first edition of his book "Ninian's World", book III, "Virginia," Section "Nieuw-Nederlant," Chap. 7, gives an account of Hudson's discovery, that was probably based on the lost journal of Henry Hudson, or on his preliminary report, which, perhaps, the Amsterdam directors of the East India Company lent to the compiler. He says: "As to the first discovery, the Directors of the Charierted East India Company, in 1609, dispatched the yacht Half Moon, under the command of Hendrick Hudson, captain and supercargo, to seek a passage to China by the northeast. But they changed their course and stood over towards New France; and after three months, entered the banks of Newfoundland in latitude 41° 40', made the land in latitude 44° 15', with a west-northwest and northwest course, and went on shore at a place where there were certain natives with whom, as they understood, the French come every year to trade. Sailing hence, they bent their course to the south until, running south-southwest and southwest by south, they again made land in latitude 41° 47', which they supposed to be an island, and gave it the name of New Holland, but afterwards discovered that it was Cape Cod, and that, according to their observation, it lay fully seventy-five leagues to the west of its place on all the charts. From here they fell down to 37° 15', where they turned toward the coast of New England, and after about 70 leagues, they came to the island of Manhattan, and from thence turned to the south, and so, having a depth of water, of 8, 10, 12, 14, 16 and a half fathoms, with a sandy bottom. They called this place Dry Cape (probably Cape Charles)." "Running thence to the southwest, they again discovered land in latitude 38° 50', where there was a white sand, on which, and within it an abundance of green trees. The direction of the coast is north-northeast and southwest-southwest for about eight leagues, then north and south for seven leagues, and afterwards southwest and northwest for five leagues. They continued to run along the coast to the north, until they reached a point from which the land stretched to the west-northwest, and there they saw a land to which several rivers discharged. From this point land was seen to the east-northeast, which they took to be an island, but it proved to be the main land, and the second point of the bay, in latitude 38° 54'. Standing upon a course northwest by north, they found themselves embayed by two promontories, which they supposed to be headlands. There the men, who had been sent ashore, found many breakers, stood out again to the south-southwest. They suspected that a large river discharged into the bay, from the strength of the current that set out, and caused these sands and shoals.

"Continuing their course along the shore, they observed a white sandy beach and drowned land within, beyond which the land was full of trees, the coast running northeast by north and southwest by south. Afterwards the direction of the coast changed to north by east, and was higher land than they had yet seen, along to a lofty promontory, behind which was situated a bay, where they ran up into a roadstead behind a low sandy land, on the 18th [Sandy Hook]. There they were visited by two savages clothed in elk-skins, who showed them every sign of friendship. On the land they found an abundance of blue plums and the finest oak for height and thickness that one could ever see; together with peltries, venison, and other kinds of wood useful in ship building. Sailing hence in a north-by-east direction, they ascended the river to about 47° north latitude, where it became so narrow and of so little depth that they turned back."

Jameson, "N. W. Neff, 37-38.

An interesting contemporary side light is contained in a letter written on Dec. 29, 1811, by the Marquis de Guadela from Brussels to the Spanish king on affairs passing in Holland. See Vol. II, p. 44. This letter states that the “Company had equipped two famous ships, in order to trade with China, going by the way of Tartary; and also that an Englishman was willing to execute the plan, and that his master had not allowed it.” In other words, if the information be true, Hudson sailed against the express wish or order of the English King, which would go far toward explaining his retention in England after his return. The reference to the two ships may possibly be explained by the fact that the yacht “Hope” or ”Good Hope” sailed to the East Indies (the strait between Nova Zembla and the mainland) at about the same time that the “Half Moon” left with instructions to sail north of Nova Zembla. It is conceivable that they sailed together, and that the “Half Moon” returned to Holland when Hudson turned and sailed westward. See also "The Ship Book" for 1668 (1609), and Register of the East India Co., in M. W. Bynum's "Henry Hudson in Holland", 59, 116. "Vide infra, reference to Asher.

A description of the “Half Moon,” based on investigations undertaken in Holland and America at the time of the construction of the replica for the Hudson-Fulton Celebration, may be found in "The Hudson-Fulton Celebration", II 92-104. and in an article entitled "Henry Hudson and the Discovery of the Hudson River," by Edward Hageman Hall, in the 15th Anu. Rep. Am. Scen. and Hist. Prov. Soc. (1910), 255-271. See also Murphy's "Henry Hudson in Holland, 57-60, where extracts are given from the "Sailing book" (Lutkepohl's and "Makarumand book" (Memorial) which were rediscovered in the archives of the East India Company at Amsterdam at Bredhead, in 1841, and which are referred to in his "Hist. State of N. Y., notes pp. 24 and 41, as the "Ship book." There are four entries referring to the "Half Moon;" the first, from the "Sailing book," records the fact that the yacht "Half Moon," of 40 lasts, left Amsterdam in 1608 (evidently a mistake for 1609), destined for the north, and returned in 1610 (see Pl. 1, IV. Vol. II. The second, also from the "Sailing-book," under the date of May 2, 1611, records the sailing of the "Half Mane" for the West Indies, in company with the "Banda," and under command of "Commander Laurens Andel." This entry also records the wreck of the "Banda," on March 6, 1615, on the island of Mauritius, and states that the "Half Mane" remained there. The third, in the "Makarumand book," under the heading "Ships outgoing A° 1608" (evidently an error for 1609) from Amsterdam, records the yacht "Halve Mane," the latter in command of Melis Andries.

7 The last mention of the "Half Moon" is found in a list of ships which were in various places in the (West) Indies from July 1616, until the end of the same year. In this list, which is contained in Begin en v'oorzorg der Oost-Indische Compagnie, II: 129, the "Half Moon" is mentioned as being at the island of Sumatra. Her ultimate fate has never been ascertained. See also Iconography, III: 85–85.

Brachel's statement (Hist. State of N. Y., 1, 47) that the "Half Moon" returned to Amsterdam on July 15, 1616, is not supported by any authority that we have been able to discover.

Hudson's course or "track" on his memorable third voyage is shown on the two maps of "Early Explorations" contained in Vol. II. C. Pls. 58 and 59. For a contemporary cartographical representation of the information which he must have possessed, before sailing, see "The Virginia Company Chart," C. Pl. 21A, Vol. II, and for a similar representation of his discoveries on this voyage, and those made by his immediate successors in 1606, see the Velasco Map of 1606, C. Pls. 22 and 22A, and Cartography, pp. 51–64, Vol. IV, C. Pls. 15 and 15A, and Vol. II.

Aher, in his Henry Hudson the Navigator, cce., concludes that Hudson had two vessels, the "Good Hope" and the "Half Moon," and that the "Good Hope" may have returned after the mutiny near Nova Zembla; he also concludes (ecv!) that one of the "maps of moderate extent" was Velascli, C. Pl. 15, Vol. II, and that another may have been Ribero's (C. Pl. 10, Vol. II).

Hans Bontemantel, the well-known Dutch annalist and antiquary, and one of the directors of the Dutch West India Company, made a memorandum, sometime between 1655 and 1659, in regard to his discoveries of New Netherlands. He says, "The country was first found and discovered in the year 1609 at the charge of the chartered East India Company by the ship de halve maen [Half Moon], on the way to discover a passage to the Kingdom of China. The skipper thereof was a merchant, a certain Henry Hudson, an Englishman by birth, but who had had a intercourse a long while among the Netherlands, and was now in the service of the East India Company on monthly pay. This ship, sailing away from the Caney Islands, set its course toward the northwest. Having thus sailed with moderate speed for twenty days, they met land, according to their conjecture in 320 degrees west, and made various proofs that no other Christians had been there before them, but that the land was now first discovered by them. Land then appearing, and observing the fitness of the coast and strand, they approached toward it. They took possession of the prospect at convenience, and gave to it the name of Nieu Nederlandt. It lies in the north of the American world, commencing from the north by the equinocial line, 35°, 55', along the sea coast to 43° degrees north latitude; these are the same elevations as those of Sardisia and Corsesia, in the Mediterranean Sea, and of Spain and France along the ocean."—New Netherlands Papers, original manuscripts in N. Y. Pub. Library, from which this item is an abstract, in translation, from folder 1217.

What is known concerning the aborigines of Manhattan Island and vicinity, at the time of Hudson's visit, in 1609, has been studiously analyzed by Alanson Skinner, assistant curator of Anthropology in the Am. Museum of Natural Hist., and published by him in two monographs. The first of these is an introductory statement on "The Manhattan Indians," in the N. Y. State Museum Bulletin, No. 158 (1911), printed also as a separate by the N. Y. State Education Dept. (Albany, 1912); the second is The Indians of Greater New York (Cedar Rapids, Ia., 1915). No. 3 in a series from Latin America was Velascli, C. Pl. 15, Vol. II.

His sources of information, primary and secondary, are listed in a bibliography in the latter work. These include De Vries' Voyages, O'Callaghan's Doc. Hist. N. Y., Cullen's Hist. of the Five Indian Nations, Ruttenber's Hist. of the Indian Tribes of the Hudson River, the Memorials of the Rev. Peter Schuyler's Indian Mission, and "Some Customs of the Delaware Indians," in the Journal of the Museum of the Univ. of Penn., Vol. I, No. 3, and "Vestiges of Material Culture Among the Canadian Delaware," in the American Anthropologist, which Skinner describes as "forcemakers of a much larger work [not yet published, 1921] based on personal archeological research about New York City, and etiological study among the surviving Delawares of Canada and Oklahoma, which, when given to the public, will be the dernier mot on the subject."

Mr. Skinner has himself done considerable field work in and around New York, and has published a map showing the locations of shell deposits on Staten Island, Long Island, and in Westchester County, as well as that of New Amsterdam and Manhattan Island (at Iwood and along Spuyten Duyvil Creek).

Skinner also calls attention to a curious document, known as the "Walam Olum" or "Red Score of the Delawares," purporting to be a copy of an original history of the Delaware nations, described by D. G. Brinton in The Lenape and Their Legends (Philadelphia, 1883). Skinner refers to it and other sources of information, Skinner has been able to point out broadly the history and characteristics of the Indians of this vicinity, as well as to tell some of the tragic incidents, known to us in connection with New York City history and presented in the Chronology from original records. He presents, by his inverted serials, a complete picture of the physical features, dress, dwellings, utensils, ceremonies, habits, and customs of the Indians of this region, in peace and war, and describes their relics unearthed in this vicinity in recent years.

He states (1911) that "Some time before the advent of the Dutch at New Amsterdam, a branch of the Delawares or Delaware Indians split off from the parent stock, which had its abode south and west of the Hudson, and moved eastward and northward, forming the Mohican nation. They occupied Manhattan Island and the east bank of the Hudson as far north as the southern boundary of the Mohawkreservation. In time they became subjugated into several subtribes and bands, the chief of which, known as the Wappinger Confederacy, was composed of the Wappinger, Kitchawanck, Sintinch, Siwanyon, Weckquaesgeek, and Reckgwa-wanck. Of these people, the two tribes last mentioned were found by the Dutch inhabiting Manhattan Island. At that time, the Weckquaesgeek held the upper part of the island, above a line drawn from the Reckawa's creek (later Harlem creek) to the ravine at what is now Manhattanville, and the Reckgwa-wanck occupied the lower part of the island. Both of these tribes also held territories on the mainland, where their principal abodes were situated.

"The name Manhattan referred to the portions of both tribes dwelling on the island, and it is said to mean 'Islanders.'" (For derivation of the name Manhattan, see remarks under Ethnology in Vol. II, chap. VII, pp. 241–242, and authorities there cited.)

In his treatise of 1915, Skinner names each tribal band in various localities of Greater New York and the surrounding country.

"As for the Manhattans or Reckgwa-wancks, as they are sometimes called, there is some little doubt as to whether they were a Mohegan or a Delaware band. The evidence seems to show that they were a subtribe of the Uusmi Delawares. They also occupied part of the mainland nearby.

As shown in the Chronology, Verazzano (see 1524) gives us our first records of the Indians in the neighbourhood of Manhattan Island, and their kindred. These did not differ, he said, from the natives whom he had met elsewhere along the coast. They were of medium height, with prominent eyes, faces, and large noses, and were said to be very peaceable. (See N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections, 2d ser., I: 33). He describes the dress of two of their kings, and of their women.

The next records in which a description of the natives is found is the journal of Juet (see Jameson's Nar. N. Y. N., 18). Henry Hudson's own account (see his Journal, or the neighbourhood of Manhattan Island, taken from De Laet's quaternion from Hudson's lost journal, will be found translated in ibid., 48. Van der Donck (see ibid., 300–305) gave further first-hand evidence of the personal appearance and customs of those he saw. Good accounts are also given by Wasserac, De Laet, De Raisère, Michaelis,

In this connection, although of very little historical importance, it seems advisable to refer here briefly to the oft-quoted interviews with the Indians of the Rev. John Heckewelder, a Moravian missionary to the Indians of Pennsylvania, regarding the tribal traditions in relation to the first arrival of the Dutch at Manhattan Island. He wrote in 1808:

"The following account of the first arrival of Europeans at York Island is verbatim as it was related to me by aged and respected Delawars, Monseyes and Mahicannets near forty years ago. It is copied from notes and manuscripts taken on the spot."

The Indians said:

"A long time ago, when there was no such thing known to the Indians as people with a white skin, some Indians who had been out a-fishing, and where the sea widens, espied at a great distance something remarkably large swimming, or floating on the water, and such as they had never seen before. They immediately returning to the shore apprised their countrymen of what they had seen, and pressed them to go out with them and discover what it might be. These together hurried out, and saw to their great surprise and wonder, a whole creature which might probably be some concluding it either to be an uncommon large fish, or other animal, while others were of opinion it must be some very large house. It was at length agreed among those who were spectators, that as this phenomenon moved towards the land, whether or not it would have had life in it; it would be best to go, and inform all the Indians on the inhabited islands of what they had seen, and put them on their guard. Accordingly, they sent runners and watermen off to carry the news to their scattered chiefties, that these might send off in every direction for the warriors to come in. These arriving in number, and themselves viewing the strange appearance, and that it was actually moving towards them, (the entrance of the river or bay,) concluded it to be a large canoe or house, in which the great Mannitto (great or Supreme Being) himself was, and that he probably was coming to visit them. By this time the chiefs of the different tribes were assembled on York Island, and were counselling (or deliberating) on the manner they should receive their Mannitto on his arrival. Every step had been taken to be well provided with a plenty of meat for a sacrifice; the women were required to prepare the best of vestments; idols or images were examined and put in order; and a grand dance was supposed not only to be an agreeable entertainment for the Mannitto, but might, with the attribution of sacrifice, contribute to some conclusion of his being the god of the universe, and crowded with living creatures. It now appears to be certain that it is the great Mannitto bringing them some kind of game, such as they had not before; . . . full of people, yet of quite a different colour than they (the Indians) are of; that they were also dressed in a different manner from them, and that one in particular appeared altogether red, which must be the Mannitto himself. They are soon hailed from the vessel, though in a language they do not understand; yet they shout (or yell) in their way. Many are for running off to the woods, but are pressed by others to stay, in order not to give offence to their visitors, who could find them out, and perhaps make it an occasion of difference. Shortly after this house as soon as they have it,) stops, and a smaller canoe comes ashore with the red man and some others in it; some stay by this canoe to guard it. The chiefs and wise men (or councillors) had composed a large circle, unto which the red-clothed man with two others approach. He values them with friendly countenance, and they return the salute after their manner. They are lost in admiration, both as to the colour of the skin (of these whites) as also to their manner of dress, yet most as to the habit of him who wore the red clothes, which shine along with something [lace] they could not account for. He must be the great Mannitto (Supreme Being) they think, but why he should be so remarkably red, they cannot account.

"... the man with the red clothes returned again to them, and distributed presents among them, to wit, beads, axes, hoes, stockings, &c. They say that they had become familiar to each other, and were made to understand by signs; that they now would return home, but would visit them next year again; only they would bring them more presents, and stay with them a while.

That the vessel arrived the season following [If this whole legend has any foundation in fact, this may be a reference to the mysterious expedition of 1620 (p.5), to which De Laet refers], and they were much rejoiced at seeing each other; but that the whites laughed at them (the Indians,) seeing they knew not the use of the axes, hoes, &c., they had given them, they having had these hanging to their breasts as ornaments; and the stockings they had made use of as tobacco pouches. . . . They took every white man they saw for a Mannitto, yet inferior and attendant to the supreme Mannitto, to avenge all wrongs done to the one which was put on shore. The familiarity daily increasing between them and the whites, the latter now proposed to stay with them, asking them only for so much land as the hide of a bullock would cover (or encompass,) which hide was brought forward and spread on the ground before them. That they readily granted this request; whereupon the whites took a knife and beginning at one place on this hide, cut it up into a rope not thicker than the finger of a little child, so that by the time this hide was cut up there was a great heap. That this rope was drawn out to a great distance, and then brought round again, so that both ends might meet. That they carefully avoided its breaking and that upon breaking the whole of it was put into great heaps. That now (the Indians) were surprised at the superior wit of the whites, but did not wish to cooed with them about a little land, as they had enough. That they and the whites lived for a long time contentedly together, although these asked from time to time more land of them; and proceeding higher up the Mahicanutt (Hudson River,) the Indians believed they would soon visit all their country, and which, at this time was already the case."—N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections, 2nd ser., I: 69-74.

After 40 years of warfare under William of Orange and his son, Prince Maurice, the federal republic of the United Netherlands, now approaching the height of its greatness, concludes (at Antwerp) with Spain a 12-years' truce. The provisions include an acknowledgement by Spain of the independence of The Netherlands.

A second charter is granted to the London Company (the southern colony of the Virginia Company), erecting it into "a corporation and body politic," and enlarging and explaining its privileges. The new charter extended the bounds of the colony to over 1,000,000 square miles, stretching 200 miles north and 200 miles south of Point Comfort, and from sea to sea. Under these limitations, the northernly boundary was fixed at about the fortieth degree, instead of the forty-first which was the limit fixed in the charter of 1606.—Brown, Genesis, 228. Extract for the first charter dated April 10, 1620.

The Plymouth Company continued for eleven years longer to enjoy a nominal existence under its first charter; but, although several attempts were made to form new settlements, not a single permanent English colony was established, north of Virginia, until 1616.—Bradhead, op. cit., I: 130-134.

Samuel de Champlain is engaged in a great fight with the Iroquois near Ticonderoga, on Lake Champlain.—Champlain, Voyages (1612), 143-52.

The settlement at Jamestown, Va., is augmented by the arrival of seven ships, containing over 300 colonists. The "Adventure," bearing the leaders of the expedition—Somers, Gates, and Newport—and about 200 colonists, was wrecked near Bermuda, so that these colonists (149 when they reached Virginia) did not arrive until May 26th of the following year. Letter of John Radcliffe to Lord Salisbury, dated from Jamestown, April 1, 1609, reproduced in Brown's Genesis, I: 335.

Hudson reaches Dartmouth, England, after his return from the Hudson River, &c., having himself formerly sent a 7 seeds to the directors of the Dutch East India Company a preliminary report, probably accompanied by a rough draft of his discoveries.—Van Meteren, History of the Netherlands, 328; see also Cartography, II: 43, et seq.
— In February of this year, Emanuel van Meteren completed his "Commentaries and Memorial" of The Netherlands, which was printed under this year's date. This great work, which in its final form is known to us by a single copy, brings the history down to the Spring of 1610 (he died in England on Apr. 5/18, 1612) and contains Hudson's narrative in virtually the same form as that found in the pirated issues of 1611 and 1614.—See Apr. 4-Nov. 7, 1609, and 1611.

— Although De Laet tells us that Henry Hudson returned to Amsterdam (in 1610) with his report, no evidence has been discovered to substantiate this assertion; and, as we know from Van Meteren that both Hudson and his companions, after their return from America, were forbidden to leave England, and in January, 1610 were still there, and that on April 17 Hudson sailed on his fourth voyage, in the employ of the Muscovy Company of London, it seems hardly likely that he returned to Holland in the interval. Van Meteren says: "A long time elapsed, through contrary winds, before the Company could be informed of the arrival of the ship in England. Then they ordered the ship and crew to return as soon as possible. But, when this was about to be done, Skipper Henry Hutson and the other Englishmen of the ship were commanded by the government there not to leave [England], but to serve their own country. Many persons thought it strange that captains should thus be prevented from laying their accounts and reports before their employers, having been sent out for the benefit of navigation in general. This took place in January, [1610]; and it was thought probable that the English themselves would send ships to America to explore further the aforesaid river."—

De Laet, whose statements can generally be relied upon, tells us further that "in the year 1610 some merchants again sent a ship thither—that is to say, to the second river discovered, which was called Manhatnas from the savage nation that dwells at its mouth. And in the subsequent years [as Oct. 11, 1614] they sent their High Mightinesses the States General granted to these merchants the exclusive privilege of navigating this river and trading there . . ."—Ibid., 58. The versions of 1632 and 1640 add: "And our people wittered there."

It has been suggested that this 1610 expedition may have been the one promoted by Isaac Le Maire in the ship "De Vos," which is supposed to have sailed from Amsterdam in February or March, 1610, in Hudson's track. New Light has been shed on the mysterious voyage of this year by Dr. Wieder's recent discovery in the Bijenkrijghch at The Hague, among the records of the admiralty, of memoranda to the effect that, on Feb. 8, 1610, Le Maire hired the yacht "De Vos" from the admiralty for a period of eight months, paying 160 fl. a month, expecting to return it earlier. He wanted the ship "for a certain voyage which he intended to have undertaken," and which he deemed "so very desirable and grateful to the country, that even the said voyage and hire was received so pleasantly, as without a doubt he hoped it would." On Feb. 10, he proposed to buy the yacht; on Feb. 12, the admiralty put a price of 2,400 fl. upon it, and on the same day he bought it for 1,200 fl. It will be noted that this transaction took place immediately after the report of Hudson's return must have reached Holland.—See Vol. II, p. 65. Nevertheless, in view of all the facts, it seems unlikely that "De Vos" should have visited the Hudson in this year, and that no positive record of the fact should have survived. Moreover, it is a matter of record (Jeanne's letter to Henry IV, referred to under 1610) that Le Maire's interest at this time was centred upon a passage by way of the north-eat, and not the north-west. Furthermore, Le Maire was not one of the thirteen merchants to whom a charter was granted on Oct. 11, 1614, and who, as we are told by De Laet, were the same who sent out the earlier expeditions. Moreover, it seems unlikely that the charter sent out by the merchants of Amsterdam was primarily, if not wholly, a trading venture, whereas we know that Le Maire's sole object was the discovery of a passage to the Orient. Finally, from Jeanne's letter, it seems more than likely that Le Maire's expeditions of 1609 and 1611 were backed by the French monarch, in an attempt to forestall the Hudson. (See Vol. II, p. 49.) Having in mind the fact that Le Maire was a bitter rival of the East India Co., and was bent on finding a passage to the Orient that lay outside the limits of that company's charter, it is conceivable that, when Hudson's failure to find a passage by way of the north-east became known, and at the same time his hope of still finding one by way of the north-west, Le Maire may have dispatched the yacht "De Vos" in Hudson's track again with the determination of forestalling him, this time in the west.

In this connection, reference may be made to a letter of May 5, 1612, from the West India Co. to the states-general, complaining of the detention in Plymouth, Eng., by command of the English king, of the ship "Pomone" with Dirck Mann and Jan Lambo aboard. In this letter, reference is made to the Dutch rights in New Netherland, as follows:

"... we have deemed it to be our duty to inform your High Mightinesses that, subsequent to the first discovery, by your subjects in the year 1609, of the North River (commonly called the Manhattans, also Rio de Montaigne and North river), and after some of your inhabitants had resorted thither, in the year 1610 and following years, your High Mightinesses had finally, in the year 1615 [that is, granted some of your inhabitants a charter to trade to those countries, to the exclusion of all other persons, and that they established a fort and garrison there, which were maintained until the charter granted to the West India Company included these and other countries."—From N. T., Col. Dict., I: 51. For further details and references, see Vol. II, Chap. III.

It is possible that De Laet, writing in 1625, may have made a mistake of a year, as the expedition referred to was sent out on the "Fox" and "The Crane," which expedition was doubtless planned in 1610, although it did not sail until March 28, 1611 (q.v.).

In or about this year, the world-map of Pisanus (C. Pl. 21, and pp. 45, 50, 60, 413, 35, Vol. II), which is very advanced in its delineation of the North East Coast, and apparently shows the Hudson River, was issued.

Hudson, in the service of the Muscovy Company of London, Apr. starts in the "Discovery" on his fourth and last voyage. He sailed through Hudson (Lusley's) Strait, probably discovered by Cabot in 1497, into Hudson Bay, wintered in James Bay, and was cast adrift by his mutinous crew on June 21, 1611, shortly after leaving his winter quarters.

The "Discovery," after many vicissitudes, returned to England on Sept. 6, and the remnant of the crew made their way to Sir Thomas Smith, governor of the English East India Company, in whose custody Hudson's journal and maps of this voyage were in 1611 (see Vol. II, p. 46, citing letter of Dec. 1, 1611, in Simancas archives).

It is clear from such meagre information as has been preserved that Hudson died believing that he had discovered the entrance to the long sought for north-west passage.

For contemporary accounts of Hudson's fourth voyage, see "An Abstract of the Journal of Master Henry Hudson," in Purchas His Pilgrimes, I: 596-597; Abacot Pricket's "Descoverie" (ibid., III: 597-600); "A new History of the Discoveries of the English and Dutch "Students in the Mathematicks, bee one of them who was put into the Shalltop" (ibid., III: 609-10), and Hessel Gerrits, second Latins ed. (1613), printed in Murphy's Henry Hudson in Holland, 150. King Henry IV, of France, is assassinated.

Capt. Samuel Argall, in company with Sir George Somers, sailed on June 29 from the Chesapeake for the Bermudas, but, owing to contrary winds, they were obliged to change their destination, and to steer instead for Sagadahoe. Before reaching the coast, the two ships were separated in a heavy fog. Argall, after spending some time cruising along the coast between Sagadahoe and Cape Cod, set his course for home, and, on August 22, was in the neighbourhood of Sandy Hook. He reached Delaware Bay on the 27th, and Cape Charles on the 31st.

In his own journal (printed in Purchas, IV: 1758), Argall makes no mention of having explored the coast or of having entered any harbour between Cape Cod and Delaware Bay, although Strachey, first secretary of Virginia, in his history, apparently referring to this voyage, says: "Likewise, from the north point of our bay, which [as aforesaid] the Indians call Accomacook, and we Cape Charles, hath the coast all along bene discovered, even to the river of Sachadecoe; for Captain Argall, in his return from the sea of the Hudson (the barren), he had lost Sir George Somers, 28 July, in a dangerous fog, well beaten to and fro, fell with the make, standigue for Cape Cod, and made good, from 44 degrees, what Captayne Bartho. Goussall and Captaye Waymouth wanted in their discoveries, observing all along the coast, and drawing the plotts thereof, as he steered homewardes, unto Aug. our bays and divers tythes were showne, offering acquaintance and trade unto the pruple, and in the intire of 39 discovered Sept. another goodby bay [Delaware], into which fell many talyes of faire and large rivers, and which might make promise of some westerly passage; —"—Strachey, The Hist. of Traveile into Virginia Britannia, in Haklyt Soc. Publications (1859), 42-43.

On March 22, 1613, Don Alonso de Velasco, Spanish ambassador in London, sent to the Spanish King (Philip III) a copy of a map, now known as the "Velasco Map" (C. Pl. 22 & 21A, Vol II), which, in an accompanying letter, he described as having been drawn by a surveyor, or engineer, sent to America during the preceding voyage; and here about three months ago (Dec., 1610, probably in the ship "Dainty"—see Brown's Genesis, I: 428). The portion of the letter referring to the map reads as follows: "This King [James I] sent last year [1610] a surveyor to survey that Province, and he returned here about three months ago and presented to him [King James] a plan or map of all that he could discover, a copy of which I send Y. M. Whose Catholic Person . . ."—Brown, Genesis of the U. S., I: 457.

The Velasco Map delineates the coast from the straits of Belle Isle to Cape Fear. The characteristics of the coast-line north of New England do not vary materially from the usual, rather incised and indented profile. The coast-line is constructed of gray sandstone and is generally level with the portions of the coast occupied by the English—New England and Virginia—-and the still unoccupied stretch between these two settlements, including the tract explored by Hudson, all of which are shown with considerable detail and accuracy, there is every reason to believe from Hudson's own survey, or from information furnished by him personally.

The name Manhattan ("Manabata" and "Manahatun"") appears for the first time on the Velasco Map.

The authorship of this very important document, in its final form, is unknown, although it evidently embodies, besides the surveys of Champlain and other foreigners, information derived from some at least of such English explorers and surveyors as White, Gosnold, Waymouth, Pring (see Oct. 1606), Popham, Hudson, Argall, and others (see Aug. 22, 1610), Tyndall, Powell, Madison, and possibly others.

Strachey, as we have seen, referring to Argall's voyage from June to August, 1610, says that Argall "made good, from 44 degrees, what Capayne Barthol. Gosnold and Capayne Waymouth wanted in their discoveries, observing all along the coast, and drawing the plotts thereof, as he steered homewardes, unto our bay."—Brown, Genesis of the U. S., I: 457. This statement, if it could be substantiated, would satisfactorily establish the identity of the mysterious surveyor who visited the Hudson River and Manhattan Island in 1610, and doubtless complete this map, adding to Hudson's discoveries, and those of his predecessors, the stretch of coast between the Hudson River and Nantucket. Unfortunately, however, this is not as much as it is reported. The printed form of this passage (IV: 175q) does not bear out Strachey's statement, as it seems clearly to indicate that Argall did not sight land between Cape Cod and Delaware Bay. Furthermore, it seems probable that the unknown surveyor of 1610 sailed along the coast from south to north, as otherwise he could hardly have failed to see the eastern entrance into Long Island Sound.

The copy of this map procured by Velasco is now in the Simancas archives in Spain. The original has not been found.

For a reproduction and such additional facts as are known regarding this map, including a discussion of the reasons for connecting it closely with Hudson, see Vol. II, Chap. II, Frontispiece, and C. Pl. 22. See also Brown's Genesis, I: 457, and First Republic, 146-47.

In this year, the English translation of the Bible authorized by James I, generally known as the "Royal Version" or "King James's Version," was first printed, at London, in a massive folio volume. It resulted from a conference of English divines, representing both the Established Church and the Puritans, called at Hampton Court by the king in 1604.—Anderson, Annals of the English Church, I: 196-94. See also the conference given contemporaneously by Barlow, Summer and Substance of the Conference, London, 1604.

In this year, the second issue of Emanuel van Meteren's well known history, with the title Belgische Oeften Nederlantse Oorsprong (Belgian or Dutch Wars and Events) was published. This pirated quarto, which was printed, shortly before Van Meteren's death, from his official folio edition of 1610 (p. under Apr. 4-Nov. 7, 1609), has long been taken for the first edition. The recent discovery, in the Library of Congress, of the only known copy of the splendid official folio edition of 1610, has robbed this of this long unwarped honour. The existence of this book, which belonged originally to Mr. John Boyd Thatcher, although unknown to bibliographers, was noted in 1909 by Mr. Fultsits and Mr. Van Laser.

In this year, publication of the Mercure Francois, a journal of current events containing much material relating to voyages on the north coast of North America, was begun at Paris. It continued until 1646.—Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., IV; 370. and authorities there cited.

It is likely that in this year Hendrik Christiaensen, of Cleves, visited the vicinity of Manhattan Island, although it is equally possible that his visit, referred to in the following extract, occurred a year or two later, and even conceivable that it took place in 1610:

"This country, or the River Montagne, called by us Mauritius, was first sailed to by the worthy Hendrik Christiaensen of Cleves, when he had been on a voyage to the West Indies, he happened near there. But his vessel being laden, and a ship belonging to Bloekendam wrecked in quite a stormy gale, he durst not approach that land; this he postponed, being desirous to do so another time. It so happened that he and the worthy Adriaen Block carried a ship with the skipper Ryser, and accomplished his voyage thither, bringing back with him two sons of the principal sachem there. These voyageurs were all well; they were expert enough in knavery."—Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael.

Jameson's translation (Nar. N. Neth., 78), by the use of a period, where a comma is apparently intended, after "Cleves," makes Wassenaer state that Christiaensen was the first to sail to the Mauritius River, which, of course, he cannot have intended to say. At all events, it seems evident that Christiaensen's accidental approach to the Hudson River, "when he had been on a voyage to the West Indies," even if made in 1610, was not the carefully planned trading expedition which De Lest said he was sent out by the Amsterdam merchants in that year. After dissolving partnership with Block, he "made ten voyages thither, under a grant from the Lords States, who gave him that privilege for the first opening up of the place," that is, under the charter of Oct. 11, 1614 (p. v). On one of his voyages he took, by order of his employers, some bucks, goats, and rabbits, but they were killed by poisonous plants.—Wassenaer, in Jameson's Nar. N. Neth., 81.

On this day, in the states-general, was 'Received and read a Feb. 21 letter from the Commissioners of the Admiralty at Amsterdam, dated the 19th Day, wherein they advise that the Ships destined to look for a Northern passage to China are so nearly ready for the voyage that they are beginning to embark their crew. Requesting, that the same be made ready, that the above mentioned ships be provided with Letters from the Lords States General or His Excellency to the Princes or Kings of the countries at which they may arrive, written in such languages and characters as may be most useful, that their High Mightinesses would be pleased to have a draft made of such letters as their High Mightinesses shall think proper to give them, together with proper Commissions for the captains which will be in command; leaving the names of these in blank; the Ships being called the Little Fox ['The Fox," or 'De Vos'] and the Little Crane ['The Crane," or 'De Craen']."

"After deliberation it is ordered, that the required Letters be drawn up, and the draft sent to the aforesaid Commissioners, to have it translated into all such languages, as they shall consider necessary: And it is further resolved that this Excellency be requested to issue as High Admiral the aforesaid Commissions for the captains."

On March 28, the two vessels sailed under the command of Jan Cornelis May and Pieter Frans.—Mulder, De Reuven van der Cornet, May (etc.), Linschoten Vereeniging (1903), 5. The journal of the voyage, written by May, has been preserved, but the maps of the coast of Maine and New England, made by Pieter Frans, are lost. The explorers did not reach a point farther south than Cape Malbay.—See map pages 15-14, 614, for a later expedition of 'De Vos' under Pieter Frans. It seems clear from the above records that May cannot have visited the neighbourhood of Manhattan Island in 1611.
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

Fathers Pieter Biard and Enémond Massé, Jesuit priests, arrive at Port Royal to do missionary work among the Indians. Biard visited all the coast as far as the Kennebec. Finding that little could be done at Port Royal, they projected an inland, permanent mission settlement elsewhere. Their protector, Madame De Gueucheville, obtained from the French king a grant of all the coast from the St. Lawrence to Florida. A vessel was sent out, the missionaries were taken on board, and a settlement was begun at St. Sauveur on Mount Desert Island. There a cross was planted, and Mass observed at a rustic altar. But English vessels under Argall, from Virginia, attacked the ship and settlement, and the settlers were sent to France or carried prisoners to Virginia. This was the first Jesuit mission begun under French auspices.—Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., IV: 250, and authorities there cited.

A petition is presented by “divers Merchants and Inhabitants, residing in the United Provinces” to the assembly of the states of Holland and West-Vriesland, “regarding certain newly discovered Navigation,” and the cities of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Hoorn, and Enkhuysen request a copy of this petition for their constitutions, “which is delivered them.”—N. T. Col. Docs., I: 4. The records do not contain the petition or the answer thereto, but without doubt it referred to the newly discovered regions about the Hudson. Favourable action was probably taken upon this petition, and one or more of the five ships mentioned in the charter of Oct. 11, 1614 (q.v.) appeared in the Hudson River in the following year (1615). Hendrick Christiaensz, who, as we have seen, first visited the neighbourhood of Manhattan in 1611, but who postponed his visit there until he had formed a partnership with Block, was, presumably, one of the 1612 adventurers.

In this as well as in the following years, Christiaensz, Block, and probably Jacob Eickens, as well as other Dutch adventurers whose names are familiar to us through their association in later years with the United New Netherland Company were doubtless engaged in explorations along the New Netherland coast, which eventually led to the granting of the charter of 1614. See Sept. 7, 1611, and Oct. 11, 1614.

Upon the petition of some merchants, native subjects of the United Provinces, it is resolved as follows: The States, etc., declare that if the remonstrants are found to be the first to have discovered and navigated the route around the north to China or Japan, they shall receive the reward offered for that purpose by the resolution of the 13th of April anno 1596 [269], and furthermore, that then their further request will receive favorable attention and that proper action will be taken. Done in the presence of the 26th of April, 1612.—Muller, De Reis van Jan Cornellsen. May, 192.

Jonas Witsen (Witten), member of the city council and former secretary of Pietarie and Symon Willemse Nooy, one of the organizers of the New Netherland Co. (See Johan E. Ehku, De vreeschvaag van Amsterdam, I: 431), appear before the admiralty, declaring that they have reversed with their company to equip a vessel in order to search for a northern passage to China. They ask for the yacht “De Vos,” and promise, if successful, a share in the reward of 20,000 florins offered by the states-general on April 15, 1596 (q.v.), which offer was renewed by a resolution of April 25, 1612 (q.v.), for the discovery of such a passage. The admiralty agrees to lend the yacht, and to equip it with six guns, the further expenses, such as monthly pay, provision, etc., to be calculated; and if they apprehend the vessel at 3,500 guilders, the “amount of the valuation and the expenses for equipping” to be the “share of the admiralty,” and stipulate that the reward or eventual trade profits shall be divided in proportion to this amount, but that the admiralty shall have no further expense in case of failure. (Apparently, the statement in Vol. II: 65 to the effect that “De Vos” was purchased from the government, on March 29, 1613, is incorrect.)

The date of the sailing is not given, but on July 24, 1614 (q.v.), Jan de Wit, master of “Vostert,” appeared before the admiralty, having completed an unsuccessful voyage. Apparently, the statement in the Register of the Amsterdam Admiralty, in Muller, Geschichte der Norderische Compagnie, 367-68. From the same source, we know that “De Vos” was sent to the American coast in command of Pieter Fransz, who had accompanied Jan Cornelisz. May, as pilot. He was to visit the Hudson River and to trade with the Indians. Fransz, on this expedition, was killed by the natives, and his successor, Jan de Wit, did not reach the Hudson River, he had expressly stated on Aug. 13-14, 1614 (q.v.), after he had returned to Holland.

Shakespeare’s Globe Theatre burns on June 29/July 9.

In this month, Captain Samuel Argall returned to Virginia from his second Acadian expedition. In 1643 there was published in London a pamphlet under the name of Bernard Plantagenet, entitled A Description of the Province of New Albion, in which, among other baseless fabrications, it was stated that “Sir Thomas Dale and Sir Samuel Argall,” on a return voyage from the French settlements in Acadia, “landed at Manhathe Isle in Hudsons river, where they found four houses by the name of Plantagenot, under the West-India Company of Amsterdam share or part; who kept trading boats and trucking with the Indians; but the said Knights told him their Commission was to expel him and all aliens Intruders on his Majesties Dominion and Territories, this being part of Virginia, and this river an English discovery of Hudson and [sic] English man, the Dutch man contented them for their charge and voyage, and by his Letter sent to Virginia and recorded, submitted himself, Company and Plantation to his Majesty, and to the Gouvernor and government of Virginia in the new protected Dutch West-Indie Cards, calling this part New Netherland, failing in paying of customes, at his return to Plymouth in England, was there with his Bever good persons, and attached to his damage of 1500 l. whereupon at the suit of the Gouvernor and Council of Virginia, his now Majesty by his Embassadour in Holland, explaining of the said Abins intrusion on such his Territory and Dominions, he said Lords the States of Holland by their publique instrument declared, That they did not awow, nor would protect them, being a private party of the Amsterdam West-India Company, but left them to his Majesties wil & mercy.” (pp. 16-17).

For an argument against the authenticity of this account, and upholding the greater unworthiness of the tract, see the Bibliography, Vol. V, under Plantagenet. See also Voyages from Holland to America, A.D. 1652-1644, by David Petritson de Vries, translated from the Dutch by Henry C. Murphy (New York, 1853). Note A, which presents an interesting and very complete survey of the progress of the Dutch, as given by themselves, in the territory of the state of New York, up to the time of the first settlement.

The above item was prepared by Mr. Palsits. In the author’s opinion, an equally plausible theory can be developed from the meagre facts to sustain the long-established tradition of Argall’s finding the settlement on the Bermudas, as mentioned. If Argall’s voyage is authenticated, it has seemed advisable here and elsewhere in the Chronology, where opinions have differed, to state briefly the opposing deductions, as well as the facts themselves, so that the reader may be in a position to judge for himself. In this particular case, it seems to the author that, although Argall may have been in general untrustworthy, nevertheless, the statements which it contains relating to Manhattan may be substantially correct. As Fort Nassau, which we know from De Laet was built in 1614, is shown on Block’s Figurative Map, which is based on information carried back to Holland by Block and Christiaensz, who reached Amsterdam before July 24, 1614 (q.v.), it must have been built in the winter of 1613-4. As we know also from De Laet that Christiaensz “first commanded here [Fort Nassau], and in his absence Jacques Eickens” (Jameson, Nar. N. Neth., 47), he must have spent this winter there, and left Eickens in charge to the early spring, when he went down the river in the “Fortuyt,” and probably Block’s year-round vessel. Cape Cod, sailed for home, leaving Hendricks in the “Restless” to continue the exploration of the New Netherland coast.—De Laet, in Jameson’s Nar. N. Neth., 50.

If Block’s ship, the “Tiger,” had been burned in the vicinity of Albany, in the autumn or winter of 1613-14 (q.v.), it seems almost certain that Block would have attempted to join forces with his old partner, Christiaensz. This he did not do; and we know, further, from the account of the Indians (Doc. Hist. N. Y., 410 ed., IV: 65), that they supplied him with food during two (doubtless interrupted by winter’s coming).—Block.

Furthermore, De Laet, in referring to the cruise of the “Restless” in the early spring, starts in by saying that she “sailed through Hellegat into the great bay.” If she had been launched up the river, or elsewhere than in the neighbourhood of Manhattan Island, he would naturally have used some such expression as Nov.
— "sailed down the river, and through Hellegast," etc., or "up the — coast, and through Hellegast," etc.

It seems to me, therefore, that there is no valid reason for assuming that the "Tiger" was not burned in the neighbourhood of Manhattan Island, and that the "Restless" was not built on the island, or in its vicinity. I would go further. Argall's visit took place late in November, 1613. Why should not his statement regarding a "pretended Dutch Governor" and "four houses" refer to Block and his crew, and to their encampment? I do not think that a convincing argument against a "prehistoric" sojourner on Manhattan Island can properly be based upon the traditional cruelty or treachery of the local Indians, as there are as many instances of their friendliness to the whites as of the reverse.

The argument sometimes advanced that Father Biard, in his letters and Relation (See Brown's Genesis, II: 700 et seq. also Champlain's Voyages), does not mention the visit to Manhattan Island falls to the ground when we examine the text of the Relation carefully: as it then becomes clear that he was not on the ship with Argall on the return to Virginia from the second voyage, but was with Capt. Turner on another ship, which, not being able to reach the Virginians, became of a great storm, sought refuge in the Azores, from which he later found his way to France.

The statement that Argall sailed from Port Royal "straight to Virginia" occurs in the record of the first, and not the second, voyage. In connection with the second voyage, we are told by Biard that he "reached Virginia in three weeks thereabouts" after leaving the Azores, p. 9, which would have allowed ample time for a visit to Manhattan Island.

In a complaint made on Oct. 25, 1614, against Jacob Jacobsen Elken, for trading up the North River, on the pretence "that said river and adjacent country were in, and of, the Domain of his Majesty of Great Britain," the deputies of the "Assembly of the XIX," reminded the states-general that the right to trade had been conferred by them (in 1614) on certain merchants, and that, likewise, "one or more little forts were built," also under the jurisdiction of the states-general, "even before the year 1614," and supplied with people for the security of the said trade."—N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 93-95.

In a "Report of the Board of Accounts on New Netherland," Dec. 15, 1644, it is said: "For which purpose [i.e., as a shelter in winter] they erected on the North and South Rivers there, two little forts against the incursions of the Indians. A charter was afterwards, on the 11th October, 1614, granted," etc. (See N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 149. These statements are evasive, uncertain, and largely unreliable; their origin can be traced to the work of De Laet, whose account is mentioned above. However, on Oct. 1614, was built at Castle Island, was erected in 1614, and there was no Dutch fort on the South or Delaware River until after 1623, when a fort, also called Fort Nassau, was built there; moreover, the Dutch first explored that river, under Hendriksz, in 1614 or 1615. Again, in 1646, Father Isaac Jogues, S. J., wrote his "Voyage de la France" in which he gave his observations of a visit to New Netherland in 1643, but which was evidently elaborated from the French edition of De Laet, published in 1640. He wrote: "It is about fifty years since the Hollander came to these parts. The fort was built in the 1615; they began to settle about twenty years ago. . . . The first colonists and lands fit for use described by the savages who formerly had held here. We have here an exaggeration in the first sentence and the rest is taken from De Laet. He makes De Laet's statement of the fort "up the said river" refer to a fort on Manhattan Island; although, as the statement appears first in the 1650 edition, the reference, obviously, is to the fort built there after Minuit's arrival in 1626. Jogues refers to Fort Orange as "a miserable little fort called Fort Orange, built of logs, with four or five pieces of Breteuil cannon and as many pederers." Cfr. Jameson's "Narr. N. Neth.," 38 and 54, with 261.

In the above, or brief and clear account of the situation of New Netherland" (etc.), in "N. Y. Col. Doc., II: 113, transmitted on Nov. 5, 1660, we have an almost literal copy of the De Laet statement, with an interpolation of the words "about the Island Manhattans," hence again a misinterpretation. Such positiveness as is found in Moulton's "His. of State of N. Y.," part 2, p. 244, and in Booth's "Hist. City of N. Y.," 39, is wholly unwarranted by the evidence.

In this year, Pocahontas was baptised at Jamestown, Va., under the name of Rebecca.—Smith, General Histor (1614), 116-17, 131, 122.

That the French frequented the Massachusetts coast between 1614 and 1619 is proven by accounts of the destruction of two of their ships there at that time.—Bradford, Hist. of Plymouth Plantation, I: 208-10; Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., IV: 110 (footnote), and authorities there cited.

The "Tigre," of which Argall was skipper, was accidently burned in New Netherland in the beginning of this year. (See Nov., 1613, for a statement of reasons for supposing that the "Tiger" was burned at an earlier date.) Block spent the remainder of this winter in building a small yacht, which was named the "Orust." (Mr. Van Laer calls attention to the fact that the name "Orust," given to Block's new vessel, is generally translated Restless, or Unrest, and looked upon as an appropriate and even prophetic name, although, as the Dutch are not an imaginative people, it is doubtful that the name was bestowed with any such intentional interpretation. More likely the ship was so named after the small Island of Orust, between the northeast point of the province of North Holland and the island of Texel, the last bit of land which ships pass in leaving Holland on sailing from the Texel. Cfr. Oct. 9, 1618.) The "Orust" was of "about eight lasts [sixteen ton] burthen," having "a keel thirty-eight feet long, forty-four and a half feet from stem to stem, and eleven and a half feet, wide by six feet by beam." In it, he continued his business as a trader in the East River into the great bay [Long Island Sound], and explored all the places thereabout; and continued therewith as far as Cape Cod, whence he came home in the ship ["Fortune"] of Hendrick Christiaansen, leaving the yacht on that coast for further trading," in charge of Cornelius Hendrickens, skipper, who continued to make new discoveries with her.—De Laet, in Jameson's "Narr. N. Neth.," 44, 50-51 (De Laet tells us, in the same place, that the Dutch built there [on the Hudson] several sloops and tolerable yachts.); N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 12, 13, 15. Although it has been asserted in numerous secondary authorities that the "Tiger" was burned at or near Manhattan Island, and that the "Orust" was built on Manhattan Island, in 1615 or 1616, no positive evidence has been found for these claims. The only direct evidence is contained in the citations given above and it lends no hope to the Manhattan theory. There is, however, strong circumstantial evidence in the works of Van Meteren, De Laet, and Wassenber, in support of the possibility that Block was in the vicinity of Albany during the experiences of this winter.

There is also no evidence in favour of the view expressed by some writers that Block and his party built huts near the southern point of Manhattan Island and that they were supplied with food by the Indians of that district; a view that habs been naturally followed upon another. The contemporary evidence, though meagre, shows that the Dutch traders carried on their business with the Indians near Albany; that voyages were made there each year; that some people even wintered there for the purpose of trafficking with the natives; that Christiaansen and Block had been partners before the "Tiger" was burned; that Christiaansen was the first regular trader in New Netherland; that the first fort there had been built on Castle Island, near Albany, in 1614, "for the greater security of the traders," and that Christiaansen was the first who commanded in New Netherland; also that the region of the upper Hudson was noted for its unusual productivity, then as now, and for its fine timber, from which even Hudson's carpenter had made a fore-yard for the "Half Moon," and that the Mohawks near Albany, met by Hudson and his successors, were "friendly and polite people," and cultivated intercourse and friendship with the Dutch, whilst those resident near Manhattan Island, called the "Manhattan," were "warlike people," "a bad race of savages, who have always been very obstinate and unfriendly towards our countrymen." These latter are cfr not the same Indians who, at this early period, would have supported them [Block and his party] with the food and clothing that they so desperately needed, and have "taken care of them for two [sic, for one] winters, till the ship was finished," as we are told in the "Breden Raets," those Indians did who refused the demands made by Gov. Kiel, alleging that they were under no obligation to the Dutch. The exact words used, as translated in "Doc. Hist. N. Y.," IV: 65, are...
"Have we not supplied you Swannekens on your first arrival here and when you had no nanchois (sea ship) with provisions for two whole years, and not you wanted? The necessary shelter for Block and his men, and the hospitality they received from natives in New Netherland, seem to have been associated with the upper Hudson in the vicinity of Albany. For the circumstantial evidence here analysed, see Jameson, N.A. N. Neth., p. 25-39, 45, 47, 52-54, 67, 75, 81; Disc. Hist. N. T., 470 ed., IV: 65.

The above item was prepared by Mr. Pallets, and embodies his interpretation of the known facts; for a statement of the author's reasons for reaching a different conclusion—that the "Tiger" was housed in the vicinity of Manhattan Island, probably in the autumn of 1614-15, and that Argall did find a "pretended Dutch Governor" encamped on Manhattan Island—see 1615, November.

Fort Nassau was erected early in this year by Hendrick Christiaensen, on Castle Island, in latitude 41°, a short distance south of the present city of Albany (see Strobell, I: 55). "The fort was built in the form of a redoubt, surrounded by a motte eighteen feet wide; it was mounted with two pieces of cannon and eleven pederenes, and the garrison consisted of ten or twelve men. Hendrick Christiaensen, first commanded here, and in whose absence Jaques Ellensen, on behalf of the company which in 1645 received a Royal Charter from High Michaels, the States-General. This fort was constantly occupied for three years, after which it partly went to decay."—De Liet, Nieuw Wereld, in Jameson's Narr. N. Neth., 47-48.

Fort Nassau is shown on the Figurative Map of 1614, and must therefore have been built during the winter of 1613-14.

The first narrative of Amanda, sailing on this voyage in 1614, is in Jameson, N.A. Neth., 1638, p. 8.

We may, however, be sure that nothing deserving the name of a settlement was established there during this early period, and that if any have ever been built by Europeans they were of the most primitive type, and served merely for the occasional and temporary shelter of explorers or traders and their stores. See Vol. II, Cartography, pp. 127-8.

Early in this year, the states-general, anxious to encourage the foreign commerce of Holland, granted a charter to an association of merchants for prosecuting the whale-fishery in the neighbourhood of Nova Zembla, and for finding a new passage to Chios. The name of this company was De Noorsche Compagnie.—Great Britain-Border, I: 670; Vossenaer, VII: 95, VIII: 112: 124.

Jean Vigne (or Vinge), son of Guillaume (also Gualfan, Guelven, Willem) Vigne and Adréeeme Cville, Wallen, is said by numerous modern historians to have been born in this year on Manhattan Island, and to have been the first child of European parents born in New Netherland. This conclusion they base upon a statement made, in 1695, by the Labadist missionaries, Danikers and Sulyter, in their journal, dedicated to and卖给 to Nieuw Netherland Island Hist. Soc., I: 114; but these merely say "in New Netherland," and that he was about sixty-five years of age when they wrote, in 1697 (Sept. 24, p. 7). Jean Vigne died in New York City, on Dec. 21, 1689. See his will in Collections of N. Y. Hist. Soc. (1893), 454. His father probably died before April 9, 1632, on which date a report was made by two referees of a widow relating to an action brought for a settlement upon her children by her first marriage, as she was now to be married to Jan Jansen Damen. The date of the report has been questioned. It is given in O'Callagh's Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, p. 2, under April 9, 1633. As the original instrument (N. Y. Cal. MSS., I: 6) was destroyed in the Capitol fire, the date cannot be verified, although an English translation which survived gives the date as 1613. Rachel Vigne married Cornelis van Tienhoven, and it is possible that they came into possession of this contract and recorded it in 1653, and that this document, and not one used by the Calendar, is in his instrument. Her son Jean and daughter Rachel are spoken of as minors and provision is made for their education and for a trade to be taught to Jean, who was the younger of these two children. Had he been born in 1614, he would have been about eighteen in 1632, and it might well have been that at this age he would have been made for his education and the learning of a trade, as a "minor," and for the education of his sister, who was even older, although under the Roman-Dutch law the legal age was 25. Mr. Van Leer, who has a clear recollection of the report, is confident that it was dated 1623, and not 1618.

Sarah Rapelje, daughter of Juriaen Jansen Rapelje, is often called the first White girl born in New Netherland. She was born July 7 or 9, 1624, and the infant was baptised by Catelina Trico, who spoke her first three years after arriving in New Netherland (in 1624?) at Fort Orange (Albany); hence Sarah must have been born at that place. Her parents were Walloons, or Huguenots, and it seems safe to assume that Jean Vigne's birth was earlier than that of Sarah Rapelje, soon after the arrival of the first settlement on Fort Orange, in 1624.

We know from a recently discovered deposition of Bastiaan Jansz. Krol, made at Amsterdam on Nov. 14, 1624, after his return from Fort Orange, where he was "Kraankwezzer," that before he sailed for Holland children had been born there, and were awaiting baptism. For some record of the same information we do not know that was authorized to officiate at baptisms and marriages, as there was no ordained minister in New Netherland, and that he returned to Fort Orange to exercise this authority. Krol, as lay-reader and comforter of the sick, was peculiarly well situated to know the social happenings in the very small first colony at Fort Orange, and, as we have seen, he says that children (kinderen) had been born there before he left on his first return voyage from Fort Orange, which must have been either late in September or early in October, as his deposition was made at Amsterdam on Nov. 14, 1624.

The claim that the first child born in New Netherland is possible, but not proven; but the claim that Sarah Rapelje was the first girl born there is dubious and improbable.—Eckhoff, Bastiaan Jansz Krol (1910), 32, Appendix XXIII, documents 21 and 22; Jameson, Narr. N. Neth., 755; Riket, Hist. of Harlem (1888), 516, note, and his manuscript account of Jean Vigne (185), in Adrian Block's wintering on this voyage. According to Miller Papers, in N. Y. Hist. Soc., Rapelje family records give Sarah's birth as June 7, but this has been disputed, and June 9 has been chosen by some genealogists as the preferred date.

The states-general of the United Netherlands issued the following general charters, offering exclusive trading privileges to such citizens as discover any new passages, countries, or places; and order the same to be affixed "at the usual places in the United Countries:"

"The States General of the United Netherlands. To all those who shall see these presents or hear them read, Greeting. Be it Known, Whereas we understand it would be honorable, serviceable and profitable to this Country, and for the promotion of its prosperity, as well as for the maintenance of seafaring people, that the good Inhabitants should be excited and encouraged to employ and occupy themselves in seeking out and discovering Passages, Havens, Countries and places that have not before now been discovered nor frequented; and being informed by some Traders that they intend, with God's merciful bly, by diligence, labor, danger and expense, to employ themselves thereat, as they expect to derive a handsome profit therefrom, if it pleased Us to privilege, charter and favor them, that they alone might resort to and navigate in to these places and regions, and be the first to be by them newly found and discovered, for six voyages as a compensation for their outlays, trouble and risk, with interdiction to all, directly or indirectly to resort or sail to, or frequent the said passages, havens, countries or places, before and until the first discoverers and finders thereof shall have completed the aforesaid six voyages. Therefore, We having duly weighed the aforesaid matter and finding, as hereinafore stated, the said undertaking to be laudable, honorable and serviceable for the prosperity of the United Provinces, And wishing that the experiment be free and open to all and every of the Inhabitants of this country, have invited and do hereby invite all and every of the Inhabitants of the United Netherlands to the aforesaid search, and therefore, have granted and consented, grant and consent hereby that whoever any new Passages, Havens, Countries or Places shall from henceforward discover, shall alone resort to the same or cause them to be frequented for four voyages, without any other person directly or indirectly sailing, frequenting or resorting, from the United Netherlands, to the said newly discovered and found passages, havens, countries or places, until the first discoverer and finder shall have made, or cause to be made the said four voyages, of four passages, or that at least the contrary attempt shall be made, and a fine of Fifty thousand Netherland Ducats, to the profit of the aforesaid finder or discoverer. Whereunder we understand that the discover [sic], on completion of the first voyage, shall be holden within fourteen days after his return from said Voyage, to render unto Us a pertinent Repat of the aforesaid discoveries and adventures, in order, on hearing thereof We may adjudge and declare, according to circumstances and distance, within what time the aforesaid four voyages must be completed. Provided that We do not understand to prejudice hereby or in any way to diminish our former charters and Concessions to the former companies. And, if they be not performed by King James’s charter of 1606 to the Plymouth or Northern Co. Hendrick Christiaensz., skipper, having “lately returned from the most northern parts of America, carrying with him beaver skins,” appears before the admiralty, accompanied by Tys Vockertsz.

Aug.

Jonas Wit (Witten) and Symmon Nooms report to the Admiralty that their expedition in “De Vos” was a failure. They intended to sail north on the River Hudson with their cargo of “different articles of merchandise,” but were prevented by King James’s charter of 1606 to the Plymouth or Northern Co.

Thirteen merchants of Amsterdam and Hoorn, claiming to have “discovered and found New Netherland, situate in America between New France and Virginia, the sea coasts whereof lie in the Latitude of forty to forty-five degrees,” jointly ask for the grant of exclusive trade privileges and “a more distinguished place” than that of others, and a “Figurative Map” (C. Pl. 21, Vol. II). The states-general promptly grants their request, for four voyages, to be made within three years, beginning January 1, 1615, or earlier. This document, which contains the names of the merchants and their ships, reads (translated) as follows:

“The States General of the United Netherlands to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Whereas Gerrit Jacob Witgen, former burgomaster of the city of Amsterdam, Jonas Witten and Simon Morissen [an error for Simon Willemens Nooms—see Aug. 13, 1614, which error occurs also in the 1644 report of the board of accounts (g.v.)], owners of the ship called the Little Fox, (not vois.), Captain Jan de Wit, master; Hans Honinger [Hunger, in the charter of the Dutch East India Co., art. XVIII], Paul Pelm, and Lambrecht van Tweekhouyse, owners of the two ships called the Tiger and the Fortune, Captains Adrian Block and Hendrick Cornelissen, [Christiaensz.], and Hendrick Cornellis, [Christiaensz.], and Hendrick Schenck, [Christiaensz.], and Hendrick Michiels, [Christiaensz.], and Hendrick van Epenow, [Christiaensz.], and Jan van Oldenbarneveldt, [Christiaensz.]. Early in the spring of this year, John Smith set sail from England, and, if true for the regions allotted in King James’s charter of 1606 to the Plymouth or Northern Co. In an open boat, with eight companions, he explored and surveyed the coast from Penobscot to Cape Cod, while the rest of his company remained employed in fishing.—Smith’s General History (1624), 204-5.

Sir Ferdinando Gorges dispatches a ship, commanded by Capt. Hobson, to New England to discover gold mines. Hobson, accompanied by an Indian named Epenow who was to guide him to the country of the merchants, and to bring them his account of his journey, having been sent by Epenow’s relatives and Epenow fled. The expedition failed to accomplish its purpose.—Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. of Am., III: 180, and authorities there cited.

By order of the Lords States General, "Signed, C. Aersen."—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 5-6; Great Place-Boken, I: 563-66.

Our accounts for the year 1614, and the statements made concerning the voyages made within the period of three years, to commence from the first day of January, 1615, or sooner, without being permitted, directly or indirectly, to any one else to sail, to frequent, or navigate, out of the United Netherlands, those newly discovered lands, havens, or places, within the space of three years as above, on penalty of the confiscation of the vessel and cargo, besides a fine of fifty thousand Netherlands ducats, for the benefit of said discoverers. Provided, however, that by these presents we do not intend to prejudice or diminish any of our former grants and concessions; and it is also our intention that if any disputes or differences should arise from these our concessions, that they shall be decided by the said company. We, therefore, expressly command all governors, justices, officers, magistrates, and inhabitants, of the aforesaid United Netherlands, that they allow said company peacefully and quietly to enjoy the whole benefit of this our grant, and to Interpose no difficulties or obstacles to the welfare of the same. In this year, Pocahontas visited England, and was received at court.

In this year, the Dutch navigator, Jacques Le Maire, who had been sent out by his father, Isaac Le Maire, on a voyage of exploration to the South Sea, which he purposed reaching through the Strait of Magellan, accidentally stumbled upon a much more direct passage, to the east of Tierra del Fuego, which passage was named after him, Strait of Le Maire. This discovery was one of the great geographical "finds" of the day.—See Vol. 1, p. 79, 82, 183.

So far as known, the earliest reference, in print, to the voyages of the Dutch in New Netherland, prior to and during the year 1614, and to the naming of the lands then discovered, is contained in a German manuscript, M. J. Frölicher, "Relationes, nostri continentes . . . . issued at Frankfurt a. M., in 1615. The passage reads (pp. 44-45, translated): "About this time [1614-October?] there arrived at Amsterdam some Dutch ships which had discovered a new country beyond Virginia and not far from New France, which they named New Holland, bringing with them from there to the natives there preserved to Block and Christiaensen and to Valentine and Orson, unless Frances is mistaken in the date of arrival of the ships.—See 1611: Sept. 7, 1612; 1616; Nov., 1615; June, 1615: it is said to be a very rich and productive country, especially in grain; therefore the Lords States determined to lay hold thereof, and to occupy the sea coasts with strong forts;—the voyage from Holland, there and return, it is said, can be made within six weeks." See Bibliography.

"The Deduction, or Brief and Clear Account of the Situation of New Netherland," etc. (N. Y. Col. Docs., II: 153), presented by the West India Co. to the states-general in 1660, after referring to the grant of trading privileges to New Netherland made on Oct. 11, 1614 (q.v.), continued "to which end [trading] they likewise, in the year 1615, built on the North river, about the Island Manhattan, a redoubt or little fort wherein was left a small garrison, some people usually remaining there to carry on trade with the Natives or Indians. This was continued and maintained until their High Majesties desired, in the year 1622 [1629], include this country of New Netherland in the charter of the West India Company. The "Deduction" cannot, however, be accepted as authoritative in connection with this very early period.

Under this date, Champlain, while on an exploring expedition in the country of the Hurons, refers in his journal to a place "on the 40° where the Dutch go to trade."—Champlain’s Voyages (1619 ed.). As Fort Nassau was in 42° 46’, this reference would seem rather to be to Manhattan Island. In the same place, he refers also to three Dutchmen who, in the preceding year (1614), had been captured by the Indians. This reference may be to Kleynes and his companions, a note concerning whom, written by Hendrickson, is found upon the second Figurative Map (Pl. 24, Vol. II). It is possible that these Dutchmen were captured while on an exploring expedition from Fort Nassau to the Susquehanna and Delaware Rivers, as suggested by Broedel, and that the discovery of this neighborhood shown on the second Figurative Map were made by Hendrickson on an expedition to ransom them. See II: 75 et seq., and Broedel, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 78. See also Aug. 18, 1616.

"Sir Richard Hakluyt [Hawkins] undertook by authority from the Council of the second Colony to trie what service he could do them in Praes and North-America. He says: "Having received his Commission and Instructions, he departed in October 1615, and spent the time of his being in those parts [New England] in searching of the Country, and finding out the commodities thereof, but the [Indian] war was at the height, and the principal Natives almost destroyed, so that his observation could not be such as could give account of any new matter, more than formerly had been received, from thence he past along the coast to Virginia, & stay’d there some time, in expectation of what he could not be satisfied in, so took his next course for Spain, to make the best of such commodities as he had got together, as he coasted from place to place having sent his Ship laden with Fish to the Market before, and this was all that was done by any of us that yeare."—Gorges, "A Briefe Narration," etc., ch. 17 in Am. Painted to the Life (1659).

This book contains the earlier history of the city of New York, with many valuable maps, charts, and prints. It is well worth the attention of all who are interested in the history of the city, and it is highly recommended to all who wish to study the early history of the United States.

The book is divided into three parts: The first part contains a brief account of the history of the country, with special reference to the early days of the colony. The second part is devoted to the early history of the city, with a detailed account of the founding and early growth of New York. The third part is devoted to the history of the city up to the present time, with a special emphasis on the development of the city as a major financial center.

The book is written in a clear and concise style, with a good balance of fact and interpretation. It is well-organized, with a logical progression of ideas. The author has done an excellent job of summarizing the key events and figures in the history of New York City, and he provides a wealth of detail and insight into the city’s development.

Overall, this book is an excellent resource for anyone interested in the history of New York City. It is well-written, well-researched, and highly informative. It is highly recommended to anyone who wants to learn more about the history of the city.

A story that has had currency among historians of New York is the allegation, said to have a traditional origin, that "the first formal treaty of alliance between the red man and the Hollander" in New York was concluded in this year with the Five Nations, on the commanding eminence which the Mohawks called Tawasentha, overlooking the river at the mouth of the Tawasentha, the present Norman's Kill—Brodhead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 81.

More modern writers, however, discount the so-called treaty of Tawasentha. There is absolutely no contemporary evidence to support it, either in documents or printed works. The first formal treaty with the Iroquois was made by the English, at Albany, on Sept. 24, 1664 (p. 97).—Beauchamp, Hist. of N. Y. Iroquois (Albany, 1859), 172-73, 216. Ruttenber, in Proceedings of N. Y. State Hist. Ass'n, VII: 180; General Entries, IV: 41 (N. Y. State Library Bulletin, History No. 2, 110).

On a map by Willem Jansz. Blaeu, undated, but issued at about this time, the insularity of Manhattan Island is first shown on a printed map. This important map bears the title "Paiskaart van Guine, Brasilia en West Indien, etc." and is reproduced in Vol. II, C. Pl. 25 and 27. See also Cartography, Page 198 et seq.

This is also the first printed map on which New Netherland ("Nieu Nederland") appears, and the first approximately accurate detailed map of the east coast of North America.

About this time, Sir Richard Vines passed a winter on the New England coast, probably at Saco. He lived in the cabins of the Indians—Winnor, Nor. & Crit. Hist. of Am., III: 182, and references there cited.

The following petition of the owners of the ship "Bontecoe" to the states-general, although not relating directly to New Netherland, is interesting as containing the names of David Pietersen (de Vries), Lambert van Twenhuyzen, and Jan Jansen Bleeker (perhaps the father of the early Albany settler of that name):

"To the High and Mighty Lords the States General, etc.

Show with due reverence, Pieter Janssen Lijorno, burgomaster of the city of Hoorn, Cornelis and Claes Veen, also burgomasters, Outjer Jacobsen, Cornelis Tecmaen, Willem Janssen Becker, David Pietersen, Lambert van Twenhuyzen and Hendrick Camperbeek, all owners of the ship named the "Bonte Koe," of which Willem Tibrants van Hoorn is master, which ship, being of more than one hundred and thirty lasts burthen, sailed in August 1617 from Amsterdam in this country, laden with all sorts of merchandise and which aforesaid ship with its cargo was taken by the Turkish freebooters. And whereas it has now come to the knowledge of the petitioners that the aforesaid ship and goods have again been taken from the said pirates by the Spaniards and been brought in at Gibraltar, the petitioners intend to send Jan Jansen Bleeker to bring about that the petitioners may obtain the restitution of the aforesaid ship and goods, for so far as they have been taken by the Spaniards to Gibraltar. The petitioners therefore request that your High Mightiness may be pleased to grant them favorable letters of recommendation to his Royal Majesty of Spain and to the Governor and Admiral commanding at Gibraltar, in order that they, the petitioners, may obtain restitution of the aforesaid ship and goods, for so far as they may have been brought up."

The charter granted by the states-general to the New Netherland Co. expired. It was not extended, but trade was hereafter thrown open to all until the grant of the charter of June 3, 1621 (p. 29) to the West India Co. See Oct. 1, 1614.

"The Thirty Years War" between Catholic and Protestant Europe begins with a revolution in Bohemia. —"George," sails from Virginia carrying letters from Argall, Rolle, and others. In one, the governor writes to the lords of the Council of Virginia that he has "provided sundry stuff for ye College."—Brown, The First Republic in America, 278-79. dated, and fills seventy-four volumes; although a careful search for this letter has been made, it has not as yet been found. This is the first of the first reference to the founding of an institution of learning in North America. See, further, May 26, 1619.

The records of the privy council previous to May 1, 1615, were destroyed in the great fire of Whitehall, which occurred late in this year. Hudson's maps and papers were perhaps consumed in this fire.

The following items, belonging to the years 1617, 1618, and 1619, although they do not relate directly to New Netherland, indicate a strong likelihood that, as there was a regular trade between Holland and the Spanish colonies in the West Indies and Brazil at that time, some of the ships went to Virginia, and even far north as New Netherland:

On Dec. 16, 1617, Wyant Kyser, consul at Algiers, wrote to the states-general: "Having written this two days ago, there came in Soliman reys, who took at one of two prizes a small vessel from the West Indies, laden with tobacco, so that he has a good price. He also took a flute from Schiedam, which after having robbed it of its guns and sail, he let go. . . ."—Heeringa, Bronnen tot Geschiedenis van de Lentevaart Handel, (Rijks Geschiedkun-Under date of Feb. 2-17, 1618, he recorded: "The 8th, being again at the paga and having obtained there a slave, who had come with a ship from the West Indies, where he had been a slave, I tried every way to induce the captains to come ashore, but did not succeed.«—From Journal of Wyant Kyser, in Heeringa, Bronnen (ed.), 777.

On July 16, 1619, "They brought in also a ship from Brazil, floating the prince's flag, thinking thus to escape. . . ." From letter of Kyser to the states-general, Sept. 2, 1619, in Heeringa,

In papers submitted to the common council on July 7, 1618, relating to the repeal of the Bolting Act, the statement is made that in the "Year of Our Lord 1618 The City of New Yorke was founded," p. 11-12. In the respect of the Dutch Nation and had Granted to the Inhabitants then settled by the States General of the United Provinces And the West India Company the Several Rights and Privileges Recited In A Schedule heretounto Annexed
. . . ."—M. G. C., II: 36, 43

As the West India Company did the request of the abovementioned statement, he sailed from Kenedeck to Virginia, having determined, as he wrote Purcham, "with Gods help to search the Coast along, and at Virginia to find us solers for a second discovery, if the first failed." On this voyage, he passed through Long Island Sound, Hellgate, and the Narrows. He described his experiences as follows:

"In my way I discovered land about thirteen leagues in length [Long Island Sound], but the land was ultimately found to be true, in which I feared I bad been imbyued, but by the helpe of an Indian I got to the Sea againe, through many crooked and strait passages. I let passe many accidents in this journey occasioned by treacherie, where we were compelled twice to goe together by the eates, once the Sausages had great advantage of us in a straight, not above a Bowes shot, and where a multitude of Indians fayt at us from the banke, but it pleased God to make us victuors: noore unto this we found a most dangerous Catwact amongst some small rockie Islands, occasioned by one unequal ydles, the one eibing and flowing to houres both before and after the Sunne which was successed by the strength of the current, but found it deeppe enough:
from hence we were carried in a short space by the yedles swittinesse into a great Bay (to us so appearing) but indeed is broken land [the Upper Bay], which gau we light of the Sea here, as I said, the Land treded Southerly. In this place I talked with many Saliages, who told me of two sundry passages to the great Sea on the West [the Hudson and the St. Lawrence (?), or possibly the Delaware], offered me Pilots, and one of them drew mee a Plot with Chalke upon a Chest, whereby I found it a great Island, parted the two Seas [cf. Pl. 14, Vol. III]; they report the one scarce passable for small ships, perilsious for all, and the other most greate.

Hauing receiued these directions, I hastened to the place of great hope, where I purposd to make triall of Gods goodnesse toward us, and use my best endeuour to bring the truth to light, but we were but onely shewed the entranc, where in seeking to passe we wereforced bace with contrary and overblowing winde, hardly escaping both our lives. Being thus overchargd with weather, I stood aloong the coast to seeke harbours, to attend a faourable gale to recovery the strait, but being a harboorlesse Coast for ought we could then perceive, we found no succour till wee arrived betwixt Cape Charles and the Maine on the East side the Bay Chesapeake.

Derner arrived at "James City" and went from there to "Cape Barde his Plantacon," where he, with others of his crew, while engaged in decking the pinnace, was "brought even unto deathes door" by fever. Winter (1619-20) having in the main time set in, Derner decided to "choose a more temperate season" for further exploration, "for both the general good and our own safenes. And thus," his letter to Purchas adds, "I have sent you a broken disourse, though indee very vavuilling to have gauen any notice at till, it ill had pleased God to have balueed mee with a thorow search, that our eyes might have wittessed the truth. I hauve drawe a Plot of the Coast, which I dare not yet part with for fear of danger, let this therefore serue for confirmation of your hopes, till I can better performe my promise and your desire. . . ." Derner ends his letter by the assurance that there is a great sea to the west upon which ships come "many times." The letter was dated from Captain Martyn's plantation, Dec. 27, 1619—Thomas Derner's Letter, in Purchas His Pilgrimes, IV: 1728-79.

Another account of Derner's voyage in 1619 is contained in A brief Relation (ed.), London, 1614, not pagd (see also Purchas, IV: 1827). Having arrived at the Kenesey from Newfoundland, expecting to join Rocraft, Derner found him absent, and later heard from Virginia, "by a Ship that came thence to fish for the Colony," of Rocraft's death. Derner thereupon decided "to take the Pinnace, that the yeere before was assigned to Rocraft, for him of the Newe Netherland. The other no question to be made of him on his designe, and so embarked himselfe and his provision and company in her. And leaving the Fisher-men to their labour, he coasted the shores from thence, searching every Harbour, and compassing every Cape-land, till hee arrived in Virginia where been he was in October, until June. . . ." His statement is mani-festerly in error, in so far at least as that company is concerned.

During the summer of this year, Capt. Thomas Derner, who in 1616-8 had been associated with Capt. John Smith in Newfoundland, was employed by Sir Ferdinando Gorges, of the Plymouth Company, for explorations along the coast, the principal object of which was the discovery of a western passage. He sailed from Kennebeck to Virginia, having determined, as he wrote Purcham, "with Gods help to search the Coast along, and at Virginia to find us solers for a second discovery, if the first failed." On

The former directors of the New Netherland Company, on whom a charter was granted on Oct. 14, 1641, appeal to the Prince of Orange for two war vessels to accompany a band of colonists. They explain that their charter having expired, “so that every one is now at liberty to trade there, they have again sent thither two ships, in order to preserve the reputation [continuity—] of said trade; and that some return may be made as much by them there, who have borrowed, besides the likelihood of more to come in; for m. ’Treasuror having some conference w’th the Bishop of Lichfield, he hath not heard of any Collect on that hath beene for that business in his Diocese; but promiseth when he hath a warre thertoewill he procure further the two ships. Whereupon the sentence is ceased it the fittest; that as yet they should not build the Colledge, but rather forbear a while; and begin with the means they have to provide and settle an Annuall revenue, and out of that to begin the erection of the said Colledge: And for the performance hereof also mov’d, that a certaine peace of Land be Laid out at Henrico being the place formerly resolved of w’th should be called the Colledge Land, and for the planting of the same according to order, and to have halfe the benefit of their Labor and the other halfe to goe in setting forward the worke, and for maintenane of the Tutora & Schollers. He therefore proposed that a shipp might be provided severallly to secure, provision to carrie these fifty men w’th their provisions, as also to send fifteene persons more to the Co’hno Land w’th may raise a Stock for the paying of duties there and defraying the Companies charge here, and to send provision of victuals w’th them for a year: And for the defraying the charge hereof did also propose the means; first for the Colledge there was mony in Cash, and besides it may saue the Joint stock the sending out a shipp this yere, w’th for a 48 a pound they will bring from thence all their Tobacco w’th may arrive to five hundred pound besides mony that may come in otherwise to helpe to bear the charge of the voyage; With Proposition was well liked but the time and season not allowed of all, and by some objected, that the General Plantation should recuse much mony if more men were sent sooner see sodanly before those that are already gone have procured where’th all to subsist; as also being a matter of great consequence it did more properly belong to the deciding of a Quarter Co’s: but the former reasons being answered; and being further allowed if it were till then prolonged the time would be past for their provisions of beefe, beer, and meate. Whereupon after Long arguing and disputing thereof it was agreed to be put to the question; W’th being proposed whether a shipp should be set out to carry men for these two good vies and be set out at the publique charge—viz. 3/4 w’th to Passengers for the Colledge Land, and 10/ for the Co’hno Land, it was by general consent, and erection of hand allowed and confirmed.”—Rees. of the Virginiacomp. 1, 120–21. Another account of Dormer's voyage in this year is given in A briefe Relation of the Discovery and Plantation of New England, London, 1622, not pag'd, but on the title of signature C, and without a date (contained, also, in Purchas, IV, 1627-32). After describing Dormer's voyage from Kennebec to Jamestown in 1619, the delays due to the illness of his crew, and the winter season, the account states that Dormer, "in time convenient [probably in the early spring of 1620] put himselfe to Sea againe, resolving to accomplish in his journey back to New-England, what in his last Discouery he had omitted. In his passage he met with certaine Hollanders, who had a trade in Hudson Rier some yeeres before that time, with whom he had conference about the state of that coast, and their proceedings with those people: whose auncie gave him good content. He betook himselfe to the following of his business, discovering many goodly Rivers, and exceeding pleasant and fruitfull Coasts and Islands, for the space of eightie leagues from East to West, for so that Coast doth range along, from Hudson Rier to Cape James."

Disputes over the patent to New England lasted for two years, "so as all men were afraid to ioyne with vs," and it was decided to recall Dormer; "but this worthy Gentleman confident of the good likely to ensue, and resolutely resolving to pursue the ends he aymed at, could not be persuaded to looke backe, as yet; and so refusing to accept our offer, began againe to prosecute his Discouery, wherein he was betrayed by certaine new Saucies, who sodainly set upon him, giving him fourteen or fifteen wounds; but by his valour and dexteritie of spirit he freed himselfe out of their hands, yet was constrained to retire into Virginia againe the second time, for the cure of his wounds, where he fell sicke of the incontinence of that place and was forced to returne: so end this worthy Gentleman his days, after he had remained in the discovery of that coast two yeeres, giving vs good content in all hee vnder-tooke. . . ."

Sir Ferdinando Gorges, in his "Briefe Narration" (pp. 19-20, 30), in America Painted in the Life (1659), refers to Dormer's discoveries in the years 1619, 1620, and 1621 as follows, but gives no exact dates: After failing to find Capt. Rocra in the north, Dormer "shap'd his course from Sagadahock in forty-four degrees, to Capawake, being in forty-one and thirty-six minutes, sending me a journall of his proceeding, with the description of the Coast all along as hee past. Passing by Capawake, he continued his course along the coast from Harbour to Harbour till he came to Virginia, where he expected to meete with Rocra (as afores) but finding him dead, and all lost that should have supply'd him, he was forced to shiff as he could to make his returne. . . ." On the returne of this "Capawake" he had the misfortune to fall sick and die of the infirmitie many of our Nation are subject unto at their first coming unto those parts. . . .—From "A Briefe Narration" (etc.), 19-20, in America Painted in the Life (1659), in Mass. Hist. Soc. Collections (1857), 63.

It now seems clear that Dormer did not appear in person before the Virginia Co. on July 10, 1621, as is stated in Vol. II, p. 95, but that a report ( рассказал) prepared by him was presented to the meeting.

Of Dormer's visit to the Hudson River in 1620, Gorges writes further as follows: "But as Captaine Dormer, who (as I said) was coatting that Country, met with some Hollanders that were settled in a place we call Hudson's River, in trade with the Natives, who in the right of our Patent forbad them the place, as being by his Majestie's Grant, then they prevailed on him to the subject whereof he was mild or seard, nor found any of our Nation there, so that they hoped they had not offended, however, their communication removed them not, but upon the complaining of their intrusion to his Majestie, order was given to his Embassadours to deal with the States, to take some warrant of the place they took under them, and the goods by him granted to his Subjects who were verry seard of a part thereof, to which was answered, that they knew of no such thing, if there were any, it was without their authority, and that they had only enacted the company for the affaires of the West-Indies; this answer being returned, made us to prosecute our business, and to resolve of the removing of those Interlopers to force them to submit to the Government of those lands, to whome alone, that place belonged. "You may see how many hurrts I travailed under of all sides, and yet not come near my journey ends."—Ibid., 31.

The protest made by Sir Ferdinando Gorges against the Dutch "Interlopers" resulted in an inquiry by the privy council at Whitehall, to Sir Dudley Carleton, English ambassador to the Netherlands, on Dec. 15, 1621 (p. 54). Gorges' reference to "some Hollanders that were settled in a place we call Hudson's River" is, so far as known, the earliest reference in print, in English, to a Dutch settlement on the Hudson River, and the earliest known designation in an English document of the river by Hudson's name. See under 1614, for earliest use of the name. See also Vol. II, Cartography, p. 93 et seq.

The original merchants who had operated under the charter of Aug. 10, 1614, now represent to the states-general that, "having had a chartre to trade exclusivly to New Netherland, discovered by them, situate from the thirteend to about the fiftieth degree, no exclusive grant can properly be given to others—regarding the Trade on the Coast, or any of the Rivers of New Netherland," and begging that "the petitioners and other merchants of this Country" be allowed "to continue in the free trade they are pursuing there, and further that they be granted permission to equip some ships which they have in a sufficient state of forwardness."

This petition is made because the owners of a ship named the "Blyde Boordshek" (Bootschap) (Glad Tidings), commanded by Cornelis Jacobsen [May] of Hoorn, "having discovered some new Countries [between the Hudson and South Rivers] populous and fertile, abounding in all sorts of Timber and never discovered before," have asked for a grant or charter covering this territory. The petitioners, pro and con, are told to "consult together and see if they can agree in a friendly manner."—N. Y. Col. Docs., I 249, 1625.

It is to be noted that, whereas the original grant, of 1614, and the petition of 1616, included the territory from the 35th to the 45th degree, N. L., the petitioners now claim that their charter extends from the 34th to the 50th degree. As it proved impossible to reconcile the two groups of merchants, the "requested Charter" was refused, and the trade remained open to all.—Ibid., II 25.

The "May-Flower" (Bradford does not give this name in Sept. history; its first mention is found in his record of "The Fall of 6-16 their grounds which came first over in the May-Flower, according as their lots were cast, 1623)—Plymouth Col. Rec., XII: 4), with the Pilgrims aboard, sailed from Plymouth under a patent or charter granted by the Virginia Company on Feb. 21/2, 1620, to "John Peerce [John Pierce] and Associates, their heirs and Assignes."

We know from Bradford's journal that the charter which had been granted the Pilgrims by the Virginia Company on June 5, 1619 (Records of the Virginia Co., II 220-28), had then been finally abandoned. Although no absolute documentary proof has been found that they finally sailed under the Pierce patent, nevertheless, the available circumstantial evidence strongly supports such an assumption, which is now generally accepted. This evidence consists almost solely in the fact that Pierce's patent was "called in" at a court of the Virginia Company held on July 16, 1621, on the ground that the proposed settlement had never been made, Pierce having "taken a Patent of Sir Ferdinando Gorges and therupon sold his Company w^h in the lyname of the Northern Plantacion as by some was supposed to" and to relinquish the benefit of the Patent hee tocok of this Company, that therefore his said patent might be called in unlesse it might appeare hee would begin to Plante w^h in the lyname of the Soth- erne Colony, Hereupon the Comte appoynted Mr Roberte, Mr George, and Mr Smith, as they understood therein above all and certify at the next Courte what Answerse they should receive frome him."—Records of the Virginia Co., I 515. No further reference to the patent appears in the records. The statements contained in this minute seem clearly to refer to the "Mayflower" expedition, the Pilgrims, as we shall hereinafter see, having settled at what is now Plymouth, in an area under the authority of the askers, directly controlled by the Virginia Company, or rather by its subsidiary, the London Company, which, in accordance with the second charter, of May 23, 1606 (p. 7), extended as far north as Although, at the time of the "Mayflower's" departure, a new and enlarged charter, within the limits of the original patent to the northern colony (40° to 45°), was under consideration, this was not granted until Nov. 5, 1620; so that the provisions of the first charter affecting this territory had never been revoked or modified, and were still in force.

In this northern territory, the only settlement which had been made was that of Popham and Gilbert, at the mouth of the Kennebec River, which had been abandoned in 1608. As the southern boundary of this company, in accordance with the terms of the original grant, fell somewhat to the north of Boston, the country lying between this point and the Hudson constituted a sort of "No Man's Land." Cape Cod, where the Pilgrims landed, lay in this unassigned district. The Pilgrims may have had this fact in mind when they selected it as the site of their settlement, after they had been forced by the dangerous storms and breakers off Cape to abandon their original purpose of finding "some place about Hudson's river for their habitation."'

Realizing that the selected site lay without the confines of the London Company, within whose jurisdiction their patent from the crown referred to "the whole parts in the said province," they would, therefore, not be specifically subject to the control or regulations existing in the London Company's territory, nor to any other established government, they evidently thought it desirable, before landing, to bind themselves together under a "Company," with which, as the above-quoted passage might be fitly translated, "they might be as firm as any patient, and in some respects more sure."

In taking this action, they may also have been influenced by an order of the Virginia Company, issued on Feb. 2, 1620, the very day that the patent to John Pierce and his associates was granted. This order provided that "such Captains or leaders of the Narragansett Plains that shall goe there to inhabit by virtue of their Graunts and Plant themselves their Tannantes and Servantes in Virginia, shall have liberty till a forme of Government be here sett forth for them, Associating unto them divers of the grarest and discreetest[.] of their Companies, to make Orders, Ordinances and Constitutions for the better ordering and dyrectinge of their Servants and business Provided they be not Repugnant to the Lawes of England."—Records of the Virginia Company, I: 305.

Under the Pierce patent, and within the general jurisdiction of the Virginia Company, although outside of the boundaries of the London Company's patent, they were still possessed of certain powers of framing regulations for their own government, and in signing the "Compact" they clearly recognized and claimed this right.

A new patent for New England is granted by the king to Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Sir Francis Popham, and "their associates and successors," forty in all, who are incorporated as "the council establisht," in which many persons of the colony were represented, with power to trade and regulate, and governing of New England in America. By the terms of this patent, the corporation was invested "with the absolute propriety and exclusive jurisdiction of the territories thenceforth to be known as 'New England in America,' extending from forty to forty-eight degrees of northerly latitude, and in length, by all the breadth aforesaid, throughout the mainland, from sea to sea." A qualifying clause provided that the premises intended to be granted "be not actually possessed or inhabited by any other Christian prince or estate," nor be within the bounds of Virginia.—Brookhead, op. cit., I: 95-96, citing Hazard, I: 103-104, 145-146.

Nathaniel Morton, in New England's Memorial (Cambridge, 1669), after relating the details of the voyage of the "Mayflower," with the Pilgrim contingent on board, records (p. 12) their arrival off Cape Cod on Nov. 10, 1620, and refers to their intended destination as follows:

"After some little deliberation had amongst themselves with the Master of the Ship, they tacked about to stand to the Southward, to finde some place about Hudsons River, (according to their first intentions) for their Habitations: But they had not sailed that Course above half a day, but they fell amongst perilous Sholes and Breakers, and they were very farre intangled therewith, as they conceived themselves in great danger; and the wind shrinking upon them withall, they resolved to bear up againe for the Cape aforesaid: the next day, by Gods Providence, they got into the Cape harbour. Thus they arrived at Cape Cod, alias Cape James, in November 1620."—Cf. Bradford, Hist. of Plymouth Plantation, I: 152, which differs in some important particulars.

Then, Morton, who had been the secretary of New Plymouth, adds this accusation: "Nevertheless, it is to be observed, that their putting into this place was partly by reason of a storm [Bradford, speaking of the deliberations, and of the 'stande for the southward,' remarks "the wind and weather being favorable by which they were forced in, but more especially by the fraudulency and constivrance of the aforesaid Mr. Jones, the Master of the Ship; for, their Intention, as is before-noted, and his Engagement, was to Hudsons River; but some of the Dutch having notice of their intentions, and having thoughts about the same time of erecting a Plantation there likewise, they fraudulently hired the said Jones by delays while they were in England, and now under pretence of the danger of the Sholes, &c. to disappoint them in their going thither: But God out-shoots Satan oftentimes in his own Bow; for had they gone to Hudsons River as before expressed, it had proved very dangerous to them: for although it is a place farre more commodious, and the Soil more fertile, yet then abounding with a multitude of pernicious Salvages, whereby they would have been in great peril of their lives" (etc.). In the marginal note to the passage in which he charges the Dutch with fraudulently diverting the Pilgrims from their course to the "Mayflower," Morton adds: 'Of this Plot betwixt the Dutch and Mr. Jones, I have had late and certain Intelligence.'

"Worthington C. Ford, commenting upon the destination of the "Mayflower," in his edition of Bradford's Hist. of Plymouth Plantation, I: 159-60, remarks that the Pilgrims, in their decision to choose this corner of New England, which Morton mentions or suggests the incident, and it has been surmised that Thomas Willett, of the Leyden congregation, and the agent of the Plantation at Kennebeck, was the source of Morton's intelligence.

"Willett had gone to New York when it was captured by the English in 1664, and became the first mayor of the city. It is conjectured that Willett there learned of the intended "perfidy" of Jones, and passed the information to Morton.

"As Secretary of the Colony Morton would hardly have given currency to a mere rumour or unsupported narrative. On the other hand, the claims of the Dutch in New York at the time would not be the best source of history, whether the reporter was friendly or otherwise to the conquering English. There exists no really valid reason for rejecting the story, while no entirely acceptable theory can be formed to account for its remaining so long untold.

"One piece of corroborative evidence may be cited—Sir Joseph Williamson when preparing papers to serve as a justification of hostilities against the Dutch in New Netherland, wrote in 1665 as follows: 'Now in the year 1620 the difference formerly between Archbishop Whigfield and Mr. Cartwright, the leader of the Non-conformists, and others about church matters, was again revived, some of the English who were carried into Holland, converting to the Dutch sect of Calvinism, where afterwars being desirous to enlarge his Majesties empire in the west parts of the world, they in order thereunto, byced a ship at Tarzen [Ter Verde] in Zeeland of 500 tunns to transport themselves, beinge the number of 460 persons, to Hudsons river aforesaid, or the west end of Longe Island, having bene informed they were placed of encouraggement, in respect of the temperature of aire, situation and conveniency for trading. But the Dutch which transported the said English brake faith with them most perfidiously, landinge them, contrary to the agreement, at their shipinge, 140 leagues from the place, N. E. the barren Countrey, which is called Plymouth. So that by this the English, where the Dutch having thus deceitfully lodged our English, they in the latter end of the same yeare 1621, settled a Dutch factorye in the said Hudson's River, through fraud and treachery, to the wearing out of our English interest in that place, and contrary aise to their engagement given to Sir Samuel Argoll that they would come thereto no more. See that in pursuance of the said engagement, all they have there, both ships and goods, stands liable to confiscation.'—Letter of Sir Joseph Williamson, in Mass. Hist. Soc. Proceedings, X: 375.

Ford continues: 'It would be without profit to dissect this statement, and point out the many errors of fact contained in it. What gives it interest lies in the charge of treachery on the part of the Dutch against the Pilgrims, recorded one year early before the taking of New Netherland, and in a paper prepared to justify that act. The charge, in all probability, accompanied the English

Capt. John Mason, in a letter dated Apr. 2, 1621, endorsed by Secretary Cole, and probably addressed to him, says: "In ye yeares of our Lord God 1621 or thereabouts certaine Hollanders were upon the coast of New England trading with ye Indians betwixt Cape Cod and Bay de la Waare. . . . The said Hollanders as Interlopers fell into ye middle betwixt the said plantations and at their returne of their voyage aforesaid, published a Mapp in ye Low Countries of ye said sea coasts comprehended betwixt Virginia and Cape Cod, under ye title of New Netherlandts, giving ye name of ye Prince of Aruance to ye country and river of Manhata, where ye Dutch are now plantated, (as ye said country was many years before discovered by the Englishmen in their voyages to Virginia) and giving other Dutch names to other places to ye westward of ye said Aruance. And to Manhata they added soe that ye Dutch had been formerly discovered and traded into diverse tymes by several Englishmen, as may be proved. And St. Samuell Argall Kn. with many English planters were peregrine to goe and sitt downe in his lust of land upon ye said Manhata river at the same tyme when the Dutch intruded, with caused a Demure in their peeding unli King James, upon complaint of my Lord of Arundell with St. Fernandois Gorges Kn. and the said St. Samuel Argall (formely Govt. of Virginia) and Capt. John Mason of ye said Dutch Intruders in An. 1621 had, by his Maiesty order a lese of ye Lord of Dorchester their Ambassado? at ye Hague, questioned the States of ye Low Countries for that matter. [F. ante, 1620, Summer.]"

"Which ye Lords ye States by answer (as I take it) of their Ambassado? Sir Nowell Carrone did disclaim, disobeying any such act that was done by their people with yeir authority; ye sir Lord Baltimore (then Secretary of State) doe remember, and St. Fernandois Gorges and Captain Mason can witness yeir same. Nevertheless yeir yeares following, ye (as I take it) was 1622, the said Dutch under a pretended authority from ye West India Company of Holland, maintayned as they said by commission from ye said Prince of Aruance did return to ye foresaid river of Manhata and made plantation there, fortifying themselves there in two several places, and have built shipps there, whereof one was sent into Holland of 600 tunnes or thereabouts. And albeit they were warned by yeir English plantation at New Plymouth to forbear trade and not to make any settlement in those parts, letting them know that they were the territories of yeir King of England, yett nevertheless with proude and commumcating the same (for they seemd to be well disposed against such as should disturbe their settlement) they did persit to plant and trade, velying of Nation to the Indians and extolling their own people and countrey of Holland, and have made sundry good returns of commodities from thence into Holland; especially these years they have returned (as it is reported) 1000 Beaver Skynnes, besides other commodities."—N. T. Col. Decs. III: 16-17.

A charter is granted by the states-general to the West India Co., to take effect July 1, and to cover a period of 24 years. For a transcript of the more important provisions of this charter, see below. On June 10, 1622, and again on Feb. 11, 1623, to amplify the charter respecting the methods of subscription to the company, and concerning the salt trade.

The official Dutch text of this charter was printed originally in 1621, as a pamphlet. In the same year, an English translation appeared, also in pamphlet form. For bibliographical data, see West India Company, in the Bibliography, Vol. V. The full Dutch text of the charter, with an English translation by A. J. F. van Lier, appears in the Van Reneselaer Bouwier MSS., from which, for purposes of easy reference, the essential features are here transcribed in full (granulated), as follows:

"The States General of the United Netherlands to all who shall see these presents or hear them read, greeting. Be it known, that we, noticing that the prosperity of this country and the welfare of its inhabitants consist principally in navigation and trade, which from time immemorial has been carried on by this country with exceeding good fortune and advantage, and desiring of the aforesaid inhabitants not only be maintained in their former navigation, commerce and trade, but also that their commerce may be increased as much as possible, especially in conformity with the treaties, alliances, conventions and covenants concerning commerce and navigation formed with other princes, republics and nations, which we intend shall be punctually kept and observed in all their parts; and finding by experience that without the common help, aid and means of a general company, no profitable business can be carried on, protected and maintained in the parts hereafter designated on account of the great risk from pirates, extortions and the like, which are incurred on such long and distant voyages; we, therefore, many other and different pregnant reasons and considerations also us thenceunto moving, after mature deliberation of Council, and for very pressing causes, have resolved that the navigation, trade and commerce in the West Indies, Africa, and other countries hereafter designated, shall henceforth not be carried on otherwise than with the common united strength of the merchants and inhabitants of this country and that to this end there shall be established a general company which, on account of our great love for the common weal and in order to conserve the great and much sought trade and Manhata as Aruance, or at Cape Cod, or other places, and for the maintenance and strengthening with our help, favor and assistance, as far as the present state and condition of this country will in any way admit, and for that purpose furnish with a proper charter and endow with the privileges and exemptions hereafter enumerated, to wit:

"1. That for the period of twenty-four years no native or inhabitant of this country shall be permitted, except in the name of this United Company, from these United Netherlands nor even from any place outside of them, to sail to or trade with the coasts of the countries of Africa, from the Tropic of Cancer to the Cape of Good Hope; nor to or with the countries of America, or the West Indies, beginning at the south end of Terra Nova, through the Straits of Magellan, the Magallans, the Straits of Magellan, the Magellan, and other straits and passages situated thereto, to the Strait of Anfan (Bering Strait), neither on the North Sea nor on the South Sea, nor to or with any islands situated on the one side the other, or between both; nor to or with the Australian or South Lands, extending and lying between the two meridians of the Cape of Good Hope in the east, and of the east end of New Guinea in the west, inclusive. . . except only, that they, who before the date of this charter shall have sailed from these or other countries to any of the aforesaid shores, shall be permitted to continue their trade till they have sold their goods and come back to this country, or otherwise until the expiration of their charter if they have been granted any before this date, and no longer. Provided that after the first of July, sixteen hundred and twenty-one, the day and time of the commencement of this charter,

no one shall be permitted to send any ships or goods to the places preconcerted in this charter even if this Company should not be fully organized before that date....

"II. That further the aforesaid Company, in our name and by our authority, and within the limits hereinbefore mentioned have power to make contracts, leagues and alliances with the princes and natives of the countries therein comprised also to build any fortresses and strongholds there; to appoint, transfer, discharge and replace governors, troops and officers of justice and for other necessary services, for the preservation of the places, the maintenance of good order, police and justice, in general for the furtherance of trade, as according to circumstances they shall see fit; moreover, they may promote the settlement of fertile and inhabited districts, and do all that the service of this country and the profit and increase of trade shall require. And the [directors] of the Company shall regularly communicate to us and transmit such contracts and alliances as they shall have made with the aforesaid princes and nations, likewise [report] the situation of the fortresses, strongholds and settlements by them begun.

"III. Provided that when they have chosen a governor general and prepared instructions for him, the same must be approved, and the commission given by us; and further, that such governor general, as also other vice governors, commanders and officers, shall be obliged to take the oath of allegiance to us and to also the Company....

"XI. Agreeing that the Company may have a good government, to the greatest profit and satisfaction of all the participants, we have ordained that the said government shall be vested in five Chambers of directors—one at Amsterdam which shall have the management of four ninth; one Chamber in Zerland, of two ninth; one Chamber on the Maze, of one ninth; one Chamber in the Noorder-quartier, of one ninth; and the fifth Chamber in Friesland together with Stadt ende Londen [province of Groningen], also of one ninth—upon the conditions set forth in the register of our resolutions and the agreement drawn up respecting it.
And the proviso is that in those in which there are no Chambers shall be accommodated with as many directors, divided among the respective Chambers, as the number of hundred thousand guilders which they shall furnish to the Company.

"XII. That the Chamber of Amsterdam, shall consist of twenty directors; the Chamber of Zealand of twelve; the Chambers of the Maze and of the Noorder-quartier each of fourteen; and the Chamber of Friesland together with the Stadt ende Londen also of fourteen directors....

"XVIII. That so often as it shall be necessary to have a general Assembly of the aforesaid Chambers, it shall be by Ninteen persons, of whom eight shall come from the Chamber of Amsterdam, four from Zealand, two from the Maze, two from the Noorder-quartier, two from Friesland and Stadt ende Londen; provided, that the nineteenth person, or so many more as we shall at any time think fit, shall be deputed by us for the purpose of helping to direct the affairs of the Company in the aforesaid Assembly.

"XIX. By which general Assembly of the aforesaid Chambers, all matters relating to this Company shall be considered and decided; provided, that in matters of war, our approbation of their resolution shall be asked.

"XX. The said general Assembly being summoned, it shall meet, whenever they are about to fit out, to resolve how many ships they shall send to each place for the account of the Company in general, and no individual Chamber shall be per-mitt ed to undertake anything not included in the aforesaid common resolution but [all] shall be bound to carry it into effect and to execute it.

"XXI. The said general Assembly shall be held the first six years in the city of Amsterdam, and the following two years in Zealand; and so alternately in the aforesaid two places....

"XXV. The ships returning from a voyage shall come to the place they sailed from; and if, by stress of wind and weather, the vessels which sailed out from one district shall arrive in another —as those from Amsterdam or the Noorder-quartier in Zealand or the Maze; or from Zealand in Holland; or from Zealand, in Stadt ende Londen, in another district—each Chamber shall nevertheless retain the direction and management of the ships and goods it sent out and be allowed to send and transport the goods to the places whence the vessels sailed, either in the same or other vessels....

"XXXVII. Whenever any ship shall return from a voyage, the admirals or commanders of the fleets, ship or ships shall be obliged to come and report to us the success of the voyage within ten days after their arrival and shall make out and deliver a report in writing, if the case requires it.

"XXXIX. We have, moreover, promised, and do promise, that we will maintain and defend this Company against every person in [their rights of] free navigation and trade....

"XLV. ... We further promise that we will maintain and uphold the Company in the contents of this our charter, by all treaties of peace, alliances and covenants with the neighboring princes, kingdoms and countries, without suffering anything to be done or transacted that might tend to diminish its value....

"From a translation by A. J. Van Leur of the original charter in Van Rensselaer Brief MSS., 87-115.
Sir Dudley Carleton writes to Secretary Calvert from the Hague (extract): "Here hath been with me of late a certain Walloon {q.v.} Jesse de Forest—see 1623, July 16, an inhabitant of Leyden, in the name of divers Families, Men of all Trades & Occupations, who desire to go into Virginia, & there to live in the same condition, as of others of his Majesty's Subjects, but in a Town or incorporation by themselves; which being a matter of some consideration, I required of him his demands in writing, with the Signature of such as were to be part therein: both which I send your Honor in a Packet [i.e., the well-known 'Return of the Enclosed Document A Walloon Family in America,' by Mrs. Robert W. de Forest, Vol. I; & howersoever the demands are extravagant in some points, yet if his Majesty like of their going thither, they may be made more capable of the nature of the Plantation, to which purpose they will send one (upon the first word they shall have from me of his Majesty's pleasure) expressly to treat with our Company in England. The States [General] have by public Placart authority a West-India Company (as I formerly advertised your Honor) to which Officers are appointed, & they have made their publications in that direction: but they do not improve it so slowly, & no Man can see where the Money for this purpose will be raised, yet do great effects many times succeed of less beginnings.
I send your Honor herewith a translat [sic] of the States act for that Company.—Sir Dudley Carleton's Letters and Despatches, Library. See also Boild, Huguenot Emig. to America, I: 175-187.

The reply of the directors of the Virginia Co. was not favourable, and De Forest therefore presented his petition, in April, 1622, to the states of Holland and West Friesland, who referred the matter to the directors of the West India Co., still in process of formation.
(See April 1, 1621). The eventual result of this petition was that De Forest and the other "pères de familles" sailed for Dutch Guiana, in the "Pigeon," on July 16, 1623 (q.v.).
Traders to Virginia (New Netherland) petition the states-general "to be allowed to send out some ships to bring their returns thence to this Country, as the trade and commerce thither are out to be lost before the West India Company be formed and ready." The petition is granted, on condition that the traders return to Holland 15, a similar request was granted to Hendrick Elkeen, Hans Jooris Houten, and Adriaen Janssen Engel, "com sociis" merchants in Amsterdam, to send a vessel called the "White Swan." This vessel Janssen Houten, master, to "New Virginia," also upon condition that they return by July 1, 1622.—Ibid., I: 26. On Sept. 24, still another similar petition was granted upon the same terms to Dierck Volkertse, Doctor Versus (Velius), and Doctor Carstabius, of Hoorn, Pieter Namick of Medemblik, and Cornelis Volkertse and Pieter Dirckzen Schoinders.—Ibid., I: 26. On Sept. 29, other merchants,

In this year, the Bishop of London raised $10,000 toward the college in Virginia.—Fidele, Old Virginia and Her Neighbours, I:—234–235. See also June 25, 1618, and May 26, 1619.

The first edition of the well-known poem, "Beweij's wande van Goudidienst (Proof of the true Religion)," written by Hugo Grotius while imprisoned in the castle of Loovesteyn, was published in this year. Some lines of this poem give a description of America, in which we find the words:

"Waren een schoon Landsouw met Florida belend Werdt den soeten naam van Nederland bekend." (Whereof a beautiful country bordering on Florida Is known by the sweet name of Netherlands.)

This is the exact wording in which this name is found. Sir Dudley Carleton sends a protest to the states-general against any Dutch settlement to the lands to which the king of England has already given a patent, he "having incontestably the right to the said country." The Dutch are warned not to send the ships "already equipped for said voyage," and to stop "the ulterior prosecution of said plantation."—N. Y. Col. Docs, III: 8. See Dec. 15, 1621, and March 16, 1622.

Sir Carleton, Ambassador from the King of Great Britain, Mar. 1621 recommended that their High Mightinesses would adopt a resolution to Dr. Wierda, in Amsterdam, to be submitted to the States-General, resolute to send to the Council of the India Company, for examining the paper relative to the families to go to the West Indies, approve of the plan, but think it better to postpone action until "the Directors should be formed."—N. Y. Col. Docs, I: 25. See July 19, 1621. The families who wished to go to the West Indies—a term then used to designate not only the islands now known as the West Indies but North and South America as well—were the Walloons, under Jesse de Forest. Their sailing was postponed for over a year, but on July 16, 1621, eleven "pères de familles," including Jesse de Forest and Jehan Moumier de la Montagne, "étudiant en médecine," left for the "Wilk Coast" (Guiana), in the "Pigeon," it being deemed advisable by the directors of the W. I. Co. to risk the lives of women and children until a site for a colony had been selected and some preparation made to safeguard the families. Accompanying the "Pigean" part way, went the "Mackelev," bound for New Netherland. No record exists of the name of the captain, nor of the number or character of the passengers on the "Mackelev," except that we know from Wasseaner that the "worthy Daniel Van Klreekbeek" went along as supcercargo, and that she arrived at the Hudson River on Dec. 12, 1623 (p. 8).—De Forest, A Walloon Family in America, II: 191 et seq. We are indebted to Wasseaner, Historisch Verhaal, in Jameson’s Nou.Neth., 75, 76. Ambassador Carleton having "recommended that a resolution be passed on the communication he had made on the part of his Majesty, regarding the Island of Virginia," the states-general resolves "that the said communication shall be examined, together with what has been published in print at Amsterdam on this subject."—N. Y. Col. Docs, I: 18. At its meeting on Nov. 21, 1621, the Virginia Co. granted a commission for fishing and trading to Capt. Thomas Jones, master of the "Discovery," a vessel of 60 tons. Jones reached Jamestown in April, and on his return to England visited New Plymouth in August. Bradford, in his History, records his arrival, and that of a "gentleman by name Mr. John Porey; he had been secretary in Virginia, and was now going home passenger in this ship, speaking of Jones and the "Discovery," were set out by some merchants to discover all the harbors between this and Virginia, and the shoals of Cap-Cod, and to trade along the coast where they could."—Bradford, History of Plimoth Plantation (Ford ed.), I: 276–78.

John Porey wrote a journal, which was recently acquired by the John C. Brown Library. This journal was published in 1918, with an introduction and notes by Chapin Burrage. From Part III of this book, the following "coppel of a parte of Mr Porey’s Letter to the Governor of Virginia" is taken:

Sir Ferdinando Gorges and John Mason obtain a patent for lands between the Merrimac and Kennebec Rivers, called Laconia. —It is alleged, evidently through an error, that New Netherlands in this year became a political entity, was formally constituted a "Province," and formally granted the armorial rights of a countship. The error has descended from Dr. O'Callaghan who, in Doc. Hist. N. Y., I: 4 (40 ed.), presents an item on the "Seal of New Nederland," "A Patent from the King of France," dated 1644. Copied from an impression in the office of the Secretary of State." In his account of this plate, O'Callaghan says: "This is the first public seal of the Province, and is thus described: Argent, a Beaver, proper; Crest, a Coronet; Legend, Sigillum Nov. Belgii. In a paper by Van der Donck, entitled, "Further observations on the Petition of the Commonalty of New Netherlands," it is stated that New Netherland was called a Province, because it was invested by their High Mightinesses with the arms of an Earl. The engraving is copied from an impression of the seal in the office of the Secretary of State." His footnote reference shows that the seal he copied was found in the first volume of the series known as Land Papers. There is, however, no very early document in this volume with a seal of New Netherland. It is evident that an impression of a seal on a late document of the Dutch period was used for the plate, and that the date 1623 was assumed here, as also in his Hist. N. Neth., I: 99, because he had found in a volume of transcripts, known as Holland Documents, I: 39, the attribution cited by him as by Van der Donck. The transcript was one of a series procured in Holland by J. Romeyn Brouder. Later, the series was printed as Vol. I of N. Y. Col. Docs, where, in I: 162, the statement attributed to Van der Donck appears as the first volume of the "Proposals for New Nederland" (Albany 1804). The 1623 reference is made to the fact that "nunbrd colonists, as early as 1621, had been conveyed thither [New Netherland] with instructions to dwell there as free persons and to carry on trade, principally in the furs abounding in that country."

In this year, the first collected edition of Shakespeare's plays was published, in London.

It has been stated that about this year a blockhouse was erected on Manhattan Island, on the site where Fort Amsterdam was later built.—Moulton, Hist. State of N. Y., II: 367; Innes, N. Amsterdam & Its People, 154–52. There is no valid basis for this assumption. Innes makes the statement, but does not assign a date. Moulton is very often untrustworthy. In this case he refers to unverifiable tradition and to Lambrecht's Korte Beschrijving (1818); but Lambrecht bases his statement upon De Laet's Nieuwe Vriezen (1630), and De Laet plainly refers to the first year in 1624. The date 1623 is simply that at which the petition of the commonality is made to another fort of greater importance at the mouth of the same North River, upon an island which they call Manhattes or Manhathans Island," clearly refers to the fort streaked out in 1626, when the purchase of the island was made by Minuit.—Jamestown, N. Neth., 54; also p. 47, in relation to the earlier Fort Nassau, on Castle Island and 1624, for building and settlement of Fort Orange.

"The governor [of New Plymouth] also, with Hobamak and others, go to Manomet [in Buzzard's Bay], a town near twenty miles south of Plymouth . . . ; but the Dutch or English or both used to come."

"While the captain was at Manomet, news comes to Plymouth that Massassset is like to die, and that a Dutch ship is driven ashore before his house so high that she could not get off till the tides increase."

According to the second statement of Catalina Trico, she arrived in New Amsterdam at about this time, on the ship "Unity." For a discussion of her two statements, and conclusions therefrom, see 1624 (May).

In the spring of this year, the first settlement in New Plymouth was made, by David Thomsen at Little Harbor, on the south side of the mouth of the Piscataqua, in New Hampshire, and by the States General by the petitioners representing the commonalty of New Netherland. The additions were signed by the "Eleven Men," July 26, 1649. In explanation of the name "Province," the annotation says: "It is called a Province because it was invested, by their High Mightinesses, with the Arms of an Earl." Although nowhere else in the records has a reference to the earldom or countship been found, it is possible that the reference implies an expressed intention on the part of the states-general to constitute New Netherland a province of equal standing with the seven home provinces forming the Dutch Union, which provinces, having originally been countships, were entitled to bear the arms of a count. No seal is extant of 1623, as not even. Even not New Netherland was a province always in coordinate relations a country. The explanation is perhaps found in the fact that a seal was adopted by the directors of the West India Co. in 1650 (see Dec. 28, 1650, and Frontispiece, Vol. IV), which is surmounted by a coronet. When the petitioners of 1649 sought the support of the states-general, they endeavored to make their appeal rest upon convincing grounds, not without exaggeration, in this case as in others. The statements of O'Callaghan have been accepted by later writers, sometimes with exaggerated changes, as never without accuracy. For example, see Van Rensselaer, Hist. City of N. Y., I: 41. For further data regarding countship, see Dec. 28, 1650.

Into New Netherland, and upon both these rivers [the North and South Rivers] . . . several colonies have been sent by the Directors of the Chartered West India Company, from the very commencement of that company, to wit, from the year 1623, in order to continue the possession of those quarters, to maintain the trade in peltries.—De Laet, "Nieuwe Wereldt" (1630 ed.), in Jansenius' Narr. N. Neth., 53–54.

"At the same time that the forts were laid out on the North and Fresh rivers, since the year 1623, Fort Nassau was erected upon that river, which, as its presence, it called the South River. It was the first of the four, and was built with the same object and design as all the others. . . ."—From the Representation, in Jansenius' Narr. N. Neth., 315.

In a memorial addressed Nov. 25, 1613, by K. Van Renthoek to the W. I. Co. (p. 200 in Rep. Vredenbode MSS., 253), reference is made to the fact that "nunbrd colonists, as early as 1621, had been conveyed thither [New Netherland] with instructions to dwell there as free persons and to carry on trade, principally in the furs abounding in that country."

At last, after numerous "conferences, communications and deliberations," extending over a period of two years, the directors and chief participants of the Chartered West India Company now adopt certain articles of agreement, which are finally approved by the states-general.

This act provides that subscriptions to the company must all be in by the first day "after the last of October," and that within eight days thereafter a copy of the subscription-list to every chamber must be sent to the other chambers, "provided, that the former mentioned day shall not be any barrier, nor shall it be a bar to the subscription-list to any chamber which shall make it after the last of October, and that within eight days thereafter a copy of the same shall be sent to the other chambers."

The organization of the West India Co. is now complete, and it is ready to proceed with energy the objects of its incorporation. The agreement, which was made between the directors and the chief participants of the West India Company, reads (translated) as follows:

"Agreement made between the directors and the chief participants of the West India Company, with the approval of the High and Mighty Lords the States General. Dated June 21, 1623.

The States General of the United Netherlands, to all to whom these present papers may come, greeting be it known, that whereas, in a memorial directed to us by certain deputies of the chief participants of the chartered West India Company, Chamber of Amsterdam, setting forth that they presented themselves several times before the Assembly of the directors and also held a number of meetings with the committee appointed by them to the end that in due time proper rules and regulations might be adopted and established to the satisfaction of the good participants and that the business might the better and with the more profit be set in motion as soon as possible and subsequently be brought into proper operation, our approbation was requested of several articles presented to us for that purpose, either in the way of an amplification of their charter or else by framing an order for the aforesaid Chamber of Amsterdam or in such manner as we should find advisable; and whereas, before adopting any resolution thereupon, we thought fit, to send a copy of the articles to the respective Chambers of the West India Company, that they might carefully examine them, confer with the chief participants and send us deputies from themselves, as well as from the chief participants, fully empowered and authorized, for this purpose and whatever might serve to promote so necessary a business, to meet in mutual conference and if possible to come to final agreement, subject to our approval; and whereas these deputies of the respective Chambers, directors and chief participants, therewith came here in proper number and, in the presence and on the suggestion and persuasion of our delegates, after the holding of several conferences, communications, deliberations, and aforesaid meetings, made their report and revision to the chief participants, without prejudice to the provinces and respective cities, for promoting the West India business mutually agreed upon the following articles [the most important parts of which, only, are here given]:

I. That no alteration, extension or interpretation of the charter or acts depending thereon shall be sought by the directors or by the chief participants or any others, except after previous meeting, discussion and the approval of a majority of the directors and chief participants who shall be present at the meeting.

IV. That all accounts mentioned in the twelfth article of the charter shall be rendered in business form to the committee to be nominated by the chief participants, and admitted under oath, within the time mentioned in the said twelfth article, which committee shall make report thereof, only in gross to the other chief participants, and the said committee shall be bound by oath not to divulge, but to keep everything secret which the directors must keep secret. They shall moreover during the time of two years be subject to the prohibition in regard to buying or selling placed upon the directors by the thirty-first article of the charter.

VII. And that the other Chambers also may know of the business transacted by the said Assembly, the associate member from the Chamber of Amsterdam shall inform the chief participants of the Noorderkerk and Stadt ende Londen and the associate member from the Chamber of Zeeland those of the Most of the business of the aforesaid Assembly, as far as it shall be communicable.

IX. Whereas, in order to satisfy everyone, it is necessary that the time for subscribing and contributing to this Company shall be extended further, for the satisfaction of our own inhabitants as well as of foreigners, therefore, be the aforesaid subscriptions extended for inhabitants to the last of August, and for foreigners to the last of October next, both new style, and the fact made known by posting of notices; after that date, no person may be received or admitted, but every Chamber must close its subscription lists the first day after the last of October, and eight days thereafter send a copy to us, that the other Chamber of Amsterdam already begun shall continue for the use of the Company, and that those who have furnished money in advance of others, or shall furnish it, shall receive interest thereon at the discretion of the Nineteen.

X. And as to the general accounting, mentioned in article sixteen of the charter, and the changing of a third part of the directors in article fourteen, to maintain good order and a general basis in all the Chambers, it is deemed necessary that the said general accounting be made (six years from the date of granting the charter, beginning the third of June 1621, new style) according to terningrijs, custom in public, in the presence of the aforesaid committee of the chief participants of the respective Chambers, and so on regularly every six years a like general accounting; . . . And the first change of a third part of the directors shall take place six years after the ninth of June this year 1623, and so on regularly every two years agreeable to the charter. [The copy of the Agreement in the introduction to Dr. H. N. verhulst's The Dutch West India Company, Verhollst has the third of June this year 1623, which is evidently the date intended.]

Therefore having examined and considered the foregoing [ix] articles and being desirous of promoting unity and concord between the directors and chief participants as well as the advancement of the West India Company, we have, with the advice of the Prince of Orange, thought fit to agree to and approve of, and do hereby agree to and approve the same and demand that they with the articles of the charter shall be strictly followed and observed by the directors, participants and every person concerned therein, in the same manner as if they were inserted in the charter; for we find this to be for the best interests of the West-India Company. "Given under our great seal, paraphe and the signature of our secretary, at the Hague, the twenty-first of June, sixteen hundred and twenty-three."—Fam Renissiur Statu MSS. (translated by A. J. F. van Laren), 127-35.

Jameson, in Nar. N. Neth, comments upon the formation and purposes of the West India Co. as follows: "The chief event of New Netherland history, in the period between the voyages of Blake and the Wicca, was the granting of the charter for the incorporation by the States General of the West India Company, June 3, 1621, under whose control New Netherland remained from that time to the English conquest in 1664. Willem Usselin, the founder of that company, . . . had been for thirty years agitating the formation of a West India Company which might repeat in the western world the achievements and prosperity of the Dutch East India Company, and might also play a more warlike part by attacking the King of Spain in his own colonial dominions. Party dissensions in the Dutch republic had hindered the promotion of the project, and the Twelve Years' Truce had stopped it for a time; but with the overthrow of Oldenbarneveldt and the resumption of war with Spain it was revived, and the company was chartered. "The "Chartered West India Company" was given a monopoly of trade between Dutch ports and the west coast of Africa and all the coasts of America. Within these ample limits it could form alliances with native princes and tribes, appoint and discharge governors and other officers, administer justice and promote trade and colonization. Under the superior control of the States General, its government was vested in five federated chambers or boards of managers, the chief one at Amsterdam, others representing the universities of Zealand, of the towns on the Maas, of North Holland and of the northern provinces of Friesland and Groningen. General executive powers were vested in the College of the Nine; and the government promised aid and protection. New Netherland was not specifically mentioned, and in all colonies the position and rights of Colonists were left to be defined by a corporation formed for war and commerce. Throughout all the earlier part of the company's history, its interest in New Netherland was far less than in the conquest of Brazil from Spain, the maintenance of Brazil as a Dutch colony, and the war against the Portuguese for its retention, ending with the Treaty of 1654.

"It was two years from the granting of the charter (June, 1621-June, 1623) before the West India Company had perfected its internal organization and become ready to prosecute with energy the objects of its incorporation. Meanwhile voyages of private adventurers had continued, the Pilgrims had established a permanent at Plymouth, and the English government had begun the long series of diplomatic attacks upon the Dutch title to New Nederland which ended in the English conquest of 1664."—N. Neth., 64-66.

The yacht "Mackerel," bound for New Netherland, sails from the Texel in company with the "Pigeon," which carries Jesse de Forest and his band of Wallonians, destined for the Amsterdams (see July 19, 1623). The vessels are to accompany each other "as the Amazons," on Sept. 14, however, they parted company near the Madeira Islands, in 31° 54', N. L., the "Mackerel" taking her course towards New Netherland.—Journal du voyage . . . pour visiter la côte de Guinée (Shone MS. 1798, in British Museum) translated by W. de Forest's J. Wallon Family in America, II: 101, 195, 205.

The "Mackerel" did not arrive in New Netherland until Dec. 14, which was indeed somewhat late, but it wasted time in the savage islands, to catch a fish [a Spanish prize], and did not catch it, so ran the luck. The worthy Daniel van Kweekheecboek, for brevity called Besch, was supercargo on it, and so did duty that he was thanked. (Mr. Van Lier thinks that this statement is ironical, and means that he was discharged.) The "Mackerel" remained in the river (probably near Castle Island) during the winter of 1623-4, and was still in the river in the spring of the latter year. The proper Maarten arrived with the Wallonians on Wallon Island. See April 1624.—Wassenaar, Historisch Verhaal in January, 76, Wassenaar gives the date of sailing of the "Mackerel" as June 16, but in the Journal of Jesse de Forest both the "Pigeon" and the "Mackerel" are recorded as finally sailing from the Texel at two o'clock on the afternoon of July 16 (perhaps June 16 was the day on which the latter left Amsterdam). The "Pigeon" had left Amsterdam on the first of the month, a few days only after "Orange Tree," "Eagle" ("Griffon"), and "Love," which, as "the fleet fitted out for Guineia," the author of the Journal refers to seeing outside of the Texel on the 16th. The Journal further states that the "Mackerel" and the "Pigeon" should sail in company with this fleet, but that no account of a few hours delay caused by a mishap to the "Mackerel," they were left behind.

To August or September of this year, Robert Gorges arrived in or Massachusetts Bay with passengers and families. He decided to settle at Wessagusset, but remained only a short time; his colonists dispersed, some returning to England and some going to Virginia. —Winsor, Nat. & Crit. Hist. Am., III: 304, and authorities there cited.

At a session of the "Assembly of the XIX" of the Dutch West India Company there was heard also Adriaen Joris, Tienpoint, skipper of another ship, our Dutch habit to have a full list of those who are far from home, for the purpose of being able to return home, having been in the Virgin Islands [New Netherland] and declaring they still have there in the river de Montagne [Hudson R.], some goods, 2 sloops and people. Requests therefore that they may have permission to make ready a yacht to trade, their merchandise and bring home those people (tulch), Whereupon, deliberation being had, it is resolved that those who have any goods or merchandise left there shall be dealt with fairly, in the same way as shall be done with those on the Gold Coast, for which a committee has been appointed to draft an order, with the advice of the Commandeur.

"As bringing home the people, it is thought necessary to send a ship to the Virginias, which shall be equipped by the Chamber of Amsterdam with the necessary cargo to continue the trade, for which purpose they may also take with them 5 or 6 families of the colonists (e off 3 famillien van de colonen), in order to make a beginning of settlement there and on that occasion bring back here the goods secured in return for the aforesaid merchandise and goods of the people."—Records of the old Dutch W. I. Co. at The Hague, No. 1 (lettered No. 447), part 3, item 45, trans. by A. J. F. van Laer. See also Jesurun, Kilijian van Rensselaer, pp. 1.

If the theory developed under 1626 (p. 49), that the "Nieu Verdieff" was in reality identical with the "Orange Tree," or that the former name is merely a mistranslating of the latter in the Muller catalogue description of Van Rappard Document A, the only place where it is known to appear, proved to be erroneous, the natural conclusion would follow that, as a direct result of this resolution, the "Nieu Verdieff" sailed about March 5th, 1624 (Van Rappard Doc. A), preceded early in the same month by the "Nieu Nederland."—See March, 1624.

This document, described for the first time in Vol. II of this work, goes far to corroborate the story of Catelina Trico that she came to New Netherland in 1624, under "Governor" Arian Joriszen (Tienpoint), or, as the later deposition reads, "with a Ship called ye Unity, whereof was Commander Arien Jorisse," although she was probably mistaken in giving the "Unity" as the name of the ship on which she sailed.—See 1623-4. Further corroboration of at least a part of her account is contained in a report dated Dec. 15, 1644 (p. 92), on the condition of New Netherland. In this report occurs the following statement: "In the years 1622 and 1623 [probably an error for 1623 and 1624], the West India Company took possession, by virtue of their charter of the said country, and conveyed thither, in their ship, the New Netherland, divers Colonists under the direction of Cornelis Jacobsz. Mr. of Amsterdam."—Tienpoint [Tienpoint] . . .—N. T. Col. Docs., I: 149.

Again, in the Representation of N. Neth. (1629), it is stated that: "After their High Mightinesses, the Lords States General, were pleased, in the year XV and twenty-two [1624], to include this Province within the Charter of the West India Company, the latter considered it necessary to take complete possession of this naturally beautiful and noble Province; this, indeed, did follow in course of time, but according as circumstances permitted, as in all beginnings; for since the year of our Lord XVII and twenty-three, four forts have been built there by order of the Lords Majors, one on the same spot of Wallon Island, one on the East and North rivers, and named New Amsterdam, where the staple right of New Netherland is designed to be. Another, called Orange, is in the Colonic Reselandszwyk, thirty-six leagues higher up on the west side of the last named river, three leagues below the Kakoo, or Great falls of the Mohawk river, but there never has been, as yet, any difference with foreigners about that (North) river. On the South river stands fort Nassou, and on the Fresch river, the Good Hope. In these four forts there has always been some garrison from the beginning to the present time, though just now they are all in a very poor condition, both as regards themselves and the garrison. These forts, as well north and south, were located not only to close and command the said rivers, but as far as property by occupation extended, to possess all the lands comprehended between them as round about them, and on the opposite side of the river, to declare them the Hope Company's own, and to guard them against all-oations whether foreign or indigenous, that would attempt to seize the same against its will and consent . . .

"All the islands, bays, harbors, rivers, kills and places, even a great way on the other side of New Holland or Cape Cod have Dutch names, which were given them long before they had any possession of and traffic with them; first began to discover and trade to those parts . . .—ibid, I: 285-87.

In the Deed also, one of the documents submitted to the states-general in 1660 (p. 49), concerning the boundaries of New Netherland, the statement is made that the W. I. Co. had built, "since the year 1623, four forts, to wit: two on the North river, namely Amsterdam and Orange; one on the South river, called Nassau, and the last on the Fresh river, called The Hope. From the beginning, a garrison has been always stationed and maintained in all these forts . . .—ibid, II: 433. It should be noted that the Representation and the Deed make the same error in giving 1622 as the date of incorporation of the West India Co., and that both are, in other respects, inaccurate.

In his letter to Samuel Blommaert, possibly written in the autumn of 1627, but more probably in the autumn of 1628 (p. 48), or Isaac de Rêulays: "The six farms, four of which he along the River Hellgate, stretching to the south side of the island, have at Nov.

In this year, goods and merchandise valued at 25,560 guilders were bought in Holland by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., and sent in two ships to New Netherland.—De Laet, Kort Verhael, 36, in his Historie (1644). There were imported into Holland from New Netherland 4,000 beavers and 700 otters, valued at 27,125 guilders.—Ibid., 39.

In this year, the name Hudson River ("Hudens R") appears for the first time on a map. This map, which was engraved by A. Goos, is found in Athanasius Inga, West-Indische Spiegel. The name appears again the following year in Brigg's map of "The Netherland America." The engraver is called "In Gaas" and is found in Parchus His Pilgrimes, III: 82-93 (Vol. I of which appeared in 1624). It is altogether likely that the author of Inga's map, as well as Brigg's, copied from an earlier original, now lost. See Cartography, II: 45, and 93-96. For the earliest mention of the name Manhattan, see Aug. 13, 1614.

The birth of the Dutch Reformed Church in North America took place this year, at Fort Orange (Albany), under Bastiaan Jansen Krol, "a visitant-beker" (visitor of the sick) or "zieken-trooster" (comforter of the sick), who came over with the first colonists to New Netherland, while Cornelis May was the first director there. The first call for "krankenbokkers" to go to the West Indies was made by the Church Consistory of Amsterdam, in September, 1623. Krol, who had been a "caffewoker" (silk or satin worker), at this time living on the Bloemgracht, in Amsterdam, was among those who presented themselves before this council, on Oct. 12, 1623, when he was aged 28 years, hence born in 1595. Krol had entered into a prentual contract, on Feb. 7, 1616, with Annetken Chrestoyel, aged 21 years, and the bonds were published for three consecutive Sundays thereafter. At this time he could not write, and therefore added his sign manual to the contract, whilst his betrothed wrote her name in full. On Aug. 16 of that year, their first child, a son, was baptized "Thonis" or "Teunis," in the Oude Kerk of Amsterdam, and this son is found in New Netherland for many years thereafter, principally employed as a shipper. Krol himself was baptized on Feb. 23, 1616, in the Nieuwe Kerk of Amsterdam, the church in which he had been married. He was not accepted at once by the church council for the post to which he aspired, but passed through a further examination, on Nov. 20, 1623, and, on Dec. 7, the council exhorted him to enter the service for the West Indies. Illness prevented his acceptance at this time, or he would have been destined for Pernambuco.

The principal duties of a "krankenbokker" were to read common prayers every morning and evening, as well as before and after meals; to faithfully instruct and comfort all the sick; to speak in particular to those who desired or had need of exhortation in the Scriptures, and, at opportune times, according to his calling, to read chapters from the Scriptures or from books by authors of the reformed religion, and even to read a sermon. He could not exercise functions allowed only to the ordained clergy, as, for example, the ordination of the sacraments.

Krol's first voyage and residence in New Netherland lasted only a short time. Evidently, he spent the summer months of 1624 there; but on Nov. 14, 1624, we find him at a session of the church consistory of Amsterdam, where he related that the colonists desired a "doctor of the faith" to be sent to them, "because children and instruction shall be given in the religion," or New Netherland, who awaited baptism. The council did not approve of sending a minister, because there were so few families in the colony. The colony referred to was in all probability the pioneer colony, at Fort Orange (Albany), and not, as Eckhod says, at New Amsterdam. Krol now sought and obtained authority to baptize and marry in New Netherland. The consistory vested him with this authority, on Nov. 21, 1624, so that he might prepare himself—this may indicate that the colonists had planted eight seasons (twice in 1627, twice in 1626, twice in 1625, and twice in 1624), which, in itself, were the letter written in 1627, would constitute pretty good proof that the settlement was established as early as 1623, as it would have taken some time to clear so large an amount of ground and prepare it for cultivation. If, however, the letter was written in 1628, which is more probable (see Autumn, 1628), the argument would, of course, suggest 1624 as the year of settlement.

The following additional information regarding Krol is copied from a footnote in "Minutes of the Amsterdam Chamber of the Dutch West India Company, 1635-6" (translated by A. J. F. van Laer), in N. T. Genealogical and Bing, Rec., XLI: 223:

"Bastiaen Jansen Crol, or Krol, from Harlingen, Friesland, was a coffee worker; or silk workers, by trade. He married in 1613, at Amsterdam, at the age of 20 years, Annetjen Stoffel's daughter, from Essen, aged 21. Krol made his first voyage to New Netherland as comforter of the sick in Jan. [see below, Jan. 25 and 28], 1624, and on Nov. 14, 1624, was back at Amsterdam. He sailed again for New Netherland, probably in May or June, 1625, and was commander of the ship. He was again in New Netherland, and returned to Holland. He sailed for the third time to New Netherland shortly after Jan. 12, 1630, and was once more commander of Fort Orange until the end of February, or beginning of March, 1631, when he succeeded Peter Minuit as Director General of New Netherland. He held the latter office until the arrival of Wouter van Twiller in April, 1633; then, at the latter's request, returned for a few weeks to Fort Orange to prevent Elken from trading there, and finally sailed for Holland in July, 1633. He seems to have remained there for three or four years, but in 1638 he was again commander of Fort Orange. In 1653 he was still in New Netherland, but on Sept. 21, 1645, he was back in Amsterdam. The date of his death is unknown."

The following transcript is copied from an "Examination of Bastiaen Janz. Crol, former director of New Netherland, being 79 years of age, conducted at the request of the patroons by Notary Justus van den Van, at Amsterdam, the 30th of June 1634, in Van Renschaver Boevers Manuscripts, 392:

"1. In what capacity, and for how long he [Bastiaen Janz. Krol] was in the service of the West India Company in New Netherland."

"He states that he set out as comforter of the sick and made a voyage and stay of 75 months in that country. He went out for the second time in the same capacity, and after he had been away about 15 months, he was appointed to the directorship at Fort Orange on the North River and held the same for three years. The third time he was thereafter, principally employed as a slipper. Krol himself was baptized on Feb. 23, 1616, in the Nieuwe Kerk of Amsterdam, the church in which he had been married. He was not accepted at once by the church council for the post to which he aspired, but passed through a further examination, on Nov. 20, 1623, and, on Dec. 7, the council exhorted him to enter the service for the West Indies. The entry of Jan. 25, 1624, is followed by entries of other appointments to the East and West Indies, of March 1625 and later years, so that the clerk's entry of Jan. 25, 1624, does not, necessarily, mean that Krol sailed on this day. The entry may indicate the date on which he received his final instructions as a visitor of the sick. When Krol had been prevented by illness from sailing in December, 1621, Geryt Pietersz. went in his place.

Wassenaer records, under this month, the preface to the — section being dated June 1, 1624, as follows: "Numerous voyages realize so much profit for adventurers: that they discover other countries, and lands, besides those already known. As Virginia, a country lying in 42 degrees, is one of these. It was first peopled by the French, afterwards by the English and is to-day a flourishing colony." —Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael, in Jameson's Nar. N. Neth., 67. (For reproduction of title-page of Vol. I, see Pl. Vol. IV.)

Also under February (preface dated June 1), Wassenaer (see Jameson's Nar. N. Neth., 73) records: "A ship is being fitted out [Jameson erroneously translates "was fitted out"] under a commission from the West India Company, and freighted with families, to plant a Colony among this people [the reference is to New Netherland]. To go out safely; it is first of all necessary that they be placed in a good defensive position and well provided with forts & arms, since the Spaniards, who claim all the country, will never allow anyone to gain a possession there . . . . This reference, which occurs in a section the preface to which is dated June, is the first explicit reference in the Nederlands expedition, which sailed short after March 30 (q. v.).

In a letter written by J. Sherley, from New Plymouth, and addressed to "Most worthy and loving Friends," in England, there were enclosed "sundry objections [against Plymouth as the site of a permanent settlement]." We see here, as it were written in "These are the false and false-facade objections which they that are now returned make against you and the country. I pray you consider them, and answer them by the first convenience." These objections were made by some of those that came over on their particular and were returned home, as is before mentioned, and were of the same suite with those that this other letter mentions.

Objection 11 is as follows: "The Dutch are planted here Hudson Bay [the bay of Hudson’s River], and are likely to over throw the [our] trade." The answer given to this objection is: "They will come and plant in these parts, also, if we and others doe not, but goe home and leave it to them. We rather command them, then condemn them for it." —Bradford, Hist. of Plymouth Plantation (Focd ed.), I, 356-67.

A letter bearing this date (possibly 1625, as given by Brodhead 28th and Acts of Privy Council, Colonial Ser., London, 1910), written Feb. at Whitehall to Sir John Lloyt, vice admiral, the mayor of Plymouth, and Sir Ferdinando Gorges, authorizes the arrest of a Dutch ship "ryding in the haven at Plymouth called the Orange Tree of Amsterdam, being of the burthen of one hundred and fifty tuns, or thereabouts, and bound to a place in America which is comprehended in a grant made by his Maj[y] upon just consideration to divers persons in England." March 5, the ship must exhibit his commission "and the plat which he hath," and in the meantime a "stay of the ship" is commanded. —N. Y. Col. Docs., III: 12. It is possible that Bastiaen Jannz. Krol sailed on this ship. —See Jan. 25.

Wassenaer, writing under the month of April of the settlement or in New Netherland, in part VII of the Historisch Verhael (Jameson, Apr. Nar. N. Neth., 74-90), to the preface to this part being dated Dec. 1, 1624, says: "The West India Company being chartered to navigate these rivers, did not neglect so to do, but equipped in the spring a vessel of 150 lasts, called the New Nederlands, whereof Cornelis Jacobsz. May of Hoorn was skipper, with a company of 30 families, mostly Walloons, in to plant a colony there. They sailed in the beginning of March [see March 28 and 30], and directing their course by the Canary Islands, steered towards the Wild Coast [Guianal, and gained the west wind which luckily took] them in the beginning of May into the river called, first Rio de Montagnes, now the River Mauritius [Hudson], lying in 42 degrees. He found a Frenchman lying in the mouth of the river, who would erce the arms of the King of France there; but the Hollanders would not permit it, forbidding it by commission from the Lords States General and the Directors of the West India Company; and in order not to be frustrated therein, with the assistance of those of the yacht mentioned above, and to which the ship had attached July 16, 1621, they caused a yacht of two guns to be manned, and conveyed the Frenchman out of the river, who would do the same thing in the South River, but he was prevented by the settlers there.

"This being done, the ship sailed up to the Mayaksoen, 44 leagues, and they built and completed a fort named "Orange" with four bastions, on an island, by them called Castle Island." (Wassenaer continues: "They also placed a fort which they named "Wilhelmus" on Princes Island, heretofore called Murderer's Island; it is open in front, and has a curtain in the rear and is garrisoned by sixteen men for the defense of the river below." Jameson adds, in a footnote, after Wassenaer's statement: "It is perhaps possible that this is a reference to Nutten or Governors Island.) It is also possible that it may refer to the fort at the mouth of the Delaware, which, on the Buchelus Chart (C. Pl. 38, Vol. II), bears this name. They forthwith put the spade in the ground and began to plant, and before the yacht Mackerel sailed, the garrison was nearly as high as a man so that they are bravely advanced.

On leaving there [Hudson River], the course lies for the west wind, and having got it, to the Bermudas and so to the Channel and in a short time to the Fatherland."

Wassenaer adds, in this account, respecting the settlement of Fort Orange (Albany), which was not on an island. He and De Laet evidently confused Fort Orange with the earlier Fort Nassau, which was on an island. His statement that the "Nieu Nederlandt" sailed "in the spring" has been interpreted by Brodhead, Jameson, and other historians to mean the spring of 1624, but more recent investigators prove that the "Nieu Nederlandt" sailed in the spring of 1624, when the "Mackerel" is known to have been in New Netherland. Mrs. De Forest, in A Wallon Family in America (I: 33-53), discusses the date of arrival of the "New Netherland" as follows:

"We have said that the date of the arrival of the New Netherland has for years been a subject of dispute among historians, some claiming that it was 1623 and some that it was 1624. Our journal would clearly settle the date even were there no other positive proof, for from it we learn that the Mackerel left the Pigeon off the Island of Madeira in September, 1623, her objective point being New Netherland. The meeting with the ship New Netherland could not, therefore, have taken place until May, 1624, because it would have been manifestly impossible for the little Mackerel to have been in the harbour of Manhattan Island in May, 1623, and to have returned to Holland in time to have sailed from there on the sixteenth of June [July, according to van Wijngaerdt's contemporary testimony]."

Mrs. De Forest suggests the possibility, even the probability, that among the Wallon sailing on the "New Netherland" were some of the péres de familles who went to South America on the "Pigeon" with Jesse de Forest in 1623, for they left the Wapiaco on Jan. 1, 1624, which would have given them two months to reach Holland and reembark for New Netherland.

The following "Articles" are taken from a contemporary copy made from the "Resolution Book" of the "Assembly of the 28 Nineteen." Algemeen Rijksarchief, The Hague, "W. J. C. Oude Compagnie, No. 1., 1623, point extrait, 26."

The XXVIIIth March, 1624. Aute Melindrem.

"And whereas the colonists [colonel] who go to New Netherland for the Chamber of Amsterdam will be enrolled [geomenist—literally, mustered] to-morrow, the articles for the colonists [colonel] drawn up by Messrs. Albert Coenraets, Samuel Godyn and Johannes de Laet (the committee heretofore appointed for the purpose by the Chamber of Amsterdam) are read and approved, and accordingly adopted, as follows:

1. "Provisional conditions on which the respective colonists are engaged and sent out to New Netherland in the service of the West India Company, to sail up their said ship on the River of Prince Maurice, or at such other places as shall be assigned to them by the Commander and his Council."

2. "The colonists, besides observing the respective articles and instructions, shall during the voyage and their residence and in changing their location be bound to obey and carry out without contradiction the orders of the Company already given to them or yet to be given, as well as all regulations as to matters of police and justice received from the aforesaid Company.

3. "They shall within their territory hold no other services than those of the true Reformed Religion, in the manner in which they are at present conducted here in this country, and thus by their Christian life and conduct try to lead the Indians and other blind persons to the knowledge of God and His Word, without however persecuting any one on account of his faith, but leaving to every one freedom of conscience. But if among them or within their jurisdiction any one should wantonly revile or blaspheme the of God or of our Savior Jesus Christ, he shall be punished by the Commander and his Council according to circumstances.

3. The Commander and other officers already set or yet to be set over them shall in accordance with the authority given them by the Company have power to enter into alliances and treaties with foreign princes and potentates located there in the country and near their colonies, on such conditions as may be judged most advantageous to the service of the Company, without seeking by such treaties to further any one's private interests. Which conditions the colonists collectively and each of them individually shall be held to fulfill, although by so doing they should be involved in war with some of their other neighbors, and even have to take the field.

4. They shall take up their permanent residence at the place to be assigned to them by the Commander and his Council and use all diligence to fortify the same by common effort and also jointly to erect the necessary public buildings and to establish the trade there as far as possible. And if any one should be found remiss therein, or the Company or the colony through his negligence should suffer damage, he shall be fined or punished according to the circumstances of the case.

5. In all public proceedings of a political or military character as well as in the discharge of justice, the Nether-Dutch tongue only shall be employed by them, on pain, if this be not done, of having all public despatches and proceedings that are written in other languages considered as null and void and of no effect.

6. The colonists shall without paying any recognition therefore to the Company receive such supplies, as well as the places and lands which shall be assigned to them for cultivation by the Commander and his Council, according to the size of their families and the instructions given on that subject.

7. Furthermore, whereas in the beginning all necessities will have to be sent over from this country, the Company will make arrangements that the colonists for the space of two years shall be provided with the necessary supplies and clothes from the Company's storehouses and that at a reasonable price, which the colonists receiving such supplies, if they cannot pay the amount at once, shall be bound to pay and satisfy from time to time in installments. And they shall be debited on the Company's books for the goods received by them and must deliver signed receipts therefore to the receivers of the Company. The Commander and the commissary are ordered to take good care that there be no neglect herein; also, that they give out no supplies on credit, except to the needy, without letting any squanderers, or those who neglect their property, enjoy the benefit hereof, but letting them bear the discomfort which they bring upon themselves.

8. The colonists shall be free to carry on and prosecute the inland trade without objection on the part of any one, on the express condition that they shall sell their purchased or collected wares to no one's advantage other than this. Provisionally, until other arrangements are found necessary.

9. They shall also be free to engage in all sorts of sport of fowling, hunting and fishing, and this provisionally as above.

10. All minerals, newly found or yet to be discovered mines of gold, silver, copper, or any other metals, as well as of precious stones, such as diamonds, rubies and the like, together with the pearl fisheries, shall be worked and exploited exclusively by the servants of the Company.

11. But if any one of the colonists, during his sojourn [there], should happen to discover anything of the kind aforesaid, he and his heirs shall receive one tenth of the net proceeds of the aforesaid mines and pearl fisheries, and this for the period of the first six consecutive years, to be reckoned from the day that the Company took over or exploited the same.

12. While they are compelling that all costs of exploitation and of the necessary tools pertaining thereto shall first be subtracted and deducted. And as the first discoverer shall be regarded he who first reported the same to the Commander [there], or here to the aforesaid Company. And in case, any such discovery being made, it is deliberately kept silent, the discoverer shall according to circumstances be arbitrarily punished, yet, even receive corporeal punishment.

13. They shall also have no right to engage in, or teach others, any handicraft involving commerce, especially weaving, except by special consent from the Company or its agents, under penalty, if any one should act to the contrary, of being excluded as a perjurer and of being arbitrarily punished according to the circumstances of the case.

14. They shall not permit any strangers (whereby are meant all persons who are outside of the Company or its authority) to come to their shores or do any trading, nor enter into any understanding with them whereby they in any way may learn the profits, needs, or situation of the place, on pain of being punished therefore according to the circumstances of the case.

15. Furthermore, the colonists shall under solemn oath promise to keep secret all transactions and affairs of the Company which may in any way come to their knowledge; likewise, they shall not be at liberty to judge the same to be in the interest of the allegiance to the Company; nor shall they at any time hereafter be free to associate themselves with any but those of the Company to come within the limits of the charter, wherever it may be.

16. They shall also be bound to remain with their families for the space of six consecutive years at their destined place, unless a change therein be made by order of the Company but at the expiration of their term, or sooner, in case of removal by order of the directors or their honours' agents, they may trade or sell their houses, cultivated fields and live stock to some one else of the remaining colonists. [The text as printed by Jessurun has niemant and, no one else, which is evidently a mistake.]

17. They shall at first plant and seed their lands and fields with such crops and fruits as the Commander and his Council shall order them to plant, without making any changes therein on account of any personal views, on pain of subjecting the offender to all necessary penalties for misapplication of the goods which shall be handed to him for his own use, or any other purpose.

18. They shall especially see to it that they faithfully fulfill their promises to the Indians and their other neighbors, whether in connection with trade or other matters, and that without occasion they give them no offense, whether to regard their persons, their wives, or their property, on pain of being severely punished therefore.

19. The directors shall at all times have the right to transport thither as many people as in their good judgment they shall think fit.

20. Finally, they shall take the oath of fidelity and allegiance to the High and Mighty Lords the States General and to the Company, and in all things comport themselves as good and loyal subjects are bound to do.

The Dutch text of this document, which is of great interest in connection with the early settlement of New Netherland, was found by Dr. Wieder during researches made for this work in 1912, as first announced in the second volume of the present work. It was first printed by Jessurun, in Killicourten Ronellsers (The Hague, 1917), from which the foregoing translation was made by Mr. V. A. Laer.

The contents of this very important document had, however, been known since June, 1910, when another contemporary copy, dated March 30, 1624, known as Van Rappard Document A, according to the catalogue description, together with a mentioned "Nich. Verdriet," was sold at auction by Frederick Muller & Cie, in Amsterdam, as part of a series of six documents relating to New Netherland and the West India Company, 1624-6, belonging originally to the collection of the Chevalier Van Rappard, and now forming part of that of Mr. Henry E. Huntington, which documents are fully described under March 30, 1624 (p. v.).

In the "Assembly of the XIX" of the Dutch West India Company, "the gentlemen from Zeeland" deliver "a petition of Mr. Willems Snellen . . . which is referred to a committee [of five, one from each chamber]."

On the following day, the "Assembly of the Lords Nineteen" passed a resolution that the comissary or skipper of the ship about to sail to New Netherland, immediately after arrival there, should "formally protest against the comissary, skipper and crew of the said MF Snellen, and hereby rescind without however permitting them to sell any merchandize." In this manner the "rights of the Company will be sufficiently protected and the Company will be able to keep the ship of MF Snellen under arrest after her return hither in the same of justice or on the ground of the Company's Charter.

And the comissary or skipper of the Company's ship shall give enough victuals to MF Snellen's skipper, to enable him and his crew to reach their place of destination conveniently. But receipt shall be given therefor together with promises of restitution by Mr. Snelleo or by the skipper himself after his arrival here.

At this meeting, furthermore, it has been resolved that

1654 (whereas lately few or no ships, except those of the Company, have departed from this country to the Coast of Guinea, to New Netherland, or to the West-Indies) the Company's Charter and the consequence thereof shall be maintained with vigor, without any excuse or exception. And the commissioners, skippers and crews in the Company's service shall have instructions to attack ships, which have been held from the company by the States General against the provision of the Charter. And after having mastered any such ship, they shall send it home with its crew to a province or city, different from the one from which it had formerly sailed."—Records of the old Dutch W. I. Co. at The Hague, No. 1 (lettered No. 447), part 3, item 53-55.

The agents of the West India Company at Hoorn write to the "Assembly of the XIX," of the Dutch West India Co., dated: "And it is . . . further resolved (as it is understood that there are but few if any more ships from this country [Holland], outside of those of the Company, on the coasts of Guinea, New Netherland, or the West-Indies], that henceforth the Charter [of the West India Co.] with the amplifications thereof, which were formerly written for Company's instruction, shall be, in all points, rigorously enforced."—Records of the old Dutch W. I. Co. at The Hague, No. 1 (lettered No. 447), part 3, item 56, trans. by A. J. F. van Laer. See July 6 and 13, 1654.

"Whereas we repaired this morning to the meeting of the Directors of this city, and, after sundry conversations, explained to their Honors that we understood that a certain ship was fitting out here with design to go to the Virginias under French commission, intending to take along good carpenters and shipwrights to construct a store, houses and ships there in order to be employed elsewhere within the limits of the charter. This then appearing to be a matter of great consequence, we both deemed it proper to wait on the Magistrates of Hoorn, as we did forthwith, and after explanatory introduction, requested them, as Judges and administrators of the laws, to maintain us against this contravention of the charter, and its amplification. Whereupon they answered, that we might certainly rely on them, and they resolved, with our previous advice, to summon the Skipper, he was busy taking out his ship, and about to sail forthwith, to demand of him an inventory thereof, and of all that is, or will be received on board. The Skipper appearing in our absence, refused to comply, saying he wishes to go to France, wanting to know who acted thus, threatening to complain, as if the King of France's crown were attacked. The Burgomasters finding him thus obstinate, said that he was then arrested until he should give satisfaction herein, against which we had demanded and demanded. We, therefore, thought proper that this should be done in the name and on behalf of the Assembly of the XIX., though we are not expressly authorized hereunto. We request your advice whether the arrest shall continue, and what further shall be done in the premises. You may be assured that a certain person of credit is here, who was lately offered a share of that ship, well knowing that some owners reside here and at Amsterdam: therefore, the matter ought, in our opinion be prosecuted, for the sake of example, and thereby to discourage others, who are disposed to go by the same road."

In a session of the "Assembly of the XIX" of the Dutch West India Co., "Mr. Schotte delivers . . . a letter brought by his servant from Hoorn to the delegates of the XIX, which being read, it is learned that they, having understood that a certain ship was being equipped at Hoorn, the home of Skipper David Pieterszen de Vriejt for the Virginias in the name of those of Rochelle, were nevertheless informed that the owners thereof reside in this country, for which reason they had decided to attack the said ship and to inform the Burgomasters, whereupon the skipper, in turn, had attached them, on all of which they add the advice as to what they are to do further in the matter. Meanwhile, Mr. Godyn can state that the skipper, or supercargo, is called Jan Gyssen, he having come only last fall from the Virginias on account of Lambert van Twemhsuysen and Co. and that the copper utensils (Coprsenare) were made on the Newendych, in the Copers Maen, which said copper articles are serviceable nowhere but in the Virginias; and Mr. Menten [declare] that the skipper is called David Pietersen. [de Vriejt]." It is further resolved "that a letter shall be sent by the Assembly to the States General, inclosing a copy of the letter of the delegates of the XIX, with the request that their High Mightinesses would be pleased promptly to provide therein in such a manner the amplification thereof may not be violated, the States of Holland to be requested that the rudder and sail may be taken from that ship until the facts in the matter can be ascertained."—Records of old Dutch W. I. Co. at The Hague, No. 1 (lettered No. 447), part 3, item 59-59, trans. by A. J. F. van Laer. See April 6.

This date (according to the Muller catalogue) is found on a contemporary MS. copy of the "provisional order" issued by the West India Company to colonists about to sail for New Netherland on the "Nieu Verdriet" (New Sorrow), which left Holland for New Netherland on or about March 30 (Van Rappard Document A). This order, translated from another contemporary copy, dated March 28, 1654, is given in full under that date. For a discussion of the facts leading to the conclusion that the name of this vessel has been wrongly transcribed, and should be "Nieu Nederlandt," see 1626. These manuscripts are contemporary copies of the original Co. and contain, among other things, the originals of which have disappeared. The copies, according to Dr. Wieder, are in Zeeland Dutch, and were, he believes, made for the Zeeland chamber of the West India Company.

These manuscripts, which, as already noted, belonged to the Coraliers Van Rappard, and were sold at auction on June 16, 1910, by Frederik Muller & Cie of Amsterdam, are known as "The Van Rappard Documents." They were bought by John Anderson, Jr., Mr. Stokes being the under-bidder.

Mr. Anderson had them translated by J. A. J. de Villiers, chief of the May Room of the British Museum. They were afterwards bound by Rivière, with the accompanying translations, and are now in the collection of Mr. Henry E. Huntington, see Cartography III: 106 et seq. These documents are believed to contain information which would throw much light upon the settlement or settlements on the Hudson River during the years 1624 and 1625 (and possibly earlier). As Mr. Huntington contemplates their separate publication, he has, quite naturally, been unwilling to have them extracted, or even examined, for inclusion or comment in the present work. Except for Document A, of which a duplicate copy, as already noted under March 28, was found by Dr. Wieder in 1912, and which is printed under that date (March 38) in full, the only information available regarding these manuscripts is that contained in the catalogue of the sale; that obtained by Mr. Stiles, of Henry N. Stevens, Son & Stiles, who represented Mr. Stokes at the auction, and was permitted to make a cursory examination of the manuscripts; and, finally, that supplied by Mr. de Villiers' translation in the author's presence, and commented briefly upon a few of the salient facts therein contained. Although it has been impossible to verify these facts or statements; nevertheless, in view of the absence of more definite information, it has seemed desirable to print them here for what they are worth. The catalogue descriptions are, as follows, the material following in brackets being added from the information supplied by Mr. Stiles and Mr. Anderson, and referred to above:

Item 1795, Documents concerning New Netherland, 1624-1626.

(Translated from the Dutch) "Copy [of the] Provisional Order, in accordance with which the respective Colonists are accepted and despatched in the service of the West India Company to New Netherland, in order to take up their abode on the river of the Prince Maurice, or at such other places as the Commander and his council shall indicate to them." (Cataloguer's note, translated from the French)—30 March 1624. Manuscript of the period, 9 pages. Copy of the regulations with which the colonists sent by the West India Company to New Netherland on the vessel "Nieu Verdriet" were required to comply. For a full translation of this document, see March 28. [Information supplied by Mr. Anderson from Mr. de Villiers' translation of the translation of the translation over by the hand of Cornelius [Jacobze]. They contained full directions in connection with the first attempt at colonization in the vicinity of New Amsterdam.]

1624 Nassau, in the year 1624, to the Directors of the West India Company, Chamber of Zeeland. Manuscript of the period, 30 pages, fol." This document presumably contains no information of New Netherland interest.

C. "(Translated from the Dutch) "(Copy of the) Instructions for Willem van Hulst, Commis on the voyage to New Netherland, Commissary of New Netherland, and provisonally director of the colonists in that country. The second series of instructions to Van Hulst (of which a copy is described under the following No.) is dated 22 April 1625." [Information supplied by Mr. Anderson from Mr. De Villiers' translation: "These included instructions to the directors and the colonists, and prescribed regulations for government, etc.; exceedingly interesting."

D. "(Translated from the Dutch) "(Copy of the) Further Instructions drawn up by the Directors of the West India Company in the chamber of Amsterdam, for Willem van Hulst, Commis, and also for the council, resident in the Islands of New Netherland, forwarded by Gerrit Fongersz., Under-Commis, and Gerrit Irbsantz, skipper of the yacht Mackerel, according to which said Van Hulst and the Council, besides the common farmers and all others who prior to this, as now with the ships Mackerel, Horse, Crane and Sheep, have gone to Forts, shall have to regulate themselves with all obedience, loyalty and diligence, as also to take up their abode on the South or the North- river or such other places as shall be serviceable to the Company and her management." [Cataloguer's note, translated from the French: "Amsterdam 22 April 1625. Manuscript of the period, 24 pages, fol. Copy of the second series of instructions given to Willem Vander (or Var) Hulst, and to the administrators of New Netherland, concerning the workmen and Colonists who shall establish themselves at the rivers: North River and South River." [Information supplied by Mr. Anderson from Mr. De Villiers' translation: "This document contains further instructions for the guidance of the Colonists. It was sent from Amsterdam to Van Hulst after he was on the spot, a messenger, whose name is given. The instructions are given in greater detail than in Document C."

E. "(Translated from the Dutch) "(Copy of the) Particular instructions for the engineer and surveyor Crv. Frederickz., as also for the Commis and Councilors to regulate themselves accordingly, concerning the fortifications and the building of houses when the Council shall have discovered a suitable place to settle deers and make a fortress for instructions with: Van Hulst's note, translated from the French." —22 April 1625. Manuscript of the period, 19 pages, fol. Copy of the instructions given for the construction of a Dutch fortress and for a town in New Netherland, emanating from the West India Company, Chamber of Amsterdam, 22 April 1625." [Information supplied by Mr. Anderson from Mr. De Villiers' translation: "This document was sent over by Crv. Frederickz. It includes references to a plan (now lost) for laying out the settlement and for the building of the fort; the specifications are given in detail—nothing left to chance. Every street in the city is laid out in feet and inches. Even where the people shall live is indicated." [Information supplied by Mr. Stiles: "Instructions for the building of a Fort and Town in New Netherland. The Fort was to be four sided, one side of which was to face the water, but no definite position is assigned. The three sides facing land were to be surrounded by a rampart and moat, one of which is given. A bridge over the moat was to give access to the fort on one side, but which side it is difficult to determine, as the references are lettered to correspond to an accompanying plan which is not attached to this copy of the specification. All the male population were to be impressed into the work of building the fort, so that it should be built as soon as possible. Indians were also to be employed as well as sailors of the Fleet, special rates of pay being given to the latter. Ten houses were to be built outside under the wall for the use of the architects and foremen of the works. The dimensions and style of these houses are mentioned. A school, hospital, prison and church were to be built, and dimensions are given. The fort was to be named Amsterdam.

A broad street was to be laid down one side of the fort, and smaller streets, which were to be numbered, were to lead out of the broad street at regular intervals, the intervening ground to be used for growing supplies. The number of houses to be built on each street and their size are stated."

F. (Cataloguer's note, translated from the French: "Copy of the report by the Commis [Rasidre], addressed to the Directors of the West India Company, written in the fortress of Amsterdam on the island Manhat, 23 September 1626. Manuscript of the period, 40 pages, fol. Copy of a detailed report in which is found a full description of the life and of the difficulties which the first Dutch colonists encountered in New Netherland." [Information supplied by Mr. Anderson from Mr. De Villiers' translation: "This document is a copy of the first known letter written from New Amsterdam, antedating the Michellius letters and the De Rasidre letter of 1625. It gives a most intimate relation of the doings and happenings in New Amsterdam, including the acts of the Council and other important matters."

The cataloguer adds: "We have been unable to find any trace of the originals. These documents seem to us to be of the greatest importance for the history of New Netherland." Mr. Anderson, commenting on the documents as a whole, says: "In these papers are given instructions in order to get the Island of Manhat from the Indians. They determine definitely the fact that the Dutch did not settle first on Manhattan Island, but on Gover- nor's Island. They also bring out the fact that Minuit was here two years before his supposed arrival in May 1626.

In this connection we have an extract from De Rasidre's letter, which reads as follows: "On our arrival [by ship from Hol- land] we did not find Minuit here [New Amsterdam], he having gone to Fort Orange [Albany] to inquire into a calamity caused by Krieckenbeek's outrageous conduct, and whereas nothing of this transpired in the council, I will refer your Honors to his [Minuit's] letter. On Minuit's arrival here [i.e., his original arrival in New Netherland] he was placed in command by the council because of the ill behaviour of Verhulst [then Commander of New Netherland]. On the evening of Friday the 31st [July] the Director [Minuit] arrived here [i.e., on his return from Fort Orange], and on the 7th of August I handed him your honors letters in the council." [Information supplied by Mr. Stiles: "This document, although of great historical importance, does not give any special topographical details, but relates to the state of the colony as it existed on the arrival of Isaac de Rasidre [Rasidre]. He states that very little progress had been made with the building of the Fort, that the governing of the Colonists was in a bad state, and that great insubordination existed, which he had been obliged to repress with a firm hand. The fines and punishments inflicted are stated. He also states that a fort was to be built at Orange for the protection of the animals, and that he afterwards emphasises the importance of sending over a better class of Colonists, if better results are desired by the West India Company."

The interest and importance of the Van Rappard documents is apparent from these extracts and comments, and it is much to be hoped that they will soon be published, or at least made accessible to students.

The states-general sends the following communication to the Apr. "Assembly of the XIX" in answer to its letter of March 30 (p. 1): "Honorable: By the annexed petition, presented to us by Captain David Vening [de Vries], you will be able to learn what he hath communicated and requested on the part of his owners residing at Rotchell. "And whereas we so regard the matter that the Incorporated West India Company ought not to enter, in the beginning, into a dispute with the subjects of neighboring Kings and Princes, but rather observe good correspondence and friendship towards them. "We have, therefore, deemed it proper and necessary to send Your Honors the aforesaid Petition, and reflecting on the conse- quences which may arise to the injury of the Company by disputes with the Keteoffert so that it should be built as soon as possi- ble. Indians were also to be employed as well as sailors of the Fleet, special rates of pay being given to the latter. Ten houses were to be built outside under the wall for the use of the architects and fore- men of the works. The dimensions and style of these houses are mentioned. A school, hospital, prison and church were to be built, and dimensions are given. The fort was to be named Amsterdam."

V. [Cris. Dist.] I. 52: De Vries, who claimed that his intentions were to trade for furs in Canada, was, after several postponements, finally compelled to abandon his voyage.—De Vries, Korte Historiaal (etc.), translated by Henry C. Murphy, p. 11 et seq.

1624 Apr. 6

P. John Moore was put in command of a commission on a voyage of May 1624, 1625/6 (q.v.), beforeGov. Dongan, stating that she "came to this Province either in the yeare one thousand six hundred and twenty three or twenty four to the best of her remembrance, and that fourer Women came along with her in the same Ship, in which she Governor Arijo Jorison [Tiepotz] Came also over, which fourer Women were married at Sea and that they and their husbands stayed about three Weeks at this place [Manhattan Island] and then they with eight seamen more went in a vessel by ordre of the Dutch Governor to Delaware River and there settled."—"Doc. Hist. N. Y., III: 31.

In a later deposition, made Oct. 17, 1668, before William Morris, justice of the peace at the Waal-bogt, "Catelina Trico, aged about 83 years born in Paris," declared that "in ye year 1623 she came into this Country with a Ship called y' Unity, whereof was Commander Arijo Jorison [Tiepotz] belonging to ye West India Company being y' first Ship y' came here for ye Company, as soon as they came to Manhattan now called N: York they sent two families & six men to harford River & two families & 8 men to Delaware River & 8 men they left att N: York to take Possession and ye Rest of ye Passengers went up w' th ye Ship up as far as Albany which they then called Fort Orange. When as ye Ship came to the place which is now the enlightened y' Ship w' th some boats w' th were left there by ye Dutch that had been there ye year before a trading with ye Indians uppon there own accompts & gone back again to Holland & so brought ye vessel up; there were about 18 families aboard who settled themselves att Albany & made a small fort; and as soon as they had built themselves some butts of Bark: ye Mahakinders & River Indians. ye Maquesan: Oneyed: Omoondages Cayougans, & Sinnekes, w' th ye Mahawawa or Ottawawas Indians came & made Coveants of friendship w' th ye 8th Arijo Jorison there Commander Brougier him great Ireny & all the Beavers & otter & deer & those they might come & have a Constant free Trade with them w' th was concluded upon & ye 8th Indians came daily w' th great multitudes of Beaver & traded them w' th ye Christians, there 8th Commandor Arijo Jorison staid with them all winter & sent his some home with ye ship; ye 8th Deponent lived in Albany three years all which time ye 8th Indians were all as quiet as Lambs & came & Traded with all ye freedom Imaginable, in ye year 1626 ye Deponent came from Albany & settled at N: York where she lived afterwards for many years & then came to Long Island where she now lives."—Ibid., III: 32.

Although this deposition has often been questioned, there seems no adequate reason for asserting the falsity of the date of arrival—1621 or 1624—or that of the other statements therein contained. For further facts tending to corroborate Catelina Trico's statement, see Nov., 3; 1623; 1624 or 1625 (Nov.), and 1626.

If Mr. Anderson's quotation from Van Rappard Document A is correct, and Cornelis Jacob May was the skipper who sailed on the "Nieu Verdriet," under "provincial orders" dated the 30th of March, 1624 (q.v.), a different explanation of the facts connected with the first settlement than that outlined above must be sought, for we know from Wassenaker and other sources that May was the skipper of the ship "New Nederland," which, Van Rappard says, sailed from Holland for the Hudson River early in March, 1624, and it is clear that he cannot have taken part in both expeditions. The seemingly contradictory facts could easily be reconciled by assuming that the use of the name "Nieu Verdriet" (which name was so far as we know, appears only in an editorial note in the Muller catalogue) was used erroneously for that of "Nieu Nederland." If this explanation be accepted, the two expeditions of March 1624 are reduced to one,—the well known expedition of that year under May in the "Nieu Nederland." This theory would also explain the statement made by Van Rappard that the officers who sailed on the "New Nederland" would not permit the Frenchman, lying in the mouth of the Hudson River to erect there the arms of the King of France, "forbidding it by commission from the Lords States General and the Directors of the West India Company. This explanation would, it is true, require to assume that the settlers referred to in this passage as being already at the South River had been dispatched thither by May between the date of his arrival and that of the arrival of the French ship; or else that this settlement was already in existence,—which seems possible, as we are told in the "Representation of New Nederland," 1605 (see Jameson, Nat. N. Yth., 313) that "the discovery of the South River" took place at the same time with that of the North River, and by the same ship and persons, who entered the South Bay before they came to the North Bay."

The principal statements contained in Catelina Trico's deposition are in harmony with this theory, except that she states that Arijo Jorison (Tiepotz) as governor; but, if we eliminate the "Nieu Verdriet," the "New Nederland" expedition must have been the direct result of Tiepotz's petition to the W. I. Co. of Nov. 3, 1623, it is practically certain that he accompanied this expedition to some official capacity (see N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 199, and Nov. 3, 1623). It is even possible that there was more than one ship on this expedition, and that Tiepotz, in command of one party, went up the river, while May went to the Delaware, and afterwards returned to New Amsterdam, and assumed general direction of affairs in New Netherlands. For a more complete discussion of this theory, see 1626.

In a report to the Amsterdam Chamber concerning the Swedish settlements on the Delaware, Stuyvesant enclosed an account of an examination of three sachems, held at Fort Nassau on the South River on July 9, 1631. During this examination, one of the Indians, Matthewson by name, declared that the Indians had been the earliest discoverers of the river, which also, first of all, settled thereon among them, and that they have always maintained good friendship and commerce with the Dutch; adding therefore an account of presents which were exchanged between them and the Dutch Nation. As a further evidence and declaration, he also added, that one Cornelis with one eye, or a film on his eye, was the first who coming here, made his dwelling on the river."—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 597. This reference to Cornelis is clearly to Cornelis Jacob May, who is known to have lived but one good eye.

The first appearance, in print, of the full name "New Netherland" is given under February in Wassenaker's Historisch Verhal, part VI, folio 144 (verso), translated in Jameson's Nat. N. Yth., 68. The preface to this section is dated June 1, 1624.

In this entry, Wassenaker describes the transatlantic voyage to New Netherland as follows: "This country now called Netherland is usually reached in seven or eight weeks from hence [Holland]. The course lies towards the Canary Islands; thence to the savage islands, then towards the mainland of Virginia, steering across, in fourteen days, leaving the Bahamas on the left, and the Bermudas on the right hand, between which the winds are variable with which the ship is made."—Ibid., II: 596.

Virginia becomes a royal colony. James I arbitrarily annuls the liberal charter of the London Company.—Nell, Hist. of Virginia Co. of London, 417; Brown, First Republic in Am., 601-2, 635-48. At a meeting of the "Assembly of XIX," a programme outlining the settled action for its next meeting the West India Company is sent out to all of the component chambers.—MS. Minutes of the "Assembly of the Lords Nineteen" of the West India Company, recently (1912) noted by Dr. Wieder in the Rijksarchief, at The Hague.

Section 12 of this programme provides that, "when the deputies of the chamber of Zeeland shall have been duly informed of the situation of Netherland, they shall report the same to the said Chamber and wait for further instructions. They shall be furnished also with instructions how to vote in regard to the equipment of the ship Teynhoj to New Netherland, and in regard to the extension of the colonies already established there, as well as concerning the religious and political constitution of the said colony." In the resolutions of the "Assembly of the XIX" of the Dutch West India Co. appears the following interesting record: "Upon the twelfth point [see Sept. 10], reading as follows: 'They shall also communicate the result of the decision to the equipment of New Netherland and the strengthening of the settlements already commenced [de Colonen d'eerste reede begoten te leggen]—the significance of the plural form is apparent, as well as the proper organization of the said colony, both in ecclesiastical and political matters, it is decided that the Chamber of Amsterdam, as soon as placed in the other chambers, may, at its discretion still send a ship to New Netherland and transport therein besides the necessary merchandise some cows, sheep, hogs and other necessary animal also some Dutch families, among whom, if they can be found, shall be a capable political director and a godly and learned minister, and however whatever may be necessary. The instructions, merchandise and orders whereof shall be communicated to the regivers of money at the next meeting of the Assembly of the XIX.—Records of the old Dutch W. I. Co. at The Hague, No. 1 (lettered No. 447), part 4, item 67, transcribed from the original document by Dr. Wieden, in 1812, and lately translated from the original by A. J. van Laer.

A Resolution of the "Assembly of the XIX" of the Dutch West India Co. of this date, reads as follows: "Whereas Isaac Plancius offers for sale to the Company all the maps and journals of his deceased father, Domine Petro Plancio, including those relating to the West Indies as well as the remaining limits of the charter, the same is thought advisable and the Chamber of Amsterdam is hereby authorized to purchase them for the benefit of the Company."

Nov.

"Doctor Claes van Wassenaer and Gregorius vanden Broeck having requested the Assembly that the Provisional and his Scenes and servant, on account of his sickness and discomfort might be transferred from the place where he is at present to some other more suitable place, under such reasonable guaranty as the directors shall see fit.

"Answer is given that they are to notify the Provisional to make large arrangements for his ransom and to secure security thereof and that the directors will then release him from prison. Meanwhile, Messrs Reael and vander Marckt are appointed to inspect other places, both here in the house [meaning apparently the West India Company building] and the Charlize convent, and make report thereof.

The above Provisional, was Dominicus Cebello, Pater Provincialis of Brazil, who with other Portuguese officials was taken prisoner at the taking of Bahia and sent to Amsterdam, where he was confined in the convent of St. Clara. Wassenaer had a number of interviews with him and gives an interesting account of him in Historisch Verhael, pt. VIII., fol. 5-15, under date of October 1624.
Mr. Van Laer infers from this entry that Wassenaer stood in some official relation, as physician, to the West India Company, and that he had, therefore, excellent opportunities of collecting all the news relating to that company. If this is true, we may perhaps infer that he would be apt to mention all the ships that were sent out in the early stages of the settlement of New Netherland and that, as he makes an elaborate statement about the ship "New Netherland" and about the expedition sent out by Hulst, but says nothing of a ship called "New Verden," no ship existed. Mr. Van Laer also agrees with the statement in the Chronology that this is a most unlikely name for a ship, and feels confident that the entry in the Muller catalogue is wrong.

In the "Assembly of the XIX" of the Dutch West India Co., the following resolution is passed, viz.: "Resolved, that the members of this Assembly shall make inquiries in regard to two or three capable persons to be sent to New Netherland to examine the mines there to see if there are gold, silver, or other metals in them."— Records of old Dutch W. I. Co. at The Hague, No. 1 (lettered No. 447), part 5, item 100, trans. by A. J. van Laer.

"As much as the multitude of people, not only natives but immigrants are seeking a livelihood in the United Provinces is very great, so that one stiver is to be earned there are ten hands ready to seize it, especially in Holland which is the reservoir of divers Kingdoms and countries. Many are obliged, on this account, to go in search of other lands and residences where they can obtain ease and at less expense. Accordingly, in the year 1624, as in previous years, divers families went from Holland to Virginia in the West Indies, a great portion of them being English, called Brownists, whom King James will not permit nor suffer to live in his land, because they hold and maintain divers points of religion unapproved by the present church of England."

"A ship arrived in August from that part of Virginia called New Netherland, which had conveyed some families from Holland Authorith. [Either this date is wrong or the "Mackerel" and the "Nieu Nederland" are here confused, the former, which we know from Wassenaer (Jamesoo, Nat. N. Neth., 76) sailed from New Netherland when the "summel" grain was nearly as high as a man, governor-general in return to Holland Oct. 1624, see below.]

This vessel brings many and various letters from private individuals, each written to friends and acquaintances, whereof the following is the general tenor—

"We were much gratified on arriving in this country; Here we found beautiful rivers, bubbling fountains flowing down into the valleys; basins of running waters in the flatlands, agreeable fruits in the woods, such as strawberries, pigeon berries, walnuts, and also white grapes. The woods abound with acorns for feeding hogs, and with venison. There is considerable fish in the rivers; grounds, village lands, for fishing and going, without fear of the naked natives of the country. Had we cows, hogs, and other cattle fit for food (which we daily expect in the first ships) we would not wish to return to Holland, for whatever we desire in the paradise of Holland, is here to be found. If you will come here with your family, you will see that you will be

"This and similar letters have roused and stimulated many to resolve to emigrate thither with their families, in the hope of being able to earn a handsome livelihood, strongly fancying that they will live there in luxury and ease, whilst here on the contrary, they must earn their bread by the sweat of their brow."—Extract in Dec. Hist. N. Y., (410 ed.), IV, 84, translated from Willem Bau-dart's Memories... der gedenkwaardigste geschiedenissen van Nederland... (Arnhem, 1624-5). These letters were probably written from Fort Orange (Albany). Cf. De Laet, in Jamesoo's Nat. N. Neth., 36, for description of the country.

"As soon as our people arrived there [New Netherland], they proceeded to clear and plant. Before this vessel ["Nieu Nederland"] had left, the winter harvest was far advanced..."

"As regards the prosperity of New Netherland, we learn by the arrival of the ship ["Nieu Nederland"] whereon Jan May of Hoom [evidently, Cornelis Jacobsz. May is meant] was skipper, that everything there was in good condition. The colony began to advance bravely and to live in friendship with the natives. The fur or other trade remains in the West India Company, others being forbidden to trade there. Rich beavers, otters, marten and foxes are still numerous. They [the natives] have twenty skin and fifteen hundred beavers, and a few other skins were brought better, which were sold in four parcels for twenty-eight thousand, some hundred gilders."—Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael, under Dec. 1624, in Jamesoo's Nat. N. Neth., 77-78. See the preface to this part is dated May 20, 1624.

Wassenaer's Historisch Verhael, pt. VIII., fol. 106, under date of Dec. 1624 (preface dated May 20, 1625), records the sale on this day of the "New Netherland" cargo. As this sale was ordered at a meeting of the Assembly of the XIX, held before Oct. 25, the "New Netherland" must have arrived before that date.

De Laet, in the Jaerlyk Verhael, Appendix, 26, 29, records that two ships brought peltries from New Netherland to Holland in this year. These ships must have been the "Mackerel," which sailed for home in the early summer of this year, and the "Nieu Nederland," which returned in November (see above).

Boel, in his History of Plymouth Plantation, commenting upon letters received, in the spring of 1625 (p. 9), from New Am-dam, says that the "Dutch had traded in these southern parts, diverse years before they came [the Plymouth settlers, in 1620]; but they began on plantation hear till 4. or 5. years after their coming, and here beginning."
beaver and 463 otter peltries, valued at 35,853 guilders.—Ibid., 29.

In this year was published at Leyden the first edition of Johan (or Johannes) de Laet’s Nieuwe Wereldt, oft Beschrijvinghe van West-Indien ("New World, or Description of the West-Indies," i.e., America)—Jameson, Nat. N. Neth., 34—66; Winsor, Nat. & Cont. Hist., III., 13: 417, and authorities there cited.

Also in this year, were published, in London, Vols. II, III, and IV of Purchas His Pilgrimes.—Church Catalogue, 401A.

By this year, William Blaxton, or Blackstone, was established in solitary grandeur on the Shawmut peninsula, the present site of Boston, while Samuel Maverick had fortified himself on Noddle’s Island, in the harbor.—Fiske, The Beginnings of New Eng., 92.

The Dutch are said to have had three fortresses on the South River in 1635 and 1636—"in the north, in the middle, and above on the river, together with a trading-house surrounded by palisades"—etc. For this and a further account of the occupation there by the Dutch, prior to the Swedes, see Oct. 30, 1655.

Jan. 31. During the whole month of January there was no east or northeast wind whereby the fleet of the West India Company under Jan Dircksz Lam, part of whose fleet also lay in Zeeland, could run out to sea, on account of which the others, which lay in Fall River and the harbor, were detained, and twenty more were still detained in coming to the Valencias who had already been transported thither to the colony. The assistant supercargo [under Cooperman] had also been sick, but was now getting better.—Wassenaker, Historisch Verhael, pt. VIII., fol. 123.

Feb. 20. It is said that some farmers [baulieden] were to be sent to Virginia to cultivate the land in some region discovered by our countrymen jen enige contraye by de onde ander].—Notes by Arnoldus Buchelius on the E. I. and W. I. Cos., 1619 and following years. (Koloniale Aanwinsten, 312 B, fol. 104 vo., General Archives, at The Hague.)

On March 31, 1635, the states-general resolved to write to Pieter Altenstraet, Coy, agent in Morocco, "to bring about the release, at the request of the directors of the West India Company, of Jan Pieter Schel, the son of a minister, and of J.J. de van Groningen, a sailor, who, in 1625, on their way to New Netherland with skipper Willem Janssen Boot, were taken by a Turkish ship commanded by a renegade, a bora Frisian. They were, it is said, at first set free, but again detained, because Keyser had said that another consul was expected." (Heeringa, Bronnen tot de Geschiedenis van den Levantse Handel, Rijks Geschiedniscunde Publicatien, 10, vol. I, part 2. 979.) This may refer to the ship mentioned above, sailing from Bremen to挣钱 in the March, in conformity with which latter he was to conduct the government under the West India Company, is still in existence, belonging to Mr. Hendrick van Wassenaer, but nothing has come to light about the farmers [baulieden]. Wassenaker, p. X., fol. 149 vo., under date of March, 1636, mentions the capture by the Algerian pirates in Dec., 1645, of Pieter Yebrants Haliohoorn, but does not refer to the capture of the ship to New Netherland.

April 6. Though good care was taken by the directors of the West India Company in the spring to provide everything for the colony in Virginia, by us called New Netherland on the river Mauritius, near the Mayhants [the Musqueans, a tribe inhabiting the region below Fort Orange], extraordinary ships were sent thither this month [April], to strengthen it with what was needful, as follows: "As the country is well adapted for agriculture and the raising of everything that is produced here, the aforesaid gentleman [the directors of the West India Co.] resolved to take advantage of the circumstance, and to provide the place with many necessaries, through the worthy Pieter Evertsen Huitl [a brewer of Amsterdam and formerly, in company with Paulus van Boest van Heemskerck, owner of the "Company of the black, green, and white lions," so called on account of the three ships owned by this company, which was dissolved in 1607—Johan E. Elias, De Vreeschapp van Amsterdam, Amsterdam, 1823: 417, and authorities there cited, at his risk, whatever was asked of him, to wit; one hundred and three head of live stock—stallions, mares, bulls and cows—for breeding and multiplying, besides all the logs and sheep that they thought expedient to send thither; and to distribute these in two ships of one hundred and forty lasts, in such a manner that they should be well foddered and attended to. Each animal has its own stall, with a floor of three feet of sand, arranged as comfortably as any stall here. Each animal has its respective servant who attends to it and knows what he is to get if he delivers it there alive. All suitable forage is there, such as oats, hay, and straw, and what else he may have also joined with in a particular way. I have taken with them all furniture proper for the dairy; all sorts of seed, ploughs and agricultural implements are also present, so that nothing is wanting. What is most remarkable is, that nobody in the two ships can discover where the water is stored for these cattle. In order to use the same plan another time if needful, I shall here add it:—the above-named manager caused a deck to be constructed in the ship. Beneath this were stored in each ship three hundred tuns of fresh water, which was pumped up and thus distributed among the cattle. On this deck lay the balestr and thence up stood the horses and bulls, and thus there was nothing wanting. He added the third ship as an extra, so that, should the voyage, which is ordinarily made in six weeks, continue longer, nothing should be wanting and he should be able to fulfill his contract. So, in the eyes of the far-seeing, this colony, which lies right beside the Spanish passage from the West Indies, has great prospects.

May 21. It goes a fast sailing yacht, the "Mackerel," at risk, and at the risk of the Directors. In these aforesaid vessels also go six completely equipped families, with some single persons, so that forty-five new comers or inhabitants are taken out, to remain there. The natives of New Netherland are found to be very well disposed so long as nothing is done there.

"Poisonous plants have been found there [New Netherland], which those who cultivate the land should look out for. Hendrick Christiaenssen carried thither, by order of his employers, bucks and goats, also rabbits, but they were found to be poisoned by the herbs. The Directors intended to send thither this spring voyage [1635] a quantity of hogs which will be of great service to the colony; and cows, with young calves, as shall follow."—Wassenaker, Historisch Verhael, in Jameson’s Nat. N. Neth., 79-81.

It is clear that this expedition is the same as that referred to below, in Van Rappard Documents C and D (p. 21, under March 28), and which sailed bearing instructions for Provincial Governor Verhulst, dated April 22, 1625, and that it must therefore have left Holland shortly after that date.

Wassenaker records that, in this year, Willem Verhulst (or van der Hulst) became the second director of New Netherland (probably receiving his commission in April, just before the fleet sailed for New Netherland)—Historisch Verhael, in Jameson’s Nat. N. Neth., 84. A contemporary manuscript copy of his "sailing instructions," undated, and "further instructions," dated April 22, 1625, in conformity with which latter he was to conduct the government under the West India Company, is still in existence, belonging to Mr. Hendrick van Wassenaer, but nothing has come to light about the ships Mackerel, Horse, Cow & Sheep have & now go there, etc. Although all known contemporary sources of information have been searched, no record has been found of any other ship sailing to New Netherland in April, or during a period of several months immediately proceeding or following that month, except the ships of Huitl’s expedition, which Wassenaker records as sailing in April, the same author’s earlier reference to the “good care” taken “in the spring” to provide everything for the colony in Virginia, the ships referred to under Jan. and Feb., 1625 (p. 20), and Wassenaker’s further statement that the "Mackerel" left the Fevel on April 25th for New Netherland, and was there captured on the way.

If the "Mackerel" left Holland in company with the other ships of Huitl’s expedition, the fact was not recorded by Wassenaker, or anywhere else, so far as we have been able to ascertain, except in the document now under consideration. However, as the "Mackerel" was a fast-sailing yacht, she may well have left slightly in advance of the rest of the fleet, to act as a sort of scout, and perhaps with the intention that she should join the other ships belonging to the same employment, after the danger of the channel were safely passed. Furthermore, as she was a small vessel, of only 60 tons burden, it seems very unlikely that Verhulst (and the council) would have sailed on her rather than in one of the larger ships. If he had, it is probable that Wassenaer would have recorded the fact, whereas, in describing her capture, he specifically mentions only one person on board, a member of the crew "who had assisted in the capture of Bahia."

The only reasonably satisfactory explanation seems to be that the "further instructions" were forwarded on this boat because she was faster than the larger ships, and that Verhulst sailed earlier, but probably in the same month, on another boat, of which no record has yet been found. It is, however, conceivable that there were two ships named the "Mackerele," and that the one captured on the 27th was not the one belonging to Huitl's expedition. It is of course also possible that Wassenaer is mistaken in some of his statements or dates, but, even if all this were so, the fact would remain that we are told in Document D that "further instructions" were forwarded by messenger to Verhulst, who must therefore have already started.

Although Wassenaer says that this expedition was fitted out by Pieter Pietersz. ten Eycken, we know from Van Rappard Document D that it had an official character, and was dispatched by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., also that it comprised the ships "Paert" (Horse), "Koe" (Cow), and "Schaep" (Sheep), accompanied, as we have already noted, by a fast-sailing yacht, named the "Wassenaer," which, according to Wassenaer, apparently was captured on April 27, and taken to Dunkirk.

Under Nov., (preface dated June 14, 1627), Part XII, Wassenaer, evidently referring to Verhulst's expedition (although he cites part XI, whereas this expedition is recorded in part IX), says: "In our preceding discourse [part XI] mention was made of New Netherlands and its colony planted by the West India Company, situated in Virginia on the river called by the French Mon-taigne, and by us Mauritius, and that some families were sent thither out of Holland, now increased to two hundred souls; and afterwards some ships, one with horses, the other with cows, and the third with hay; two months afterwards a flying-boat was equipped carrying sheep, hogs, wagons, ploughs and all other implements of husbandry."

Willem Verhulst, who, as we have seen, came over as "commis" or commissary, with, or just before, this first expedition, and as "principal director" of the colony of New Netherlands, was accompanied or followed by Gerrit Forges, as deputy or "Onder-Commis," and Cryn Fredericks, as engineer and surveyor. The cattle were, "on their arrival, first landed on Nut Island, three miles up the river, where they remained a day or two. There being no streams there then, they were shipped in sailing-boats to the Manhates, right opposite the said island. Being put out to pasture there, they thrive well, but afterwards, all but two, in all died. The opinion is, that they had eaten something bad from an uncultivated soil. But they went in the middle of September [1625] to meadow grass, as good and as long as could be desired." (Under Nov., recording the same event, Wassenaer says: "The cattle carried thither were removed upwards to a convenient place abounding with grass and pasture."—Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael, II, part IX, p. 58, and translation in Jameson's N. N. Neth., 79-83; Van Rappard Documents C, D, and E, Brodhead, Hist. State of N. Y., II: 158.)

This date is found also on Van Rappard Document E, which consists of "particular instructions" given by the West India Co. to the engineer and surveyor Cryn Fredericks, who sailed with Verhulst, for the construction of a town and fortress in New Nederland. Wassenaer states, perhaps with the text of which he was not familiar, that the ship is referred to in the letter that refers to the arrest of Mr. Henry E. Huntington, has not been made public, the character of its contents is known, and will be found described under March 90, 1624.

Maurice, Prince of Orange, after many years of active participation and leadership in the affairs of Holland, dies. He was succeeded as States-General and admiral-general by Frederik Henry, Prince of Orange.—Brodhead, op. cit., 1: 160.

Concerning the capture of the "Mackered," which Wassenaer records on this date, he observes (translated): "Prudence is the foster mother of all wisdom; impudence causes mischief; such has experienced a small ship, sailing for New Netherlands loaded with some necessaries, measuring about 30 tons (60 tons), when on the 27th of the month in the middle of the sea, the left the Texel, and on the 29th was already in the enemy's possession, who flying the Orange colours, discovering it in a fog, called to the skipper just to come on board; he being a simple man unhesitatingly complied and was immediately captured. Thus the little vessel was also conveyed to Dunkirk, to the great regret of Prince John (Hist. State of N. T., I: 153), are certainly perplexing, as it seems clearly visible from Van Rappard Document D that the "Mackered" started out in company with the ships "Horse," "Cow," and "Sheep."

Under this month (the preface is dated Dec. 1, 1625), Wassenaer records: "At the same time arrived a small ship from New Netherland, mostly with furs. As far as good order is concerned, all goes well there. The vessels with the cattle had not yet got there; the crops which our colonists had planted, looked well, but there was no certain information thereof. The next will bring their owners good news." (Should be translated full information.)—Jameson, N. N. Neth., 82.

It is alleged by Innes (New Amsterdam and Its People, 4, 172, 271) that a common pasturage was laid out in this summer on Manhattan Island, which "was commenced at once" after the arrival of the colonists, and that this was the beginning of the later well-known "Sheep Pasture" which lay at the upper end of the present Broad St., reaching to the Strand (present Pearl St.). No evidence has been found to substantiate this claim; the colonists who arrived in the summer of 1625 put their cattle on Nut (Governors) Island for a "day or two," but "there being no means of pasturing them there, they were shipped in sleeping and boats to the Manhates." Here they thrive well for a time, but afterwards about twenty died, probably from eating poisonous vegetation. The cattle, were then removed upwards in the middle of September "to a convenient place abounding with grass and pasture."

Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael, in Jameson's N. N. Neth., 82, 83. The statement above quoted is ambiguous, and "upwards" may refer to pasture farther north on Manhattan Island, or to some point higher up the river, perhaps in the neighbourhood of Fort Orange (Albany). These colonists and animals probably arrived either late in June or early in July, 1625, and the surviving animals were removed "in the middle of September, or meadow grass, as good and as long as could be desired."

Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael, in Jameson's N. N. Neth., 79, 82, 83. The first known reference to the Sheep Pasture is in a deed dated July 1, 1626 (q.v.).

The Treaty of Southampton is signed, by which the Dutch and English are brought into closer alliance against Spain, the common enemy. One clause of the treaty provides that the ports of each signatory shall be open to the war and merchant vessels of the other.—Brodhead, op. cit., 1: 161, 182.

A ship came, at the same time, for the aforesaid Company from Nova Germania, laden mostly with peltries; and had a favorable voyage. (The margin has the reading "Nieu Nederland," and the reference is clearly to New Netherlands; although it is interesting to note that Wassenaer, pt. VII, fol. 89, under date of June, 1624, speaks of: "the coast of wild Brazil [by Domine Petrus Planckus called Nova Germania, because the Nether Dutch and especially the worthy Dirck Clasen, Burch, have had agents there on nearly all the rivers.]" On fol. 90, Wassenaer says: "The entire Wild Coast (by the worthy Petrus Planckus called Nova Germania, a little too soon) is completely plundered by the Spanish."

The cattle carried thither were removed upwards to a convenient place abounding with grass and pasture. Only two animals died on the passage. This gave great satisfaction to the freighter, who had managed the transportation so neatly.—Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael, in Jameson's N. N. Neth., 82. The expedition here referred to is evidently that which sailed in April, 1625 (see April 29). Van Rappard has hitherto overlooked it.

Pieter Minuit proposed to leave Holland on this day.—Wassen-er, Historisch Verhael, in Jameson's N. N. Neth., 87. Apparently, however, he did not sail until Jan. 9, 1626—Ibid., 88. See March 30, 1624 (next to last paragraph).
CHAPTER I

B.—THE DUTCH PERIOD

1626—1664

I

This year, goods and merchandise valued at 20,584 guilders were brought in Holland by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., and sent in two ships to New Netherland.—De Laet, Kort Verhael; 16, in his Historie (1644). There were imported into Holland from New Netherland 7,528 beavers, and 857 otters and other peltries, valued at 45,090 guilders.—Ibid., 29.

Although it has not proved possible to determine with absolute certainty the date of the first settlement on Manhattan Island, nor to clear away completely the mystery which has so long surrounded and obscured those remote days, nevertheless, the recent discovery of the Van Rappard Document, which we are authorized to present a picture of Manhattan Island during the two years immediately preceding Minuit's arrival, which, although sketchy and lacking in detail, is, nevertheless, in all probability, true in its essential features.

The extreme limits of what may be termed the period of first settlement are marked, respectively, by the start, shortly after March 30, 1626 (q.v.), of the expedition on the "Nieu Nederland," which now appears, without reasonable doubt, to have been the first definite step in the settlement of New Netherland following the completion of the organization of the West India Company, on June 21, 1624 (unless we accept the theory that the "Macedor" of the expedition was an official one, and that some of her passengers remained on Manhattan Island—see below), and the arrival at Manhattan Island, on May 4th, 1626, of Peter Minuit.

Although, as various items in the Chronology indicate, it is not impossible, and in the author's opinion it is even likely, that explorers and traders, possibly in some cases including women, camped upon the island, and erected temporary shelters, or even groups of huts, as early as 1624, perhaps even before that time; and although, further, it seems to him not impossible that this occasional occupation may, in the aggregate, have covered a considerable portion of the period between 1614 and 1626, nevertheless, that nothing approaching a permanent settlement can have existed prior to 1625 is pretty conclusively shown by the succession of events here recorded; and the episode of the expulsion, in the Spring of 1624, by May, aided by the crew of the "Macedor," of the "Frenchman" who sought to set up the arms of the French king at the mouth of the Hudson constitutes also pretty definite proof that no settlement existed in this neighbourhood in the early summer of 1624, and that the settlers who accompanied May were, therefore, the first permanent colonists to reach the Hudson River.

This expedition was perhaps hastened by the appearance, in Adriaen Joris (Tienpoint) before the "Assembly of XIX," on Nov. 3, 1625 (q.v.), and it is altogether likely that he accompanied it, possibly on a second ship, the "Endracht," or "Unity," as indicated by Catalina Trico (see May!, 1624), although no record of such a ship, sailing to New Netherland in this year, has been found.

There may, indeed, well have been two ships, as a vessel of 150 lasts seems hardly large enough to have accommodated 38 families, in addition to the officers, crew, and other passengers, on a transatlantic voyage. The fact that the "Nieu Nederland" alone is mentioned by Wassenaer, may be accepted as conclusive proof that she was not accompanied by another vessel, or vessels; Wassenaer is sometimes careless in such respects. It is even conceivable that the expedition included the "Endracht" and the "Nieu Verdriet," as well as the "Nieu Nederland," which theory would go far toward reconciling all of the seemingly conflicting statements.

The description of the Van Rappard papers in Muller's catalogue brought to light for the first time the name "Nieu Verdriet," or "New Sorrow," and the dates March 18th and March 30th on the two contemporary copies of Van Rappard Document A, coupled with Wassenaer's statement that the "Nieu Nederlandt" sailed "early in March," led, at first, to the supposition that there were two distinct expeditions in March, 1624. An examination of all available facts, however, has led to the conclusion that there was, in reality, but one expedition, the well-known expedition under Cornelis Jacobz. May, in the "Nieu Nederland," and that this expedition sailed on, or immediately after, March 30, under "provisional orders," as we are told us through the Van Rappard Document A, which are given in full, in translated form, under March 28th, 1626 (q.v.).

Furthermore, it seems clear, as we have already noted, that Adriaen Joris (Tienpoint) accompanied this expedition in some official capacity, and was possibly in command of a second ship, a supposition which is strengthened by a Report on the Condition of New Netherland, dated Dec. 15, 1614 (q.v.), in which occurs the statement that the colonists arriving in New Netherland were "under the direction of Cornelis Jacobz. Mey & Adriaen Joriz. Tienpoint, which Directors, in the year 1624 built Fort Orange on the North River, and Fort Nassau on the South River, and after that, in 1626, Fort Amsterdam on the Manhatte,"—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 149.

This explanation, which would be in harmony with most of the statements made by Catalina Trico, is based upon a belief that the names "Nieu Verdriet," which name, so far as we know, occurs only in the catalogue description of the Van Rappard Documents, is, in reality, a mis-reading for "Nieu Nederlandt." If the two names are written side by side, in the old Dutch script, the great similarity in form becomes at once apparent. Furthermore, "New Sorrow" seems an altogether unlikely name to choose for a ship (cf. p. 60). Unfortunately, it has not been possible to verify this theory by reference to the original document, but, in view of all the known facts, it seems to furnish the most reasonable solution of what otherwise appear to be hopelessly irreconcilable statements.

This theory is further strengthened by the fact that May and his Walloons, when they expelled the "Frenchman" lying in the mouth of the Hudson, forbade the erection of the arms of the French king "by commission from the Lords State General & the Directors of the West India Company;" in all likelihood a reference to May's "provisional orders" (Van Rappard Document A). Moreover, if we accept this theory in general, there seems no reason for doubting Catalina Trico's definite statement that "as soon as they came to Manatans [the earlier deposit says about three weeks after they arrived] . . . they sent two families & 6 men to Harford River & 2 families & 8 men to Delaware River & 8 men they left at Nieu: Yorke to take Possession, & ye' Rest of ye' Passengers [about 18 families] went ye' th.yth Ship up as far as Albany, which they then Called fort Orange." This is true that, in order to reconcile Catalina Trico's statement that 8 men and 2 families were sent to the Delaware River about three weeks after the arrival of the expedition at Manhattan Island with Wassenaer's statement that the "Frenchman" did not attempt to enter the Delaware River, "because of the settlers already there," it is necessary to assume that these latter had been dispatched thither by May between the date of his arrival and that of the arrival of the "Frenchman," or else that this settlement was already in existence, which is unlikely, unless we assume that, coming from the direction of the Gold Coast, and therefore

1625—approaching the Hudson from the south, May put ashore a first installation of settlers in passing the Delaware, in which case these settlers would have been the first to be landed in what is now Manhattan Island. They were certainly not the second instalment, as is commonly assumed. In this connection, see May?, 1624.

If, as Catalina Trico states, Tiempot was in command at Fort Orange, is it not likely that he acted as May's deputy, and that May himself, while retaining the supreme command in New Netherland, went shortly after his arrival here. Indeed he is referred to, in a Report Concerning the Swedish settlement on the Delaware, made by Stuyvesant, on Jan. 18, 1626 (p. 10), to the Amsterdam chamber, as "the first who coming here [the Delaware] made his dwelling on the river," and that he afterwards joined the 8 men with whom, Catalina Trico tells us, had been left on Manhattan Island "to take Possession," probably making it, or possibly Nottin Island, his head-quarters, as governor, until the arrival of Ver Hulst in 1625.

Wassenaar's statement, under Nov., 1626, that "Cornelis May of Hoora was the first Director there in the year 1624," and that "Willem Van Hulst was the 2nd, in the year 1625," occurs in the midst of a consecutive narrative dealing solely with progress on Manhattan Island, and the word "there" seems from the context clearly to refer to Manhattan, rather than to Fort Orange, or to New Netherland in general. A careful reconsideration of the old and new facts and side-lights has led the author to the conclusion that Catalina Trico's much maligned depositional furnishes, after all, the most plausible and likely solution of this difficult problem, and that she arrived at Manhattan Island on the "Nieu Nederland," or in another vessel, shortly after the first, in the summer of 1624. It can hardly have been early in May, as Wassenaar states, as the voyage probably consumed at least six weeks.

Her statement that a group of colonists destined for the Delaware River "went in a vessel... & there settled," the probability that the group going to the Hartford River also went by water, and the fact that the ship on which Catalina Trico herself sailed went up to Albany, suggest the possibility that three ships, and not one, were engaged in this expedition. Were we to assume that this was the fact, Catalina Trico's seemingly contradictory statements regarding the number of women and families taking part in the expedition would be easily reconciled, for they would then indicate that she and the four women came on one ship, and the families on the others. In general, her statement describes just such a series of facts as we should expect to find in connection with the first official expedition of settlers sent by the West India Company to New Netherland, viz.

The expedition carried carefully prepared instructions regarding the selection of places suitable for settlements on the Hudson River and elsewhere in New Netherland.

Immediately upon its arrival, steps were taken to take possession of the three great rivers (the Hudson, Fresh, and South Rivers), which together controlled the entire inland trade of New Netherland; and for this purpose permanent settlers, including families, were sent to the last two named points, and settlers, doubtless including also families, took up their abode on Manhattan Island, or in its immediate vicinity. As we know that the expedition included 30 families, whereas Catalina Trico states that only "about 18" went to Albany, and 2 each to the Fresh and South Rivers, the remaining 8 families presumably remained on Manhattan Island, with the 8 men left there "to take Possession," or perhaps on Nottin Island, or some of them may have settled at the Wallabout, or elsewhere in the neighbourhood.

The settlements here referred to on the Fresh and South Rivers were, without doubt, the earliest real settlements made at these points, although, as in the case of Manhattan Island, the records regarding them, most of which date from a considerably later period, are confusing and somewhat contradictory, in the majority of cases giving 1625 as the date of settlement.—See O'Callaghan,Hist. of N. Neth., 1001; Oct. 30, 1657. This date we may, however, safely assume is erroneous, as no official Dutch settlement could have been undertaken before the approval by the states-general of the final steps in the organization of the West India Co. in June of this year, and there is, as we have seen, no record of any expedition to New Netherland having been sent out thereafter (except that on the "Mackerel," which, sailing on July 16, 1625, immediately after the final organization of the chartered West India Co., must have had an official standing, and was perhaps a reconnoitring expedition, or possibly an attempt on the part of the Amsterdam chamber to obtain some advantages, by being the first in the field) until that which sailed in the following spring (1624) in the "Nieu Nederland," of which expedition Catalina Trico clearly must have been a member. It will be remembered that she herself states that the ship on which she came belonged to "y[ea] first Ship y[ea] came here for 5th Company" (p. 17). The fact that she gives the "Unity" ("Eendracht") as the name of the ship on which she arrived, may, as we have said, indicate that this vessel accompanied the "Nieu Nederland," or, it may be explained by supposing that she confused the name of the ship with whom, Catalina Trico tells us, had been left on Manhattan Island "to take Possession," probably making it, or possibly Nottin Island, his head-quarters, as governor, until the arrival of Ver Hulst in 1625.

It is significant that, in the first of two broadsides, issued respectively on Sept. 2, and 8, 1643, by Killian van Rensselaer, and reproduced and translated in Van Rensselaer Brouer MSS., opp. pp. 623 and 697, it is stated that Killian van Rensselaer's patent was granted to him "as patrons of the earliest colony on the North River" (p. 653), and that in the second he is referred to as patrons of the colony of Rensselaerswijk, the first and oldest on this [North] river" (p. 697). It is also interesting to note that as, in 1624, there was already the nucleus of a settlement at Fort Orange, and, as no mention of this was made in the "Articles," the West India Co., as promoters of the "Nieu Verduirt" (or "New Netherlands") expedition, probably the summer and some later locality for their first, and principal settlement when they instructed their colonists "to take their abode on the River of the Prince Maurice, or at such other places as shall be assigned to them by the Commander and his Council." See March 25, 1624.

Until the Van Rappard manuscript is made public, or other transcripts of the original documents come to light, or new documents of a similar character are discovered, we can hope to arrive at a complete solution of this much vexed question; perhaps not even then.

Mr. Va. Loo, after reading this brief summary of facts and theories in connection with the date of the first settlement of Manhattan Island, suggests the addition of the following facts:

Wassenaer (p. V, fol. 47), under date of May 1623, says that toward the end of the month three arrived in Zeeland one Pieter Schouten, first a chirurgeon, then a physician, and finally a free trader (freebooter), with a valuable price, worth 80,000 guilders, which he captured in the Gulf of Mexico. He is said to be well acquainted with that coast, so that he would be very serviceable to the West India Company.

Under date of July 1623, Wassenaer (p. V, fol. 10) mentions Willem Schouten, skipper of Isaac le Maure, whose ship took fire in the river Distr. Under date of Sept., 1624 (p. VII, fol. 154), he mentions a brave Zeelander, named Schout, who entered the service of the West India Co., and who sailed with Admiral Wilkens to the Gulf of Mexico. This is apparently the Commander Schouten mentioned under date of Sept. 21, 1624 (p. 9).

In p. IX, fol. 60, under date of May, 1625, Wassenaer mentions the funeral of Amsterdam Willem Schouts [De Lare, Kort Verhaelt, p. 10, gives his name as Pieter Schouten], who in his lifetime had done much for the W. I. Co., as he was well acquainted with the Gulf of Mexico and had been a chief of the last given by the arrival of the ship 'de Hoop,' although private persons, who are not directors of the Company, knew about it.—Records of the old West India Co. at The Hague, No. 1 (lettered No. 447), part 4, item 60. The Minutes of Sept. 24 contain the following: "There was read a copy of the Assembly of a certain letter written by Commander Schouten on the 26th of July last from the ship 'de Hoop,' on the coast of Florida, to the chamber of Zeeland, wherein he gives an account of his voyage and of various attacks which failed, as may be seen more in detail in the said copy."—Ibid., item 70.
THE TRADING CHARTER OF OCT. 11, 1614. SEE P. 41.
The above mentioned “Eendracht” is referred to by Wassenaer, a director-general of the Dutch India Company, as the first ship belonging to the company’s fleet. “As we have seen,” he writes, “the headquarters of the company’s stores, and here its business was transacted under the supervision of its “koopman” or chief commercial agent, Isaac de Rasière, who had arrived in the “Arms of Amsterdam,” on July 27 of this year (see Sect. 23).—Letter of de Rasière, in Jansen’s N. Neth., 102. This building did not survive, having been burned in the later war state. The vice-admiral took a fine prize, valued by the Spanish at 16 tons of gold (1,600,000 guilders), and returned to Zeeland. The admiral abandoned his large ship, “de Hoop,” which he sent home, and took command of the yacht. Cf. De Luet, Kort Verhael, in his Jaartijds Verhael, p. 10. Wassenaer, ps. V, fol. 42 vs., under date of May 1624, mentions a prize taken by “de Eendracht,” of EnschuyDEN, belonging to the fleet under Admiral l’Hermite. This fleet left England, May 23, 1625, and about two weeks later sighted some Turkish ships near Port A Port. The prize taken by the “Eendracht” was taken shortly after that time and sent to Amsterdam, where it arrived apparently in June 1625. This may have been the same ship as the vice-admiral, mentioned above. It was evidently a man-of-war, and presumably not the ship called the “N. Neth.” in the Dutch newspapers. It is possible that the ship called the “New Netherland” was conveyed by “de Eendracht,” and that Catelina’s Trico got the name mixed.

The above items present an interesting example of Wassenaer’s method of dating. The return of “de Hoop” and “de Eendracht,” which occurred in Sept., is entered under Dec., whereas he enters under Sept., 1624, the sailing of Schouten on the ship “de Hoop.” Peter Minuit arrives at Manhattan Island, to succeed Willem van der Donck, as director-general of New Netherland. He sailed from Holland on Jan. 9 (p. v), in the ship “Zeeneeuw,” or “Meeuwkes” (Sea-Mews), of Adriaen Joris (Tienhöop) was skipper. Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael, in Jansen’s N. Neth., 83, 85.

Soon after Minuit had established his colony on Manhattan Island, he ordered the outlying families and most of the men at Fort Orange (Albany), as well as all who were at Fort Nassau (Gloceaster, N. J.) to concentrate at Manhattan. We know from Wassenaer that by November the “fort at the South River” had already been vacated. Wassenaer, in Historisch Verhael, in Jansen’s N. Neth., 86, and that the 8 families at Fort Orange “were to leave there this year,”... “ten or twelve seamen in the Company’s service” alone remaining.—Ibid., 85. The “Arms of Amsterdam,” which had sailed from New Netherland on Sept. 25, and arrived at Amsterdam on Nov. 4, carried news of this place to the Dutch. As the population of New Netherland had “now increased to two hundred souls,” the purchase of Manhattan Island from the Indians had been effected (see Nov. 5). Director-General Minuit, and Isaac de Rasière, chief commercial agent of the West India Co., in New Netherland, lived together, while the others lived in “thirty ordinary houses on the east [i.e., near the strand on the east side of the island, and in temporary hovels built of the bark of trees.” Jan Lempou was schout, an officer who exercised a considerable authority, like that of an English sheriff and a public prosecutor, among the English authorities. Concerning the administration of law and order and the occupations of the people, Wassenaer made the following records: “The council there administers justice in criminal matters as far as imposing fines, but not as far as corporal punishment. Should it happen that any one deserves that, he must be sent to Holland with his sentence.... Everyone there who fills no public office is busy about his affairs. Men work there as in Holland; one trades, another worksouthwards and northwards; another builds houses, the third farms. Each farmer has his farmstead on the land purchased by the Company, which also owns the cows; but the mills remains to the profit of the farmer; he sells it to those of the people who receive their wages for working as follows: In the year 1625, under Nov. 22, Jan. Jansen’s N. Neth., 82-86 (preface dated June 14, 1627); De Luet, New World, in ibid., 54; Schagen’s letter (see Nov. 5). Among the first buildings erected upon Manhattan Island, after its settlement under Minuit, was the “counting-house” of the West India Co., “a stone building, thatched with reed.”—Wassenaer’s Historisch Verhael, in Jansen’s N. Neth., 83, 85. It was the headquarter of the company’s stores, and here its business was transacted under the supervision of its “koopman” or chief commercial agent, Isaac de Rasière, who had arrived in the “Arms of Amsterdam,” on July 27 of this year (see Sect. 23).—Letter of de Rasière, in Jansen’s N. Neth., 102. This building did not survive, having been burned in the later war state. The vice-admiral took a fine prize, valued by the Spanish at 16 tons of gold (1,600,000 guilders), and returned to Zeeland. The admiral abandoned his large ship, “de Hoop,” which he sent home, and took command of the yacht. Cf. De Luet, Kort Verhael, in his Jaartijds Verhael, p. 10. Wassenaer, ps. V, fol. 42 vs., under date of May 1624, mentions a prize taken by “de Eendracht,” of EnschuyDEN, belonging to the fleet under Admiral l’Hermite. This fleet left England, May 23, 1625, and about two weeks later sighted some Turkish ships near Port A Port. The prize taken by the “Eendracht” was taken shortly after that time and sent to Amsterdam, where it arrived apparently in June 1625. This may have been the same ship as the vice-admiral, mentioned above. It was evidently a man-of-war, and presumably not the ship called the “N. Neth.” in the Dutch newspapers. It is possible that the ship called the “New Netherland” was conveyed by “de Eendracht,” and that Catelina’s Trico got the name mixed.

The above items present an interesting example of Wassenaer’s method of dating. The return of “de Hoop” and “de Eendracht,” which occurred in Sept., is entered under Dec., whereas he enters under Sept., 1624, the sailing of Schouten on the ship “de Hoop.” Peter Minuit arrives at Manhattan Island, to succeed Willem van der Donck, as director-general of New Netherland. He sailed from Holland on Jan. 9 (p. v), in the ship “Zeeneeuw,” or “Meeuwkes” (Sea-Mews), of Adriaen Joris (Tienhöop) was skipper. Wassenaer, Historisch Verhael, in Jansen’s N. Neth., 83, 85.

Soon after Minuit had established his colony on Manhattan Island, he ordered the outlying families and most of the men at Fort Orange (Albany), as well as all who were at Fort Nassau (Gloceaster, N. J.) to concentrate at Manhattan. We know from Wassenaer that by November the “fort at the South River” had already been vacated. Wassenaer, in Historisch Verhael, in Jansen’s N. Neth., 86, and that the 8 families at Fort Orange “were to leave there this year,”... “ten or twelve seamen in the Company’s service” alone remaining.—Ibid., 85. The “Arms of Amsterdam,” which had sailed from New Netherland on Sept. 25, and arrived at Amsterdam on Nov. 4, carried news of this place to the Dutch. As the population of New Netherland had “now increased to two hundred souls,” the purchase of Manhattan Island from the Indians had been effected (see Nov. 5). Director-General Minuit, and Isaac de Rasière, chief commercial agent of the West India Co., in New Netherland, lived together, while the others lived in “thirty ordinary houses on the east [i.e., near the strand on the east side of the island, and in temporary hovels built of the bark of trees.” Jan Lempou was schout, an officer who exercised a considerable authority, like that of an English sheriff and a public prosecutor, among the English authorities. Concerning the administration of law and order and the occupations of the people, Wassenaer made the following records: “The council there administers justice in criminal matters as far as imposing fines, but not as far as corporal punishment. Should it happen that any one deserves that, he must be sent to Holland with his sentence.... Everyone there who fills no public office is busy about his affairs. Men work there as in Holland; one trades, another worksouthwards and northwards; another builds houses, the third farms. The larger ship undoubtedly was the Wapen van Amsterdam, Sept. which was already in the service.—Wasseaer, in Jameson, N. N. 4 Neth., 85, 87, 88, 89. Jaak de Baerdt, chief commercial agent of the West India Co. and secretary of New Netherland, came over to the province in the ship, the "Arms of Amsterdam," arriving at Manhattan Island on July 27, 1626. On her return voyage to Holland, the "Arms of Amsterdam" reached Amsterdam on Nov. 4. She carried a cargo, valued at sieckentrooster and kommies, for the settlement on the Island of Manhattan, on Sept. 23 (the day that the ship left the colony), and addressed to the directors of the West India Co., in which he gave a full description of the life and difficulties of the Dutch colonists. The original manuscript is lost; but its contents are preserved through one of the Van Rappard papers, known as Document F, a contemporary MS. copy of the original document (40pp., folio). Cf. Jameson's N. N. Neth., 85, 97-115.

This report is the earliest known extant text of a letter written from Manhattan Island. Although the contemporary copy is now in America, having been bought, with the other Van Rappard Documents by Mr. Henry E. Huntington, in 1914, it has not yet been made public. For such information as is available concerning this very important document which deals with the state of the settlement on Manhattan Island as it existed at the time of De Rastiere's arrival, see March 30, 1626. Huijen are merely lists of facts and events under this Nov. month, his preface being dated June 14, 1627. (Although some of these facts and events have been noted in describing existing at Manhattan during the summer of this year, it has seemed best to repeat them here in their proper sequence, just as Wasseaer gives them.)

"The colony is now established on the Manhatte, where a fort has been staked out by Master Kryn Freedgeck, an engineer. It is planned to be of large dimensions. The ship which has returned home this month ["The Arms of Amsterdam"]; on Nov. 4 (see above) brings samples of all sorts of produce growing there, the cargo being 72.46 beaver skins, 675 otter skins, 48 minks, 36 wild cat, and various other sorts; many pieces of oak timber and bickory.

"The counting-house is kept in a stone building, thatched with reed; the other houses are of the bark of trees. Each has his own house. The Director and Kompman [chief commercial agent of the company, acting also as secretary of the province] live together; there are thirty ordinary houses on the east side of the river, which runs nearly north and south. The Honorable Pieter Minuit is Director there at present; Jan Lempoo schout; Sebastiaan Jansz. Crol and Jan Huych, comforters of the sick, who whilst awaiting a clergyman, read the offices; the church there, on Sundays, texts of Scripture and the commentaries. . . ."

Cornelia May of Hoen was the first Director there, in the year 1624; Willem Van Hulst [Verhulst] was the second, in the year 1625. He returns now. . . . The houses of the Hollander are not yet built, and when they are completed, they will all repair within, so as to garrison it and be secure from sudden attack.

"Those of the South River will abandon their fort [Fort Nassau], and come hither. At Fort Orange, the most northerly point at which the Hollander traded, no more than fifteen or sixteen men will remain; the remainder will come down [to the Manhatte]. Right opposite is the fort of the Maykans which they built against their enemies, the Maquaes [Mohawks], a powerful people. . . ."

"The families were to leave there [Fort Orange] this year—a fort to remain garnished by sixteen men, without women—in order to strengthen with people the colony near the Manhatte, who are becoming more and more accustomed to the strangers. . . . [see Oct., 1628]."

When the fort, staked out at the Manhatte, will be completed, it is to be named Amsterdam. The fort at the South River is already vacated, in order to strengthen the colony. Trading there is carried on only in yachts, in order to avoid expense.

"The Sicketanes [or Squoins, dwelling on the Connecticut River] dwell toward the North, between the Brownists and the Dutch. . . ."

The Brownists, who live beyond them, are Englishmen, who removed thither by consent of the King. They call themselves Puritans, because they seek after purity in the Orthodox religion. They wished not to live in England; desiring not wealth, but merely necessities and a moderate condition."—Historisch Verhael, in Jameson's N. N. Neth., 82-86.
He arrived yesterday the ship Th Arms of Amsterdam which sailed from New Netherland out of the Meer genes River on September 23; they report that our people there are of good courage, and live peaceably. Their women, also, have borne children there; they have bought the island Manhattan from the wild men for the value of sixty guilders, [it] is 11,000 morgens in extent. They sowed all their grains the middle of May, and harvested it the middle of August. Those being samples of summer grain, such as wheat, rye, barley, oats, buckwheat, canary seed, small beans, and flax. The cargo of the aforesaid ship: 7,146 beaver skins, 1788 otter skins [178 half otter skins?], 675 otter skins, 485 mink skins, 36 wild-cat [lyxina] skins, 53 mink, 34 rat skins. Many logs of oak and nut-wood. Herewith be ye High Mighty Sirs, commended to the Almighty’s grace, In Amsterdam, November 5, A.D. 1626

Peter Minuit "now sends to [Holland] for his wife thither" (New Amsterdam).—Wassenaer, under Nov., in Jameson’s Nav. N. Neth., — 87.

5 Peter Jansen Schaghen, deputy in the states-general from the States of Holland and West Friesland, writes from Amsterdam to the states-general, in session at The Hague:

"High Mighty Sirs:

The following is the earliest known, letter by a Dutchman to the Netherlands. It was written in the summer of 1626, by Jacob Allerton, as an agent for the Plymouth colonists, purchases for £900 the entire interest of the London Company in the Plymouth colony. When the news of the agreement reached the colonists in 1627, 7 or 8 of ye cheele of ye place became joyously bound for ye presentment of this 1626 (in ye behalfe of ye rest).

On this day, at a meeting at Middleburg in Zealand, a petition sent by P. Courten to the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co. for payment of Jan Price, a surgeon (barber), is considered, which states that "the skipper Arjaen Joris Thienponckt has now arrived from New Netherland." This refers to the return of the ship "Arms of Amsterdam" (Wapen van Amsterdam), of which Arjaen Joris Thienponckt was skipper, who went to New Netherland on Dec. 19, 1625, with the ship the "Sea-New" and conveyed Peter Minuit to the province of which he had been named as director by Wassenaer (Jameson’s Nav. N. Neth., 87) — Brazil Papers, box 1, in Hist. Soc. of Pa.

"The directors of the West India Company in Zealand sold the 14th of this month the following goods. . . . The aforesaid gentlemen having the management at Amsterdam also caused to be sold publicly various kinds of peltries, [such as] beaver skins, minks, otter skins and lynx, sent to them from New Netherland, and large quantities of logs, of oak and nut trees, which grow there in great abundance and which with the permission of the natives there are cut down and shipped, being very useful here for many necessary purposes."—Wassenaer, pt. XII, fol. 58-58 vo.

Peter Minuit, which, if it be authentic, probably depicts the little settlement at this time. The year 1628 appeared in a small volume entitled Beschrijvinghe Van Virginia, Nieuw Nederlandt (etc.) and issued by Joost Hartgers, in Amsterdam, in 1621. For a reproduction and description of this view, see Pl. 1, Vol. 1, and Bibliography, Vol. V.

As we have already seen, Kryn Fredericksz, accompanied the New Netherland colonists of 1625, as engineer and surveyor. By his "particular instructions," of April 22, 1625 (Van Rappard Doc. E — see March 30, 1624), he was charged by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co. with the construction of a fortification, as well as houses, in such suitable places as might be discovered by the council in New Netherland. Nothing is known definitely of this engineer’s work in New Netherland during the year 1625; but after the arrival of Minuit, in 1626, we find him associated with the new director at the newly-established colony on Manhattan Island, as is shown by a letter, written in the winter of 1625-6, by Jan van der Wier, and by Master Kryn Fredericksz, an engineer. It is planned to be of large dimensions."—Wassenaer, Historisch Verhaal, in Jameson’s Nav. N. Neth., 83, 86. This reference to the fort is followed in the original by the words: "en compt met het schip decaent gevert verder niet met monstert, als allegheinde ghiuwa aldrr. Thed, coming directly after the statement about Kryn Fredericksz, can hardly be interpreted otherwise than: and [he] returns by the ship arrived this month with samples of all sorts of produce there.

In other words, we have here a statement of the return to Holland of Kryn Fredericksz in November, 1626. It is earlier than that borne in in the Staten's Breviers for several years, including Jan van der Wier, 1627, 1628, and elsewhere, but not necessarily contradictory thereof. The above was the plan entertained prior to Sept. 23, 1626, when the "Arms of Amsterdam" sailed from Manhattan for Holland. At this time it was also deemed expedient to have a fort of large dimensions for the accommodation of all of the people within its enclosure, instead of in houses outside, so as to garrison it and be secure from sudden attack."—Wassenaer, op. cit. 84. De Laet explains this early fear. He says: "On the east side, upon the main land, dwell the Manhattan, a bad race of savages, who have always been very obdurate and unfriendly towards our country."—De Laet, New World, in Jameson, op. cit., 45. The plan of concentration within a large fort was never carried out. Instead, a poor earthwork of a fort was constructed, so poor, indeed, that in less than two years' time "the ramparts crumbled away like sand," and Minuit, in 1628, had resolved on the building of a new fort at Manhattan. "Kryn van der Wier, a Dutch adventurer, and faced outside entirely with stone."—Wassenaer, in Jameson, 88.

"The small fort, New Amsterdam," was now deemed necessary only as a protection against foreign invasion.—Letter of De Raskere, in Jameson, 104; letter of Michaelius, Aug. 8, 1628, in Versteek’s Manhattan in 1628, 89. Its construction proceeded at a small pace. Minuit was succeeded by Krol, and by Wouter van Twiller, in 1633, but the fort was still incomplete. Jacob Stoffelsen, who was overseer of the company’s negroes, deposed, on March 22, 1639, that, during the administration of Van Twiller, he had been steadily employed with the negroes "in building Fort Amsterdam, which was completed in the year 1652."—N. Y. Hist. Coll., XIV: 18. See also Aug. 14, 1635.

In connection with the reverses suffered by the company about this time, we learn that the fort had cost $4,172 guilders, to rulers ($1,669).—Hazard, Historical Collections, 1792, 1: 337. The subsequent history of the fort is known, 1638, for facing the fort outside entirely with stone, was not executed.

The following additional notes on the fort (1628 to 1635) are, for the most part, taken from the Chronology, where they will be found under their respective dates. They are gathered together here for more ready reference.

From the letter of Secretary De Raskere to Samuel Blommaert, written in 1627 or 1628 (see Autumn, 1628), we learn that the "Fort 'New Amsterdam' is building" and again that "The small
The desireability of reconstructing Fort Amsterdam of stone, and otherwise repairing it, was again discussed in the report of Dec. 15, 1644, of the "Board of Accounts," which included a suggestion to that effect from the director and commonty; but the "Board of Accounts," although agreeing with the necessity of immediately repairing the fort, was yet of the opinion that it could be effected in an economical manner by the use of "good clay and firm sods" (N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 152-53).

These latter ideas were actually included in the "instructions to the Director and Council of New Netherland," July 7, 1645 (ibid., I: 161).

By 1648, there were "whole streets full of houses close under Fort New Amsterdam" (N. T. Col. Doc., XIV: 94-96), as Van Slichtenhorst, director of the colony of Rensselaerswyck, states in a protest against Stuyvesant.

Stuyvesant, in his report on the surrender of 1646, said that when he arrived, in 1648, the fort resembled a molehill rather than a fortress, being without gates, and the walls and bastions trodden under foot by men and cattle (Jameson, 459). In this he agrees with Jogues's observation of 1645, and with the "Memorial of the Eight Men to the States General," Nov. 3, 1643 (N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 179), as well as with that of the "Eight Men" to the "Assembly of XIX," on Oct. 24, 1643 (ibid., I: 190).

In the "Remonstrance of New Netherland," July 28, 1649 (printed as the Fortbook, 1650), we are told that the fort "lay like a molehill or a tottering wall." From the first it has been declared that it should be repaired, laid in five angles, and put in royal condition,—"Representation of New Netherland," in Jameson's Nar. N. Neth., 331.

In the "Defence of Hendrick van Dyck, Fiscal in New Netherland," dated Sept. 18, 1653, Van Dyck said, with regard to the aforementioned instructions of July 7, 1645, that "In the year 1648, the Director, independent of the Deputy and me requested the Select men to lend a hand to finish the fort, who gave for answer, that they understood nothing about it [etc.] . . . After which, in the year 1651, the Director . . . had the outside of the fort faced with flat sods by the Company's Negros. But as the soil is sandy and the foundation weak, the sods mostly sagged and fell to pieces, so that the inhabitants' lives damaged the fort. . . . After that, the Director through Willem Beeckman, also one of his Select men, borrowed firewood here and there, with which the fort is now [1652] set off."

From the foregoing memoranda, it would appear that Kryn Fredericx staked out a fort in 1628, after the settlement of the colony under Menard; that it was planned to be of large dimensions, so as to enclose the entire colony within its walls; that meanwhile thirty ordinary houses built of the bark of trees, perhaps some of them dugouts, were used as temporary shelters by the inhabitants; that these houses were all outside of the fort, because the fort was not completed; that in October, 1628, a fort having been begun was being built, and faced outside entirely with stone, because the former ramparts had crumbled away like sand, and were now (1652) to be made more substantial; that this 1628 fort was called a small fort; that the population of 270 souls remained as yet without the fort, having no fear of the natives; that, as we know from the letter of Michaelius dated Aug. 11, 1628, they were then busy building a fort of good quarry stone, and faced outside entirely with stone, because the former ramparts had crumbled away like sand, and were now (1652) to be made more substantial; that this 1628 fort was called a small fort; that the population of 270 souls remained as yet without the fort, having no fear of the natives; that, as we know from the letter of Michaelius dated Aug. 8, 1628, a new fortress is in course of construction; that this fort had not been completed by Aug. 14, 1636 (q.v.), but that by 1643, when Jogues described it as having "four regular bastions," the curtains were mounds, most of which had crumbled away, leaving embrasures to be entered on all sides, and that then (1643) they were beginning to face the gates (gate- ways) and bastions more solid. But that in 1645, and by 1648, whole streets of houses had been built close to the walls of the fort (note that many of the houses had been destroyed by the Indians in 1643—N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 190-91); that the fort resembled a molehill from 1643 to 1649; that a suggestion was made in 1644 for immediate repairing the fort; that this suggestion from the director and commounty contemplated constructing Fort Amsterdam of stone, and otherwise repairing it; but that the "Board of Accounts" favoured economy and, as a counter suggestion, proposed that the fort be repaired with "good clay and firm sods" that the director and council were instructed from Holland, on July 7, 1645, to carry out the plan of the Board of Accounts, that the director, in 1648, sought the cooperation of the selectmen of the town, who, however, evaded him; that he then, in 1651, had the outside of the fort faced with flat sods by the negroes of the company, but these, on account of the sandy soil and weak foundations, mostly sagged and fell to pieces within a year; that in 1652, the director borrowed firewood and had it used to "set off" the fort.

The above facts, taken collectively, would seem to show that there was no solid stone fort; that the one begun in 1628 was an ill-founded fort; that the one begun in 1628, to replace the former, was only partly of stone, perhaps only the foundations; that the ramparts and bastions were sodden; that an attempt was made in 1641 to strengthen and render more permanent the gateways and bastions by facing them with stone, but that Stuyvesant, on his arrival in 1644, found the fort "more a molehill than a fortress, without gates, the walls and bastions trodden under foot by men and cattle."

No doubt proposals were made and considered from time to time for the use of stone, but the evidence shows that these proposals were generally not carried out, certainly not in full.

In this year, goods and merchandise valued at 56,170 guilders—were bought in Holland by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., and sent in four ships to New Netherland—De Laet, Kent Verhael, 26, in his Historie (1644). There were imported into Holland from New Netherland 7,520 barrels and 370 otters valued at 56,410 guilders.—Ibid., 19.

Isaac de Raisiere, secretary of the Dutch colony at New Mar. Amsterdam, begins an interesting correspondence with the English colony at New Plymouth. Bradford, in his history entitled Of Plimmoth Plantaition, writes:

"This year also they [the government at New Plymouth] had letters, and messengers from the Dutch-plantation, sent unto them from the Government there, written both in Dutch and French. The Dutch had traded in these southern parts, diverse years before they came; but they began no plantation near till 4. or 5. years after their [the New Plymouth colonists] coming, and here beginning. Their letters were as followeth. It being their manner to be full of complimentary titles. [Here follows the letter from Isaac de Raisiere, secretary of the Dutch colony at New Amsterdam, to the governor of the Plymouth plantation, reading as follows]<ref>
"Eedde, Eerenfeste Wyse Voorsimige Heeren, de Governeur, ende Raedem in Nieu-Pliemyn resideerende; onee seer Goede trianden."

"Den direcure ende Raed van Nieu-Nederlants, wenen vae Edc. eerenfeste, ende wyse voorsimige gedaen salichten [gedaalsal]hi. In Christi Iesu onsen Heere met goede voorst, ende gesoneht, nar siele, ende liçeam, Amen."

"The rest I shall render in English, leaving out the repetition of superfluous words, and putting aside entire sentences."

"We have often before this wished for an opportunitie or an occasion to congratulat you, and your prosperous and praiseworthy undertakings, and Government of your colony ther. And the more, in that we also have made a great begining to pitch the foundation of a collonie heer, and seeing our native country lyes not far from yours, and our fordlathers [diverse hundred years ago] have made and held friendship and alliance with your ances-tours, as suffciently appears by the old contractes and entercources . . . against our commune enemie the Spandiers . . ."

"And also seeing it hath some time since been reported unto us, by some of our people, that by occasion came so far northward with their shalop, and meeting with sundry of the Indians, who told them that they were within these a day journey of your plantation, and partook of their food and letters sent there to them; therefore we could not forbear to salute you with these few lines, with presentation of our good will and service unto you, in all friendly kindnes and neighborhood. And if it so fall out that any goods that comes to our hands from our native countries, may be serviceable unto you, we shall take ourselves bound to help and accommodate you therewith; either for beaver or any other wares or merchandise that you should be pleased to deal for. And if in case we have no commodity at present that may give you content, if you please to sell any beaver, or otter, or shuch like commodities as may be usefull for, for ready money, and let us understand thereby this bearer in writing, (whom have apointed to stay 3 or 4 days for your answer,) when you understand your minds there-in, we shall depute one to deal with you, at such place as you shall appoint. In the mean time we prays the Lord to take you, our honoured good friends and neighbours, into his holy protection.

"By the appointment of the Government and Counsell, etc.

"Isaac de Rasiere[.]

"Secretarius"

"From the Manhattan, in the fort Amsterdam, March 9. Anno 1657."—Governor Bradford's Letter to the Honorable and Worthy Council of New Plymouth (Ford ed., Boston, 1811), II, 24-29. Commenting on De Rasiere's letter, Ford says: "There can be no question that Manhattan received from the West India Company a better assortment of Indian goods than New Plymouth enjoyed, and, being a trading settlement, developed a keener commercial sense and a wider experience than the settlers at New Plymouth. This experience was marked by some great errors and blunders which imperilled their relations and friendship with the Indians; but on the whole the Dutch, living as they did between two hostile tribes, the Mohawks and the Mohicans, evidenced as high a skill in maintaining trade relations as the British and French. Had Rasiere realized the interest of New Plymouth in the development of a trade for furs, made all the more necessary by the agreement with the London Adventurers, he would not have made a proposition that could be interpreted only as one injurious to the interests of New Plymouth. Bradford meets it by asking prices and if other produce would be taken, and suggested the measure for controlling the trade in furs."

"Rasiere was a French [speaking] Protestant, a Walloon, and had become 'Upper Koopman' or chief commissary under Director Minuit at New Netherland, acting at the same time as Secretary of the Company. On the 9th of October 1656, he arrived at New Netherland on July 27, 1662 (N.S.)."—Ibid., II, 24. See Sept. 23, 1662; Van Rappard Doc. F. De Rasiere is believed to have returned to Holland in the late autumn of 1667 or 1668 (q.v.), when his letter to Blommaert was written."

Referring in his "Letter Book" to this same correspondence, Bradford says: "This year we had letters sent from us the Dutch plantation, of whom we had heard much by the natives, but never could hear from them nor meet with them before themselves thus writ to us, and after sought out, their letters were writ in a very fair hand, the one in French, and the other in Dutch, but were one verbatim, so far as the tongue would bear."—From Bradford's "Letter Book," quoted in Histo. of Plymouth Plantation (Ford ed.), II, 19; Mass. Hist. Soc. Collections, 1st ser., III, 31.

No trace has been found of any similar correspondence, during these early years, between New Netherland and Virginia. Indeed, De Vries, writing from the South River, tells us in his journal, under date of March 5, 1633, that "There had never been any one there from this quarter, I said, as I had escaped [aforest] the danger in the South river, I would be [also] the first one of our nation to venture to the English in Virginia, from these parts, as it was none other than thirty two miles from the Sound of angle—Bay or Cape Hounlopen."—T'sjaegs of De Vries (trans. by Murph), 46. On the 11th, recording his interview with the English governor at Jamestown, he quotes the latter as saying that the Virginia colonists had not visited the South River since Lord Delaware "had encountered foul weather there some years ago, and, finding the place full of shoals, thought it was not navigable. They had, therefore, never looked after it since, but it was their King's land, and not New Netherland. . . . He had, indeed, heard that we had a fort in the forty-fifth degree of latitude, at Hudson's river as they call it, and that a sloop was sent there last September, with seven or eight men, to see whether before was a river there, who had not returned. . . ."—Ibid., 50-51.

Gov. Bradford of New Plymouth replies to the letter written by Isaac de Rasiere at Fort Amsterdam on March 9 (q.v.): "To the Honourable, etc. (The Letter Book gives the superscription: "To the Honourable and Worshipful, and Council of New Netherland our very loving and worthy friends and christian neighbours.")

"The Government and Counsell of New-England wisheth your Honours and worshipships all happiness, and prosperity in this life, and eternal rest and glory with Christ Jesus our Lord in the world to come. We have received your letters, etc., wherein appeared your good wills and friendship towards us; but is expressed with over high titles, more then belongs to us, or is meet for us to receive. But for your good will, and congratulations of our prosperity in these small beginnings of our poot colony, we are much bound unto you, and with many thanks doe acknowledge the same; taking it both for a great honour done unto us, and for a certaine testimony of your love and good neighborhood.

"Now these are further to give your Worships knowledge, that it is to us no small joye to hear, that his majestie hath not only beene pleased with our late disposed of, amongst the New-Englanders, for Projets, friendship, and other contracts, formerly made and ratified by his predecessors of famous memorie, but hath him selfe (as you say) strengthened the same with a new-union the better to resist the pride of that commone enemy the Spainsiard, from whose cruell the Lord kepe us both, and our native countries. Now forasmuch as this is sufficient to unite us to gether in love and good neigbourhood, in all our dealings, yet are many of us further obliged, by the good and curteous entreaty which we have found in your country; having lived ther many years, with freedome, and good contente, as also many of our friends doe to this day; for which we, and our children after tyme nextes as his at home in France. Had Rasiere realized the interest of New Plymouth in the development of a trade for furs, made all the more necessary by the agreement with the London Adventurers, he would not have made a proposition that could be interpreted only as one injurious to the interests of New Plymouth. Bradford meets it by asking prices and if other produce would be taken, and suggested the measure for controlling the trade in furs."

"Likewise for your friendly tender, and offer to accommodate and help us with any commodities or merchandise you have, or shall come to you, either for beaver, otters, or other wares, it is to us very acceptable, and we doubt not but in short time we may have profitable commerce and trade together. But may you please to understand that we are but one particular colony or plantation in this land, there being divers others besides, unto whom it hath pleased those Honourable Lords of his Majesties Council for New England, to grant like commission and authority to them (as to us) for their better profit and subsistence: namely to expulse, or make price of any, either strangers or other English, which shall attempt, either to trade or plant within their limits (without their special licence and commission) which extends to forty degrees. Yet for our parts, we shall not go out to molest or trouble you in any thing, but continue all good neighborhood and correspondence as far as we may; only desire that you would forbear to trade with the natives in this bay, and river of Narragansett and Sowames, which is (as it were) at our doors: The which if you do, we think also no other English will go about any way to trouble or hinder you: which otherwise are resolved to solicit his Majestie for redresse, if otherwise they cannot help themselves. But for this year we are fully supplied with all necessaries, both for clothing and other things; but hereafter it is like we shall deal with you, if your rates be reasonable. And therefore when you please to send to us againe by any of yours, we desire to know how you will take beaver, by the pound, and otters, by the skine; and how you will deal per cent: for other commodities, and what you can furnish us with. As likewise what other commodities from us may be acceptable unto you, as tobacco, fish, corne, or other things, and what prices you will give, etc."

Gov. Bradford of New Plymouth writes to the council of New England and to Gorges concerning the Dutch plantation at Manhattan, and, with his letter to the council, forwards De Raisièr's letter of March 9 (p. v). In a note in his "Letter Book," he gives his reasons for this: "We well know likewise, that this dealing and friendship with the Dutch (though it was wholly sought of themselves) yet it would procure us envy from others in the land, and that at one time or other, our enemies would take occasion to raise slanders and frame accusations against us for it; therefore, to prevent their makes, as also to shew the sincerity of our dealing and our loyal and dutiful respect to his Majesty and the Honourable Council for New England, we sent their first letter (with their own answer thereto and their reply to the same) unto the Council as may appear more particularly by our letters following to the Council of New England, "Right Honourable." "We held it our bounden duty to inform and acquaint your Lordships and Honour, with all such occurrences and matters of note as do here befal, and may any way concern the estate of this country, in either the good or hurt therof, which, next to this Majesty, stands under your honourable governments and protection; or which may, in any sort, be worthy your wise and prudent considerations. May it please your Honour and Lordships to understand, that of late we received letters from the Dutch plantation, which using to trade near unto us, had order to stay for an answer from us, to which letters both being friendly and congratulatory, we answered them in like sort; since which time, we received another from them, but had had as yet no opportunity to give answer thereto. Their first letters were two [one in French, the other in Dutch], but both one in effect and verbatim, so far as the proprieties of the tongues will bear; the French, with the copies both of our answer and their reply, we have here enclosed sent unto your Honour's view, that according to your honourable directions therein, we may govern ourselves, in our dealings with them. We further understand that for strength of men and fortification, they far exceed us, and all in this land. We cannot likewise bear to compare your Lordship's [sic] part to our Enterprise, nor to the irregular living of many in this land, who, without either patent or license, order or government, live, trade, and travel, not with any intent to plant, but rather to forage the country, and get what they can, whether by right or wrong, and then be gone; So as such, as have been and are your Lordship's [sic] enemies, all little plantations will be able to maintain and keep them, if some remedy be not provided, both with these and the inordinate course of fishermen, who begin to leave fishing, and fall wholly to trading, to the great detriment of both the small beginning here, and the state of England, by the unprofitable consuming of the provisions of the land upon these savages. Whereas plantations might here better raise the same in the land, and so be enabled both to subsist and to return the profit thereof into England for other necessaries, which would be beneficial to the commonwealth. Our humble suits therefore to your good Lordships is, that you would take some such order for redress herein, as shall seem best to your honourable wisdom, for the relief of all the plantations in the land. the ship "Nassau," whence he sends the following letter to the English governor:

"Monsieur Monseigneur, William Bradford, Governour in Nieuw-Pleemden. [The letter is "put in English" by Bradford.]

"After the wishing of all good unto you, this serve to let you undertreat of your [acceptable] letters, dated the 14th of last, by John Jacobson of Wirig who besides, by word of mouth, hath reported unto you our kind and friendly entertainment of him; For which cause (by the good liking and approbation of the Directors and Council) I am resolved to come myself, in friendship to visit you, that we may by word of mouth friendly communicate of things together; as also to report unto you your good and favour that the Honourable Lords of the authorized West-Indian company bear towards you. And to show our willingness of your good accommodation, have brought with us some cloth of three sorts and colours, and a chest of white sugar, as also some season, &c. not doubting but, if any of them be serviceable unto you, we shall agree well enough about the prices thereof. Also John Jacobson aforesaid hath told me, that he came to you over land in six hours, but I have not gone so far this three or four years, wherefore I fear my feet will fail me; so I am constrained to entreat you to afford the easiest means, that I may, with least weariness, come to congratulate with you: So leaving other things to the report of the bearer, shall herewith end; remembering my hearty salutations to yourself and friends, &c, from a-board the bark Nassau, the 4th of October [Sept. 24, 1627]; before to you.

"So," Bradford notes, "according to his request, we sent our boat for him, who came honourably attended with a noise of trump-ers; he was their upper commis, or chief merchant, and second to the Governour; a man of a fair and genteel behaviour, but soon after fell into disgrace amongst them; by reason of their factions; and at such length we came to meet and deal together. We at this time bought sundry of their commodities, especially their seven or tamimpanceak, which was the beginning of a profitable trade with us and the Indians: We further understood, that their masters were willing to have friendship with us and to supply us with sundry commodities, and offered us assistance against the French if need were. The which, though we knew it was with an eye to their own profit, yet we had reason both kindly to accept it and make use of it: So after this sundry of them came often to us, and many letters passed between us, the which I will pass by, as being about particular dealings, and would not be here very pertinent; only upon this passage we wrote one to their Lords and masters for Oct. 1/11; as followeth:

THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

At some time prior to 1628, the West India Co. laid out six farms on Bouwiers Island, New Nederland. — Jameson, Neer. N. Neth., 104. See also N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 5, 6, 19, 20. For description of Bouwer No. 1, often referred to as "the Noble Company's Great Bouwery," see Manatus Maps, II: 178-88; and Landscape Map Ref. Key, III: 946. See also April 22, 1638.

Bouwer No. 2 was south of Bouwer No. 1; that is, on the modern map, bounded west by the Bouwery and Third Ave., north by Stuyvesant St., east by the river, and south by a line which ran irregularly a little north-eastward from 4th St. at The Bouwery to 5th St. at the East River. — See Libri GG: 120 (Albany); Manatus Maps, II: 188-89; C. Phls. 41, 42, and 423, Vol. II; and Landscape Map Ref. Key, III: 946.

The north line of Bouwer No. 4 extended from The Bouwery, just south of Delancy St., north-eastward to the line of Corliss' plantation, which bounded it on the east, from Suffolk St., just north of Stanton St., south-east to Clinton St., and south of Bromo St. The southerly line of this bouwery ran thence westwardly to The Bouwery at Canal St. — See Libri GG: 124 (Albany); Manatus Maps, II: 188-89; C. Phls. 41, 42, and 423, Vol. II; and Landscape Map Ref. Key, III: 946.

The south-east boundary of Bouwer No. 5 was on the south, bounding No. 4 from Canal St. and The Bouwery to a point in Stanton St., just north of Bromo St.; its east line running thence southerly to the intersection of Division and Attorney Sts., the southern boundary running through the centre of Division St. to Chatham Square. — See Libri GG: 129 (Albany); Manatus Maps, II: 188-89; C. Phls. 41, 42, and 423, Vol. II; and Landscape Map Ref. Key, III: 946.

The north line of Bouwer No. 6, the southermost of the West India Company's farms, ran from Chatham Square north-eastwardly up Division St. to Ridge St., thence north-eastwardly to Henry St. near Grand, to Cherry. The west boundary ran along Catharine St. to Cherry St., which formed the south line of the farm. — See Libri GG: 127 (Albany); Manatus Maps, II: 188-89; C. Phls. 41, 42, and 423, Vol. II; and Landscape Map Ref. Key, III: 946.

The earliest known picture of New Amsterdam—the Hartgers View, perhaps drawn by Cyn Fredriick, and, to a certain extent, another picture, whatever this period this is, a year or two earlier. For reproduction and description, see Vol. I, pt. 1-3.

The population of Manhattan Island in this year was 270 "souls, men, women and children." — Wassenier in Jameson's Neer. N. Neth., 89.

There were no shipments of goods and merchandise in this year by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co. from Holland to New Netherland. — De Lief, Kart Verhael, 26, in his Historie (1644). There were imported into Holland from New Netherland 6,921 beavers and 774 otters and other furs, valued at 64,075 guilders. — Ibid., 29.

In this year, William Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood.

Thunder and wind storms from October until the 23rd of January were so frequent that there are few who have witnessed the like before. Ships were seen at the Treet that had three times cut their cables and set them adrift. Finally, after the wind had blown mostly from the west and the north, it veered on the 23rd to the north-east, whereof the fleet, 210 strong, took due notice and so put to sea. Among them were 18 West India vessels, both ships and yachts, of which mention has been made before, as also the Portuguese vessels on Con. bound for Virginia [Virginia], and the ship 'Schiedam' for East India and many for the Strait of Gibraltar, equipped pursuant to the order of the Lochte States [General]. — Wassenier, Historisch Verhael, pt. XIV, vol. 75 vo.

In the margin appears the printed note: "Fleet put to sea on the 24th of this month." This is the ship the "Three Kings" (the Dutch name for Epiphany), which returned in October 1628 from New Netherland. See Jameson, Neer. N. Neth., 127. This ship was quite likely intended to be dispatched on the 6th of January 1628, but was delayed by storms. MichaeUus (Jameson, 122) says that he sailed on the 24th of January, so apparently he came out in this ship. See Adenda.

In this month, the Rev. Jonas MichaeUus arrived in New Apr. Amsterdam, and "from the beginning," established "the form of a church." — Letter of Jonas MichaeUus, Aug. 11, 1628, in Jameson's Neer. N. Neth., 122, 123. This church organization continues to-day, as the Collegiate Church of New York, the oldest communion of the Dutch Reformed Church in America.

The "Petition of Right" is reluctantly assented to by King Charles I. In this document, famous for its emphasis on the rights of Englishmen, the house of commons declares against (1) arbitrary punishment, (2) billeting of soldiers and sailors, (3) martial law, (4) forced loans. — Gardiner, Const. Docs. of the Parliam. Revolution (1840), 66-70.

The Rev. Jonas MichaeUus writes from New Amsterdam on this day a letter, the original holograph of which still exists and is the earliest known to be extant written from Manhattan Island. It is addressed to "Sir D. Joannes Forrest, Secretary to the Hon. Lords of the Executive Council of the State of New Holland and West Friesland." For facsimile reproduction, see Pl. 4, vol. IV. For the earliest known text of a letter written from Manhattan Island (extant only in a contemporary copy), see Sept. 23, 1626. MichaeUus says, in part: . . . After having waited long and impatiently for a favorable wind in the Treet, on January 24th of the present year we at last set sail with a large fleet of vessels. The voyage lasted rather long and was difficult and perilous, especially about the Bermudas and the rough coasts of this country. Our treatment on board was rather severe and mean through the fault of a very wicked and ungodly cook, and of our skipper Evert Croeyer, with whom, prior to this, I had made long voyages, but never before did I know him well. At that time he was under orders of Mr. Lam, and resembled more a child than a man; but now, being in supreme command of the ship, he appeared like a petty king in authority, but as unnecessarily as a big buffalo. . . . We reached here only the 7th of April, much tired out . . . I cannot say whether or not I shall remain here any longer after the three years shall have expired. I expect to be governed in this matter by the fruits of my ministration, and the convenience I shall find in living here with my family. Food here is scanty and poor. Fresh milk and meat to the large number of people and the small number of cattle and farmers . . . We need nothing so much as horses and cows, and industrious workers for the building of houses and fortresses, who later could be employed in farming, in order that we may produce sufficient dairy products and crops. . . . In short, we are principally in need of this, and need to be settled first, as is already done; but it is somewhat less fertile than other spots, and causes more trouble on account of the multitude of roots of shrubs and trees. Recently we have explored some favorably situated lands near by, which have good soil, and which, on account of their proximity, could be easily protected. If the Lords Masters, being now informed about this, would agree to send us cattle and people, we should be, humanly speaking, secure. At the upper end of the river near Fort Orange, lies open for us a large tract of remarkably fertile and pleasant land, as its inhabitants, the Mohicans have abandoned it, having fled from there for fear of the Mohawks, their enemies, who are too strong for them; and also for fear of us, because they had faithlessly schemed to murder our people, and treacherously plotted to surprise the aforesaid fort . . . We lack only sufficient people to occupy that country, as well as the one nearer to us. For a small sum of money we can buy of them a large quantity of land, and besides there are enough old and fresh causes to take possession of their land . . . by way of confiscation, on account of much treachery and many offenses committed against us. These have never been forgiven them, nor adjusted by any treaty, but have been reserved. Consequently, bound for Virginia [Virginia], and the ship 'Schiedam' for East India and many for the Strait of Gibraltar, equipped pursuant to the order of the Lochte States [General]. — Wassenier, Historisch Verhael, pt. XIV, vol. 75 vo.

Honor will be quite well able to deduce from the difference of the climate. The country produces many species of good things which greatly serve to ease life: fish, birds, game, and groves, oysters, tree-fruit, and all sorts of flowers. There is a roof of spars and a bed of greenery, and a cover of the spars with bark or green sods, so that they can live dry and warm in these houses."—N. T. Col. Deci., 1: 58.

The Rev. Jonas Michaeüis writes from New Amsterdam, on this day, the second letter written from Manhattan Island now known to be extant in the original (see Pl. 5, Vol. IV). It is addressed to "The Reverend, Learned and Pious Mr. Adrian Smoutsius, Faithful Minister of the Holy Gospel of Christ in Church, dwelling upon the Heerengracht, not far from the West India House at Amsterdam." In this letter he says, in part:

"Our coming here was agreeable to all, and I hope, by the grace of the Lord, that my service will not be unfruitful. The people, for the most part, are rather rough and untrained, but I find in almost all of them both love and respect towards me; two things with which hitherto the Lord has everywhere graciously blessed my labors, and which in our calling, as your Reverence well knows and finds, are especially desirable, in order that we may carry on our work with success."

"From the beginning we established the form of a church; and as Brother Bastiaen Croö very seldom comes down from Fort Orange, because the direction of that fort and the trade there committed to him has been his business, I have taken two elders for my assistance and for the proper consideration of all such ecclesiastical matters as might occur, intending the coming year, if the Lord permit, to let one of them retire, and to choose another in his place from a double number first lawfully proposed to the congregation. One of those whom we have now chosen is the Honorable Director [Minuit] himself, and the other is the storekeeper of the Company, Jan Huÿgen, his brother-in-law, persons of very good character, as far as I have been able to learn, having both been formerly in office in the Church, the one as deacon, and the other as elder in the Dutch and French churches, respectively, at Wesel."

"At the first administration of the Lord's Supper which was observed, not without great joy and comfort to many, we had fully fifty communicants—Walloons and Dutch; of whom, a portion made their first confession of faith before us, and others exhibited their church certificates. Others had forgotten to bring their certificates with them, not thinking that a church would be formed and established here; and some who brought them, had lost them unfortunately in a general confusion, but they were admitted upon the satisfactory testimony of others to whom they were known, and also upon their daily good deportment, since one cannot observe strictly all the usual formalities in making a beginning under such circumstances."

"We administer the Holy Supper of the Lord once in four months, provisionally, until a larger number of people shall otherwise require it. The Walloons and French have no service on Sundays, otherwise than in the Dutch language, and say that no Dutch are very few. A portion of the Walloons are going back to the Fatherland, either because their years are expired [as the contract period was almost always four years, this would seem to indicate that they arrived in 1644], or else because some are not very serviceable to the Company. Some of them live far away and could not well come in time of heavy rain and storm, so that they themselves cannot think it advisable to appoint any special service in French for so small a number, and that upon an uncertainty. Nevertheless, the Lord's Supper is administered to them in the French language, and according to the French mode, with a sermon preceding."

"In my opinion it would be well that the Honorable Directors should furnish this place with plainer and more precise instructions to the rulers, that they may distinctly know how to conduct themselves to all possible public difficulties and events; and also that I should some time have here all such Acts and directions, as have been adopted in the synods of Holland, in which title they comprehended everything that is subtle and crafty and beyond human skill and power. They have so much witchcraft, devotion, sorcery and

They are as thievish and treacherous as they are tall; and in cruelty they are altogether inhuman, more than barbarous, far exceeding the Africans.

I have written concerning this matter to several persons elsewhere, not doubting that Brother Crol will have written sufficient to your Reverence, or to the Honorable Directors; as also of the true treachery and the murders which the Mohicans, at the upper-part of this river, had planned against Esopus, but which failed through the gracious interposition of the Lord, for our good.

How these people can best be led to the true knowledge of God and of the Mediator Christ, is hard to say. I cannot myself wonder enough who it is that has imposed so much upon your Reverence and many others in the Fatherland concerning the doings of these people and their good nature, the proper principia religionis and vestigia legis naturae which are said to be among them; in whom I have as yet been able to discover hardly a single good point, except that they do not speak so jeeringly and so scoldingly of the godlike and glorious majesty of their Creator as the Africans dare to do.
But it may be because they have no certain knowledge of Him, or scarcely any. If we speak to them [the Indians] of God, it appears to them like a dream; and we are compelled to speak of him, not under the name of Menetto, whom they know and serve—for that would be blasphemy—but of one great, yes, might, high, and holy, by which name same I would call him—call him who has the command over several hundred among them, and who by our people are called Sackemakers...

"Their language... is entirely peculiar. For these people have difficult aspirates and many gutteral letters, which are formed more to the throat than by the mouth, teeth and lips...

"The promise which the Honorable Directors of the Company had made me of some morgons or acres of land for me to sustain myself, instead of a free table which otherwise belonged to me, is void and useless. For their Honors well knew that there are no horses, cows, or laborers to be obtained here for money... butter, meal, etc., cannot be here obtained... The rations, which are given out here, and charged for high enough are all hard stale food, such as men are used to on board ship, and frequently not very good, and even so one cannot obtain as much as he desires. I began to get considerable strength, by the grace of the Lord, but in consequence of this hard fare of beans and gray peas, which are hard eough, barley, stockfish, etc., without much change, I can not fully perform... The savages did bring some things, but one has no waters, such as knives, beads, and the like, or sectum, cannot come to any terms with them...

"The country yields many good things for the support of life, but they are all too uniff and wild to be gathered. Better regulations should be continued, and people here who have the knowledge and implements for seeking out all kinds of things in their season and for securing and gathering them. No doubt this will gradually be done. We want ten or twelve more farmers with horses, cows and laborers in proportion, to furnish us with bread, milk products, and suitable fruits.

"The business of furs is dull on account of the new war of the Maebhays [Mohawks] against the Mohicans at the upper end of this river. Much timber is cut here to carry to the Fatherland, but the vessels are too few to make much of it. They are making a windmill to saw lumber into brand wood and we also have a gristmill. They bake brick here, but it is very poor. There is good material for burning lime, namely, oyster shells, in large quantities. The burning of potash has not succeeded...

"We are busy now in building a fort of good quarry stone, which is to be found not far from here in abundance. May the Lord bless us to have it ready in time, and watch over our walls. There is good opportunity for making salt, for there are convenient places, the water is salt enough, and there is no want of heat in summer. Besides, what the waters yield, both of the sea and rivers, in all kinds of fish; and what the land possesses in all kinds of birds, game, and woods, with the hundred kinds of herbs, roots, herbs and plants, both for eating and medicinal purposes, and with which wonderful cures can be effected, it would take too long to tell, nor could I yet tell accurately. Your Reverence [Adrianus Smoutius] has already obtained some knowledge thereof and will be able to obtain from others further information. The country is good and pleasant, the climate is healthy, notwithstanding the sudden changes of cold and heat. The sun is very warm, the winter is fitted only to one and continues fully as long as in Africa. The best remedy is not to spare the wood, of which there is enough, and to cover one's self with rough skins...

"The harvest, God be praised, is in the barns, and is larger than ever before. There has been more work put on it than before. The ground is fertile enough to reward labor, but it may doubt it is not as much as our laws require. Until now there has been distress because many people were not very industrious, and also did not obtain proper sustenance for want of bread and other necessities. But affairs are beginning to go better and to put on a different appearance, it only the Directors will send out good laborers and exercise all care that they be maintained as well as possible with what this country produces.

"From the island of Manhatas in New Netherland, this 11th of August, Anno 1628, by me, your Reverence's very obedient servant in Christ,

The "windmill to saw lumber," above referred to, stood, on the modern map, in State St., south of Bridge St. It may have been built in 1625. See description of it, with block plan of it, land itself, or that — adjoining. — See Liber GG: 170 and 221 (Albany); also

Niagara van Wassenburgh's Travels in 1628, October, 1628 (preface dated June 1, 1629), contains the following entry:
"The government over the people of New Netherland continued on the 19th of August of this year in the aforesaid Minuet, succesor to Verhult. He went thither from Holland on January 9, Anno 1626, and took up his residence in the midst of a nation called Manatairs, building a fort there, to be called Amsterdam, having four bastions and faced outside entirely with stone, as the ramparts rambled away like sand, and are now to be more substantial.
The population consists of two hundred and seventy souls, including men, women and children. They remained as yet without the fort, in no fear, as the natives live peaceably with them. They are situate three leagues from the sea, on the river by us called Mauri tus, by others, Rio de Montagne.

"These strangers for the most part occupy their farms. Whatever they require is supplied by the Directors. The winter grain has turned out well there, but the summer grain which ripened before it was half grown in consequence of the excessive heat, was very small. The cattle sent thither have thriven well, and everything promises increase, as soon as the land is improved, which is full of woods and poor."

Aicurum Heyn captures in Matanzas Bay the Spanish "Plate Sept. 5," consisting of a large city, loaded with gold, silver, and other valuable, estimated to be worth $5,000,000. From this and other conquests made at about the same time, the company's dividends advanced to about fifty per cent. — O'Callaghan, Hist. of New Neth.,

"There are now no families left at Fort Orange... They have all been brought down. Five or six and twenty persons, traders, remain there. Bastian van Cur, is vice-director there; who has remained there since the year 1626, when the others came down.

Possibly in the autumn of 1627 (q. v.), but more likely in that of 1628, Issaak de Riaudere, who arrived in New Netherlands on July 17, 1626 (q. e.), as commercial agent of the West India Com-pa ny, and was secretary of the province, wrote to his superior, Samuel Blommaert, one of the directors of the W. I. Co. (Amsterdam chamber), from Holland, probably shortly after his return there from New Netherland, giving a detailed account of the Dutch settlement at Manhatas, and also a few very interesting facts concerning the Plymouth plantation. His letter (in part, translated) as follows:

"Mr. Blommaert:

"As I feel myself much bound to your service, and in return chronology: the dutch period: 1626-1664

1626 knew not how otherwise to recompense you than by this slight memoir, (wherein I have in part comprised as much as was in my power concerning the situation of new netherland and its neighbors, and should in many things have been able to treat of and write the same more in detail, and better than I have now done, but that my things and notes, which would have been service to me herein, have been taken away from me [possibly as a result of his falling into disgrace at manhattan—see below—but more likely by his own hand, but the words "abhaind gemachte" seem to indicate], I will beg you to be pleased to receive this, on account of my bounteous service, etc.

On the 27th of July, Ann 1626, by the help of God, I arrived with the ship The Arms of Amsterdam, before the bay of the great Mauritse, 4, and sailed into it a market-shot from Godyn's point, into Coenraet's Bay; (because there the greatest depth is, since from the last point there stretches out a sand-bank on which there is only from 9 to 14 feet water), then sailed on, northeast, and north-northeast, to about half way from the low sand-bank called Godyn's point, to the Hamel's-Hoofden [the narrow], the mouth of the river, where we found at half ebb 16, 17, 18 feet water, and which is a sandy reef a musket shot broad, stretching for the most part northeast and southwest, quite across, and, according to my opinion, having been formed there by the stream, insomuch as the flood runs into the bay from the sea, east-southeast; the depth at 27th July is caused by the tide flowing out there with such rapidity.

"The Hamel's-Hoofden being passed, there is about a league width in the river, and also on the west side there is an inlet, where another river runs up about 20 leagues, to the north-northeast, emptying into the Mauritse River in the highlands, thus forming the northwest land opposite to the Manhatans, an island eighteen leagues long. It is inhabited by the old Manhatans [Mannahattens]; they are about 200 to 500 strong, women and men, under different chiefs, whom they call Suckimas. This island is more mountainous than the other land on the southeast side of the river, which opposite to the Manhatans is about a league and a half. At the side of the before-mentioned little river, which we call 'Achter Col,' there is a great deal of waste reedy land; . . .

"The Island of the Manhatans extends two leagues [sic] in length along the Mauritse River, from the point where the Fort 'New Amsterdam' is building. It is about seven leagues [sic] in circumference, full of trees, and in the middle rocky to the extent of about two miles in circuit. The north side has good land in two places, where two farmers, each with four horses, would have enough to do without much clearing at first. The grass is good in the forest and valleys, but when made into hay is not so nutritious for the cattle as here in Friesland, in consequence of its wild state, but it yearly improves by cultivation. On the east side there rises a large field, of from 70 to 80 morgens of land, through which runs a very few fresh streams; so that that land can be ploughed without much clearing. It appears to be good. The six farms, four of which lie on this side, stretching for the full length of the island, have at least 60 morgens of land ready to be sown with winter seed, which at the most will have been ploughed eight times. But as the greater part must have some manure, insomuch as it is so exhausted by the wild herbage, I am afraid that all who will not be sown; and the more so, as the managers of the farms are hired men. The two hindmost farms, Nos. 1 and 2, are the best; the other farms have also good land, but not so much, and more sandy; so that they are best suited for rye and buckwheat.

"The small fort, New Amsterdam, commenced to be built, is situated on a point opposite to Nuten Island; [the channel between is a gun-shot wide, and it is full six or seven fathoms deep in the middle. The point might, with little trouble, be made a small island, by cutting a canal through Blommaert's valley, so as to afford a haven winter and summer, for sloops and ships; and the whole of this little island ought, from its nature, to be made a super fort, to be approached by land only on one side (since it is a triangle), thus protecting them both. The river marks out, naturally, three angles; the most northern faces and commands, within the range of a cannon shot, the great Mauritse River and the land; the southernmost commands, on the water level, the channel between Nuten Island and the fort, together with the Hellegat; this particular fort is by the same reason to command the low-land; the middle part, which ought to be left as a market-place, is a hillock, higher than the surrounding land, and should always serve as a battery, which might command the three points, if the streets should be arranged accordingly.

"Up the river the east side is high, full of trees, and in some places there is a little land where people have dwelt, but who for the most part have died or have been driven away by the Wappenens.

[here follows an elaborate account of the life and customs of the indians, after which occurs a break where at least four pages are missing. the letter continues]

"Coming out of the river Nassau [Sakonnet River], you sail east-and-by-northeast about fourteen leagues, along the coast, a half mile from the shore, and you then come to Frenchman's Point," at a small river where those of Patuxet have a house made of bough oak hacks, called Aptuets [Monomet on Buzzard's Bay], where they keep two men, winter and summer, in order to maintain the trade and possession. Here also they have built a small ship, in order to go and look after the trade in sewan, in Sloup's Bay and thereabouts, because they are afraid to pass Cape Mallaabe, and in order to avoid the length of the way; which I have prevented for this year by selling them fifty fathoms of sewan, because the seeking after sewan by them is prejudicial to us, insomuch as they would, by so doing, discover the trade in furs; which if they were to find out, it would be a great trouble for us to maintain, for they already dare to threaten that if we will not leave off dealing with that people, they will be obliged to use other means; if it be true that they are yet ignorant how the case stands, what will they do when they do get a notion of it? [new Plymouth is here described]

"The tribes in their neighborhood [new Plymouth] have all the same customs as already above described, only they are better conducted than ours, because the English give them the example of better ordinances and a better life; and who also, to a certain degree, give them laws, in consequence of the respect they from the very first have established amongst them."—from original letter in the National Archives, the Hague, discovered in 1847 in a bundle of manuscripts then recently acquired by the Royal Library, translated in jamaica, n. y., 1847.

"The date of this letter is somewhat in doubt. De räis's letter to new plymouth took place early in october, 1627, as we know from his letter dated oct. 4, 1627 (see sept. 24/oct. 4), and written on board the "nassau" at monomet (buzzard's bay). It was during this visit that de räis wrote the 50 fathoms of sewan to the english settlers, an event which Bradford also records, in his history. —hist. of plymouth plantation (ford ed., 1912), ii: 43.

Bradford describes this visit under the year 1628, which is evidently an error, and probably resulted from the fact that his notes were not made until about three years after the event. We have no certain knowledge that de räis returned to manhattan after his mission to new plymouth, and no record has been found of him in new netherland after his departure on his mission to bradford. it is probable that he did return, and that he bore with him bradford's letter of oct. 1 (see oct. 1/11). The only definite reasons for the assumption that this letter is his reference to "the visit of new amsterdam, commenced to be built," and Bradford's note, following deräis's letter of oct. 4, 1627 (p. 9), that he "soon after fell into disgrace amongst them [the dutch], by reason of their factions."—ibid., ii: 24. de räis's reference to the six farms "ready to be sown with winter seed" seems to indicate that this part of the letter at least was written at the time of his departure, and in the month of september when the winter crops were usually sown. if he did not return from new plymouth to manhattan, but dispatched bradford's letter by another messenger and himself sailed direct for holland, his letter was probably completed on the voyage homeward, and therefore dates from 1627, which date would agree with the statement contained in the letter that the sale of sewan to the new plymouth colonists took place in "this year"—1627—"the year in which the letter, under this assumption, would have been written, and in which, as we know from bradford (ibid., ii: 43), the sale actually took place. it is not, or rather, de räis returned to manhattan with bradford's letter, unless he sailed again immediately for holland, his letter to blommaert probably was written in the following autumn, a statement which is strengthened by his reference to "the small fort, new amsterdam, commenced to be built," it is even possible that it was written in the autumn of 1628 or 1629, since de räis returned to manhattan and his successor officiating as secretary of the province. this, however, is unlikely, as blommaert ceased to be a director of the w. l. co.

in the summer of the former year, 1629. See April 23, 1634. The assumption that it was written in the autumn is based, as we have seen, on the evidence of the land being "ready to be sown with winter seed." The letter was written to the six Englishmen "ready to be sown with winter seed, which at the most will have been ploughed eight times," is ambiguous, and may possibly refer to four double planting seasons. We know from many contemporary sources that it was the custom in New Netherland to plant twice yearly, in May and September. If this letter was written in the autumn of 1628, the eight ploughings may perhaps indicate eight successive cultivations of the ground before sowing the crops: two in 1628, two in 1627, two in 1626, and two in 1625; and, as a considerable number of months must have elapsed between the arrival of the colonists and the preparation of these farms for plowing, this theory, if true, would greatly strengthen the argument for accepting 1624 (if the letter was written in 1627) as the year of first settlement. It is, however, of course, possible—even probable—that the words refer to eight successive cultivations of the soil, extending over a shorter period, and not corresponding with the periods of planting. Attention is drawn to this possible interpretation simply because every plausible suggestion or new sidelight in connection with the interesting and elusive problem of determining the year of first settlement is worthy of attention.

Bouwer's Vly or Valley was the name applied to a depression on the present line of Broad Street from the shore of the East River inland, through which the Dutch subsequently excavated a ditch or gracht. The earliest mention of the name is in the foregoing letter from Isaac de Drasere to Samuel Blommaert, who was one of the directors of the New Netherland Co., at Amsterdam, and it is not unlikely that the name was derived from him. See Jameson, Nat. N. Neth., 105; also Castello Plan, II, 318.

In the same letter, De Drasere referred to Indian wampum, thus:

"As an employment in winter they [Indians] make sequan, which is an oblong bead that they make from cockle-shells, which they find on the sea-shore, and they consider it as valuable as we do money here [Holland], since one can buy with it everything they have."—Jameson, op. cit., 106. This is the earliest reference to wampum as money in New Netherland. See also June, 1634.

In this year, goods and merchandise valued at 55,778 guilders were brought in Holland by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., and sent in three ships to New Netherland.—De Looz, Kort Verhael, 26, in his Historie (1644). There were imported into Holland from New Netherland 5,913 beavers and 681 otters valued at 62,185 guilders.—Ibid., 30.

"While in England, [Isaac] Allerton produced an effect upon the friends of the Winthrop migration [of 1630] which may not have been intended. His words gave the impression that the English were authorized for settlement in other parts of the country, and, for example, as Hudson's River. His letters wrote to Winthrop, December 12, 1630, suggesting a removal to a more southern part, and cited Allerton on the Hudson, 'which as Mr. Allerton affirms meets with Canada; and Downing, writing four days earlier, advanced some of the same arguments for removal, and added: 'If ye betrew that Mr. Allerton reports of Hudson's river, there is noe place comparable to yt for a plantation, and t'will quit cost for you to remove thither, although all be lost in the place where ye are, for he sayth that Hudsons river goes into Canada and those a make New England an Iland, if this be true yt like they meet in the great lake [Lacqwa], and see may Merrymack.'—Bradford, Hist. of Plymouth Plantation (Ford ed.), II, 61-64, editorial footnote. Isaac Allerton removed to New Amsterdam about 1638, and became one of the city's most influential citizens.

In this year, England captured Quebec; this was followed by the establishment of Canada by the Dutch at New Amsterdam.

The king begins to rule without parliament.

At some time prior to this date, Wouter van Twiller received a grant from the West India Co. (De Lanecy Papers, in N. Y. Hist. Soc.,) confirmed by a ground-brief in 1638 (Liber GG: 25, Allomny), for land which is later spoken of as a tobacco plantation near Santee, which was written in the autumn of 1628, the eight ploughings of N. T. Col. Orts., XIV: 3, 13, 19. This bowery lay at some distance to the westward of the Bowery Road (The Bowery) and south-west of Greenwich Ave. Here is the first mention of record of the Indian village of Saposcanack, later Greenwich Village.

The West India Co. endeavours to encourage colonization by granting a "Charter of Freemen and Exemptions" on this date to "those whom shall establish colonies in New Netherland." This resulted in the foundation of patrimonies. In Van Rensselaer Bouw Manuscripts, 136-53, the editor, A. J. F. van Laer, gives the original text from the original printed edition (Fryhedan, etc. Amsterdam, 1651) with a rather obscure translation.

In this "Charter of Freemen and Exemptions," the West India Co. announces its intention of peopling the island of Manhattan first, and makes it, provisionally, the staple port for all products and wares "found on the North River and lands thereabout," except "such as can not without great loss to their owners be brought there," in which case measures will be taken as required by circumstances.—Van Rensselaer Bouw Manuscripts, 141.

Some historians, beginning with O'Callaghan (Hist. N. Neth., I: 155), have mistakenly placed the beginning of the staple right at New Amsterdam in 1634. See also Adams.

New Hampshire is granted to John Mason. in the present town of Bethlehem, Albany Co., and here very likely — the lumber for the ship was being cut. As the men were "encamped," they may have built the ship at this place, or the lumber may have been conveyed to Manhattan Island, Fort Orange, or some other place on the river. At any rate, it is known from a letter which Symon Dircks, Post, a councillor of New Netherland, written to Van Rensselaer from Manhattan, on Sept. 16 of this year, that "a certain new ship" was being built, was then almost ready, and had proved a success; although it was feared "injury [to it] may arise, since a long ice-flow runs here [where it was building]; yet [it] is hoped to be able to withstand it well."—Oud Holland, VIII (1890) 70-71.

— The Charter of Privileges and Exemptions (Vryheerden, etc.)
of June 7, 1629 (p. 6), was first printed in this year, at Amsterdam, and was the earliest separate publication relating to New Netherland.

About this year, the house of the director-general of New Netherland was built within the enclosure of Fort Amsterdam. It is known that he lived outside of the fort in or in the village from 1629 to 1632.—Jameson, p. 86, 87, 88. During Van Twiller's administration—namely, after 1631—"the commander's house, standing in the Fort," was repaired.—N. T. Col. Doc., XIV: 16.
Father Isaac Jogues mentions "the house of the Goveror" in the fort as existing in 1643 when he saw the town and fort.—Jameson, p. 259.

— The Buchelius Chart, a crude draft of Manhattan Island and its immediate surroundings, copied by the Dutch antiquarian Buchelius from a drawing of this period, was made, perhaps by Peter Minuit himself, or under his direction, some time between 1629 and 1634, probably to indicate the position of grants to Goedyn,

On April 27, 1634, Kiliaen Van Rensselaer notified the directors of the West India Co. that a certain contract for cattle and farming implements between the company and six farmers had been signed in accordance with conditions agreed to in writing by two sides on Jan. 3, 1632; and that to these contracts have been leased a farm of about 50 morgen (on Manhattan Island), including farms No. 2 and 3, "for the term of six years, beginning the first of May, 1630."—Van Rensselaer Bowier MSS., Wassenaer (op. cit.) records under this date: "After the Right Honorable Directors of the Chartered West India Company in the United Netherlands had provided everything for the defence of New Netherland and put everything there in good order, they taking into consideration the advantages of said place, the favorable nature of the air and soil, and that considerable trade and goods and many commodities may be obtained from the sea, they sent out free emigrants thither with all sorts of cattle and implements necessary for agriculture, so that in the year 1638 there already resided on the island of the Manhattas two hundred and seventy souls, men, women and children, under Governor Minuit [sic], Verhildir's successor, and lived there in peace with the nature.

But as the land, being extensive and in many places full of weeds and wild growth, could not be properly cultivated in consequence of the scantiness of the population, the said Directors of the West India Company, the better to people their lands, and to bring the country to produce more abundantly, resolved to grant divers Privileges, Freedoms and Exemptions to all patroons, masters or individuals who should plant any colonies and settle in New Netherland, and they accordingly have constituted and published in print [at Amsterdam, 1629] these following exemptions [of June 7, 1629], to afford better encouragement and influse greater zeal toward whomsoever should be inclined to reside and plant his colony

This day, Minuit and his council sign in Fort Amsterdam, the letters patent for Rensselaerswyck. The original patent, having one of the signatures of Minuit and his council known to exist in this country, is now in the author's collection. It is repro-(now in the New-York Historical Society, at Albany) was signed in the fort on Aug. 6. These are the earliest contract and deed for land in the state of New York.—Van Rensselaer Bowier Manuscripts, 166.

Symon Dircks, Post writes a letter to Kiliaen van Rensselaer from Fort Amsterdam "to New Netherland at the Manhattan," in which he says: "[Now] concerning the occurrences [at] the farms on the Manhattas, there is much land ploughed everywhere daily by the peasants. I have now great hope that the Hon. Lords Directors, after their long waiting, shall be released for once from the great charges, as well as to be able to deliver a number of lasts of rye and wheat, raised on land here, in order to meet their heavy expenses. [Now] concerning the current year, we shall need much seed, as we are clearing, harrowing and ploughing much land. Moreover, I cannot neglect advising your Hon. of the questions that arise here in this place, where there are not more than two hundred or three hundred souls."—Newly translated from Oud Holland,

The first general in America is held, at Boston.

A catalogue of a sale held by Frederik Muller & Co., of Amerdam, in May 1869, contains the following items—

No. 1367. [Dated] 1630. Project of a coat-of-arms for the city of New Amsterdam (N. Y.). (The same coat-of-arms as that of Amsterdam in Holland but surmounted by a beaver.) Contemporary drawing in colours, in the form of a medallion, diameter 100 mm. . . .

No. 1368. [Dated] 1610. Another Project for the coat-of-arms of the same city, representing the arms of Amsterdam surmonted by the imperial crown, and between two beavers instead of the two lions. One of the directors, H. Bonetmanl [the famous antiquary], has written at the bottom of the drawing that it was a Project which was not executed. Contemporary drawing in colours 150 mm. wider; 220 mm. high. The catalogue adds: "These two Projects have been left up to the present time and there exist no copies in the archives."

The present whereabouts of these two important items was long sought by the author, who was only able to learn, through Dr.
Wieter, of the old firm of Frederik Muller & Co., that one of the drawings had been bought at the sale by the present head of the Pauw family, Ridder Pauw van Weldebruch, but had been destroyed in a fire which consumed his castle and family papers at Leersum in 1906, while the other was bought at the sale by Westernman & Co. of New York, for 35 florins.

In 1916, one of these documents, No. 1367 in the catalogue, was discovered and recognized by Mr. Victor Hugo Paltius, in the Manuscript Division of the New York Public Library. It is reproduced, for the first time, as Frontispiece I, in the present volume.

This document, which measures 410 x 345 mm., is enclosed, in contemporary ornamental script, "Arms of New Nederland in Amsterdam" (!) On the face of the sheet are grouped three drawings:

1.—The seal (Sigillum) of New Amsterdam, in a circle 90 mm.
in diameter (not 100 mm. as given in the catalogue description).

2.—A very similar design, but having beavers instead of lion heads, and evidently intended for the city arms, but as a seal only, as there is no circle. A note explains that "This coat-of-arms was [submitted as a] Project, but was not found good [approved]."

3.—A design for a coat-of-arms for New Netherland, having two lions as heads.

Adopting this last design is an inscription reading as follows:

"Extract from the resolutions of a meeting of the XIX of the general Chartered West India Co., held at Middelburg in Zeeland.
Saturday the 23"th december. 1629 Post Meridian.

"Exhibited by Mr. Michael Pauw, a design of a coat-of-arms for New-Nederland, of which a black beaver [on the helmet] [with a border [on a hand]] of white Zeewant [Wampum], on a blue ground, embellished with the Crown of a Count, and is also found good by the approval of the Lords High Mightinesses."

Just as this page was going to press, Miss Jennie E. Mccarthy found, among some papers presented to the New York Historical Society by Mr. J. Carson Brevoort, the second project, No. 1368 in the Muller catalogue, which was supposed to have been

In this month, Kiliaen van Rensselaer, patron, having determined to erect a brewery in his colony of Rensselaerswyck, to provide all New Netherland with beer, for which he had already a brew kettle there," instructs his representatives in his colony to ask the director for "the large brewing kettle and brandy kettle which is at the Manhattan and sell the brandy and beer either at Fort Orange or at the Manhattan or elsewhere." —Van Rensselaer Brewing Manuscript, 200, 211.

Woutier van Twiller was appointed director-general of New Netherland. He sailed from Holland in the "Soutergh" (Salt Mountain) after July 20, 1632, and arrived in New Amsterdam in March, 1633, when he assumed his office. —Van Rensselaer Brewing Manuscript, 201, 204, 215, 217, 266, 304, 808, De Vries, Notes, in Jason’s Nat. N. Neth., 1888.

New Albion (including New Jersey) is granted to Sir Edward Flodwen, the viceroy of Ireland. —Cal. State Papers, Colonial, 1734-1760, 154; Winson, III: 458.

Some time prior to this year, the bakery of the West India Co. was erected. —Colonial MSS., I: 81 (Albany). It stood at what is now the southwest corner of Pearl and State Sts., where the Chelseabrough building stands.

At some time prior to this year, the brewers' bridge, crossing the Hoere Gracht (the canal in Broad St.), was erected. Its situation was at the present Stone St., crossing Broad St.; it, as well as the other bridges spanning the Graft, is shown on C. Pl. 82, Vol. II.

There were no shipments of goods and merchandise in this year by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co. from Holland to New Netherland. —De Laet, Kort Verhael, 25, in his Historie (1644). There were shipped into Holland from New Netherland 8,800 beavers, and 1,733 otters and pelties, valued in 91,375 guilders. —Ibid., 30.

Before Wouter van Twiller came over as director-general, in 1633, five large stone houses used as shops by the West India Co. were built on Wincekl St. (now no longer in existence, the bed of the defunct street being now covered by the Kembie building.) They occupied the east side of the street, between Brouwer (Stone) and Brugh (Bridge) Streets. Among the buildings listed in a deposition as built during Van Twiller's administration was a "goathouse standing behind the Five Houses," which shows that these five buildings were in existence before his time.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 16. They were all under one roof, as shown on The Castello Plan (C. Pl. 82, Vol. II). During the Dutch period they remained the property of the company, and as such were confiscated upon the occupation by the English in 1664, as property of the Duke of York.

They were demolished prior to Oct. 15, 1680, as is shown by four grants of this land by Gov. Andros, as "being part of the ground of the five houses belonging to his Royal Highness" (the Duke of York). The earliest of these grants was to Philip Willes, Oct. 15, 1680; and the three others were to Capt. Anthony Brockholes (Dec. 6), John Darvall (Dec. 15), and Stephanus van Cortlandt (Dec. 15).—Patents, V: 5, 9, in sec. of state's office, Albany. The sites of the five houses are now occupied by the buildings Nos. 2 and 4 Stone St., and 19 and 21 Bridge St.—See The Castello Plan, H: 269-280, Key to the Dutch Grants, II: 381; C. Pl. 82, Sec. 83, Vol. II. Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 987; Pl. 174, Vol. III.

Numerous buildings were erected during the administration of Wouter van Twiller (1631-1638), as is revealed in a deposition of March 22, 1639, which Giles Pietersen van der Gouw, the then master house-painter on the Island Manhattan, made before the provincial secretary. Those erected on Manhattan Island were: "In Fort Amsterdam, the guardhouse with lattice work and a roof; a "small house for the soldiers to live in;" and a large cellar [which] was dug and built up with stones to the level of the ground and [had] beams across to lay planks on for the floor of the house."
On the Island outside of the Forty," there were erected in this year: a "new bakery;" a "small house for the midwife;" a "goat- house;", a "small house for the 'new Five Houses;';" and, "a church and stable behind it" (on the north side of Pearl St., between Whitehall and Broad Sts.). The "smiths, corporals' and cooper's house, which had been raised, was completed and covered with pan tiles;" and the "large shed, where the sloops and yachts are built, and the sailmakers' loft above" were erected.

At the Bowery No. 1, a very good barn, dwelling house, boat-house, and brewery covered with tiles (sold in 1651 to Director Stuyvesant); and the "house upon Mr. Twiller's plantation" were built, and repaired were made in "the commander's house, standing in the Fort," where much had been broken. The "saw and grind mills were at this time supplied with arms and other requisites." Much work had been done at Corlars's Bowery, as well as "at la Montagnes;" and Fort Amsterdam was built up with platforms for the guns in the Fort.

Other work done, in outlying parts, is enumerated, including Fort Orange to the north, Fort Hope to the north-east, and Fort Nassau to the southward.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV. 16-17.

The church, built this year by Director-Gen. Wouter van Twiller, with the house and stable behind it (cide supra), was on the site of the present 39 Pearl St. The location has been ascertained from searches made for this work, and agrees with Innes, op. cit., 58. In 1645 it was still used as a church and was spoken of as a "mean barn" (De Vries, Nota, in Jansen's N. N. Neth., 212); but after the erection of the church in the fort, begun in that year, it was used for some time as a warehouse of the West India Co. (Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 373; Innes, 59). A summary of its later history follows.

On April 4, 1665, the director-general and council of New Netherland resolved "that on Saturday, the 5th of April, the house, lot and buildings thereon called the Old Church and formerly tenanted by Capt. [Bryan] Newton," should be "sold at auction to the highest bidder" (N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV. 346), and at this sale it was purchased by Jacob Wolphertzoon van Couwenhoven (Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 153), who received a deed from the director-general, on June 30 (Liber III, part ii, 58, in sec. of state's office, Albany). He became involved in debt to Pieter Jacobsen Mazar, who obtained a judgment against him, and, in compliance with the order of the court, the property was sold and conveyed to Isaac de Forest (Rec. N. Am., II. 153-54; Liber A: 71, N. Y. County register's office), who, having covered this lot with a house, applied for and obtained, on April 16, 1661, a grant of the adjoining lane, to build thereon a wooden, etc. (Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 153). Very richly furnished, Isaac Richard Nicolls gave De Forest a confirmation of title, on Feb. 14, 1668. His widow and executrix, Sarah, conveyed the property, then called "the old church on Strand," on June 30, 1662, to Allard Anthony, for 100,000 guilders. By his will, executed on Dec. 12, 1685, the property was left to his wife, Katherina, on the death of his son, Richard, in 1690, and proved in May, 1707. It passed to her three grandsons, Nicholas, Allard, and Henry Anthony, and, on Sept. 25, 1718, was conveyed by the latter to the former. On July 23, 1719, Henry Anthony gave a mortgage for $400 to Bridget Matthewson, etc. (ibid., Liber XXIII: 527, 528; N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1892), 431: ibid. (1893), 409. On Oct. 25, 1754, Henry Cregier mortgaged to Peter de Lancey the premises "formerly called Old Kirk or Old Church" in the sum of £1,818.18.18.—Libor Mortgages, I. 11. During the American Revolution, the prize-ship Ascension, of William Beards, attainted, was numbered among the forfeited estates, as shown by a deed from the commissioners of forfeiture to Richard Varick 151. 1715, in consideration of the purchase price of £345.—Liber Deeds, CXII: 55; Flick, Loyalty in New York (1901), 227.

Between this year and the end of Wouter van Twiller's administration as director-general of New Netherland, as is shown in a declaration made by Tyman Jansen, ship-carpenter, dated "at Fort Amsterdam this 22d of March Aâ° 1659." He testified "that it is perfectly true, that he . . . during the administration has worked, and there had been sold only a new work, which Mr. Twiller, ordered to be made," the summary whereof is as follows: In 1653 the ship "sotherchrist" was provided with new knees; "other carpenters" worked long on the ship "Hope of Gouieningen and Oolumden;" a yacht called "Hope," which had been captured in 1652 by Van Twiller, was "entirely rebuilt and planked up higher;" the "Pries Willem" was built; the yacht "Amsterdam" was "almost finished;" the "Five Hore Finished;" a "large open boat" was built; "an oorop and caboose were made" for the yacht "Wesel," and likewise for the yacht "Vreede." Other boats built or repaired included the "Omwall," at Fort Orange (Albany), a "yacht with a mizen sold to Barent Dirckson" of New Amsterdam, "the wood cutters' boat;" the "Divers farmboats and shifts," which were sold to "various parties;" and "many boats and yaws made for the sloops." Besides all this work, "the carpenters constantly repaired and caiiled the old craft."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV. 17.

In this month, the Rev. Everardus Bogardus, having sailed with the newly-appointed director-general, Wouter van Twiller, in the "Southbier" (Salt Mountain), arrived at New Amsterdam. He had been a "sicketkrooster" (comforter of the sick) in Guinees, had been ordained to the ministry by the classis of Amsterdam, on June 14, 1652; and, on July 15 of that year, had been formally recorded before the church council as accepting service for New Netherland, and presented to the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co. with a "Classick Testimonium." So far as known, the first mention of him in New Netherland is in a letter from Kiliaen van Rensselaer to Wouter van Twiller, April 21, 1654.—Eekhof, Bataafsche J. K. d. (1910), 32, Appendix XXIV, XXV; Eeckes, N. N. Neth. Tijdsschrift, 8, 257; Corwin, Manual of Ref. Church in Am., (ed. of 1903), 330.

Wouter van Twiller, governor of New Netherland, writes a letter to the governor of the "English Colonyt the Massachusotts Baye," which, translated, reads as follows: "That which you allready concerning the use of the River yow, as you instance the Kings of England hath granted to his subjects and therefore it seems strange unto you that we have taken possession thereof; it seems very strange unto mee, who for my owne paret couet wish that his Majestie of England and the Lords of the States Generall concerning the limits and parting of these quarters, would agree. And as good neighbours we might live in these heathenish countries. And therefore I desire you soe longe to defer yeo't pence or claim of the said River until the Kings of England and our superior Majestates or governors bee (as concerning the same) agreed. I have in the name of the Lords the States Generall and the authorisht West India Company taken possession of the formentioned River, and for testimony thereof have sett up an house on the North side of the said River, with intent to plant yse. Itt's not the intent of the States to take the land from the poore Natives, as the Kinges of Spaine hath done by the Pope's Donation, but rather to take it from the said Natives at some reasonable and convenient price, with God be prays we have done hitherto. In this parte of the world are divers heathen lands that are empty of inhabitants, soe that of a little parte or portion thereof there needs not any question. I should be very sorry that wee should bee occasion to the Kingses Majestie of England and the Lords Generall in such a matter of contention. WhereWITH ending, I commit you with yso't wholl familie unto the protection of Almightye God, being and restinge "Ye' true frende "Gauthier of Twiller

"Written in the Fort Amsterdam in New Netherland 4 October new Style 1653."—N. Y. Col. Docs., III. 18-19.

The house which Van Twiller states he has erected "with intent to plant" is apparently the house on his Bounry which is shown under No. 10 on the Manusar Map of 1679. See Pl. 41 and 42, Vol. II.

In this year, the Dutch West India Co. suffered reverses. A statement of the company's accounts, drawn up in 1655, indicates that by the upper Fort Amsterdam, 4,172 vessels, 10 stivers ($1,669) for all New Netherland the sum of 421,800 guilders, 11 stivers ($165,120.24).—Hazard, Historical Collections, I: 397.

In this month, the “Rendrecht” left Amsterdam for Rensselaerwyck bearing probably the first “red flag with the arms of the colony, to float on the breeze on proper occasions.”—Van Rensselaer Bouwer Manuscripts, 67, 286, 315.

Lubbert van Doolckgen leaves Holland this month to assume his duties of fiscal and schout of New Netherland, succeeding Coenraet Hohelman. He antagonized Director-Gen. Wouter van Twiller, and was summarily removed from office. This led to long-standing proceedings on charges before the states-general, involving the West India Co.—Van Rensselaer Bouwer Manuscripts, 72, 77, 297, 320, 352, 465; N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 100-4, 117, 126, 137 ff.

See A. In October, 1642, when the company’s delegates were debating the rejection of Kieft on account of his conduct in the Indian war, they proposed to send Doolckgen and other New Netherland officials, at this time as a provisional director-general.—Ibid. I: 148-49.

The patrons of New Netherland inform the lords of the states-general as follows: “Wampum being, in a manner, the currency of the country, with which the produce of the interior is paid for, must be considered as obtained goods, being representative thereof.” N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 87. This marks the official recognition of wampum as money in New Netherland. See earliest reference under 1628.; and for first recorded regulatory ordinance, see April 18, 1641. On the use of wampum, see Hodge, Handbook of the American Indians, II: 909-07 (source references 909); Van Rensselaer, Hist. City of N. Y., I: 61-62, 67; Breuchamp, Wampum and

The “Examination of Bastiaen Jansz Crol, former director of New Netherland, being 39 years of age, conducted at the request of the patroons by Notary Justus van de Vos,” is held at Amsterdam. The questions asked and the answers given are as follows:
1. In what capacity, and for how long he was in the service of the West India Company in New Netherland.

He states that he set out as comforter of the sick and made a voyage and stay of 2 months in that country. He went out for the second time in the same capacity, and after he had been away for about 6 months, he was appointed to the directorship at Fort Orange on the North River and held the same for three years.
The third time he went out again as director of Fort Orange and was the best of his recollection served again for about two years.
After which he was elected director general of New Netherland at Fort Amsterdam on the island Manhattan, lying at the mouth of the aforesaid North River also named Mauritius, and served in this office 13 months.

2. Whether, when residing at Fort Orange, he did not hear from the chiefs of the Maquaas that there had formerly traded with them a certain Hans joris Hontom, to whom he had first for skipper Jacob Eelkens, whom he later employed as his supernavio.

"Yes.

3. Whether a misunderstanding did not arise between himself and Hontom, who had taken prisoner one of the chiefs.

"Yes.

5. Whether in 1633, while he, Crol, was still director of New Netherland, the above named Hans Hontom did not come in the capacity of director of Fort Orange and councillor in New Netherland.

"Yes.

6. Whether he did not see that a month after the arrival of Hontom, there had also arrived Jacques Eelkens, coming with his fletce from London, and whether he did not at once go up the river to Fort Orange.

"Yes.

7. Whether he was not asked by his successor, the new director van Twiller, to go again to Fort Orange in the service of the W. I. Company, in order to prevent Eelkens from trading there. June 1634.

"Yes.

8. Whether, when he came up there Jacques Eelkens was not already there and trading in a tent he had erected behind Castle Island on the mill creek.

"Yes.

9. Whether the sloop of Eelkens was not lying directly in front of the wall of Fort Orange and trading there.

"Yes.

10. Whether he [Crol] did not station himself with his boat in the Maquaaski above the fort, in order to cut off the Maquaas from trading Eelkens.

"Yes.

11. Whether on the following day, Hontom did not tell him that he might as wel go away as he could manage the matter himself.

"Yes.

12. Whether Eelkens did not go often to the fort and whether Hontom did not often eat in the tent.

"Yes.

13. How long Eelkens traded there.

Four to five weeks.

14. How many skins he obtained.

About 400.

15. Whether he, when he was at Fort Orange, was not present, when Saggedzycahe, chief head of the Maquaas, came, and seeing Hontom, at once packed up his skins and rising up, said ‘That man is a scoundrel, I will not trade with him.’

"Yes.

15. Whether soon afterwards, the company’s yacht de Beers was not burned by the savages near Fort Orange.

"Yes.

16. Whether the tribe of the Maquaas, shortly before he left Fort Orange did not tell him, as he understood their language, that they would kill the said Hans joris Hontom the first time they should find him alone, and whether he had not warned Hontom about this.

"Yes.

What answer Hontom made thereto.

'That the Maquaas might do their best,' or something to that effect.

17. Whether, on the 20th July, 1633, as he, Crol, lay ready to sail for the fatherland, a Malecian savage, named Diekop, did not come bringing the tidings to the island Manhattan, that all the cattle in the neighborhood of Fort Orange had been killed.

"Yes.

18. Whether the director Pieter Minuict, the predecessor of Crol, had not ordered Cornelis van Vorst to keep two of the four young cows which were with calf.

"Yes.

19. Where this happened.

In the house of Cornelis van Vorst at Pauonia, in the presence of Pieter Bijleveld and shortly before the departure of Minuict.

20. Whether Andreas Hudden, commiss of stores, did not also furnish a cow to van Vorst.

"Yes.

20. Whether Wouter van Tuullier, director, in March 1633, about 10 months after the delivery, took away these cattle from Cornelis van Vorst.

"Yes.

21. For what reason?

He said he had bought them from Minuict.

22.1. Whether van Tuullier did not give van Vorst three other cows in their place.

"Yes.

1635

— In this year, goods and merchandise valued at 25,755 guilders were bought in Holland by the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Company, and sent in one ship to New Netherland.—De Laet, Kort Verhaal, 37, in his Historie (1644). There were imported into Holland from New Netherland 14,901 beavers, and 1,413 otters and other peltries, valued at 134,925 guilders. The total valuation of such imports from 1624 to 1635 inclusive amounted to 705,117 guilders.—Ibid.

— Jacob Stoffelsen deposed on March 22, 1639, among other things, that Fort Amsterdam "was completed in the year 1635."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 18. Cf. letter of Van Twiller and his council of Aug. 14, 1636.

— During this year, a small party of Englishmen, commanded by George Holmes, was sent out by the province governor of Virginia, and captured Fort Nassau on the Delaware River from the Dutch. A bark was despatched by Director Wouter van Twiller to dispose them. They were taken on board the Dutch ship De Vries's ship bound for Virginia. De Vries, after compelling them to sail on board, landed them in Virginia. On May 10 (q. v.), cameen his leaky ship at the Smits Vly in New Amsterdam.—Jameson, Nar. N. Neth., 195-97. O'Callaghan's version (Hist. N. Neth., 1: 170) is not correct. Perhaps De Vries brought with him several Englishmen to settle in New Netherland. If so, Holmes and his servant Thomas Hall, the earliest Englishmen met there, must have fled from New France four years afterwards, Secretary Van Tienhoven charged that Hall "ran away from his master" during the expedition of 1635 against Fort Nassau, and "came to the Manhattans and hired himself as a farmer's man to Jacob van Cural" (Curley).—Jameson, op. cit., 375. But the friendly associations existing between Holmes and Hall on Manhattan Island would seem to discount these charges, based solely upon the word of the corrupt provincial secretary, who, in 1655, held only the subordinate post of bookkeeper of wages paid by the company to its servants. Regarding Holmes and Hall, see, further, March 23, August, and Sept. 7, 1639.

— Blaauw's Map "Nova Belgica et Anglia Nova" (copied from the Figurative Map of Adriaen Block) appeared in this year, in the first edition of Blaauw's Welt Atlas. This map, although a close copy of the first Figurative Map, has been brought up to date. The principal point of interest which the map possesses for us is its indication, for the first time, of the full name "Nieuw Amsterdam," and its depiction as a fort. The form "Manhattan" appears also for the first time on this map. For reproduction, see Cartography, Pl. 34, and description, II: 88.

— Writing in 1792, Ebenezer Hazard said: "... from a state [news] of their [the West India Co.'s] accounts drawn up in 1635 (part of which was in possession of Mr. Henry Kip, late of New York, deceased, and from which this extract was made), it appears that Fort Amsterdam, in New Netherland Cost the Company 4,172 Gilders to Stuyvants, and that New Netherland (the Province) cost 412,800 Gilders 11 Stuyvants."—Hist. Coll. of State Papers, I: 79.

Jan.

The following minute is made at a meeting of the directors at 22 Amsterdam: "Messrs. Blommert, Hanned and Triep, patroons of colonies in New Netherland, request and have requested to be permitted to have their bonds. Whereupon they have been informed, to hand over to [the Treasurer] and further questions, and then we shall deliver the above [bonds]." These were the patentships on the South (Delaware) River.—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, XLIII, fol. 7 v., 17 v., in National Archives at The Hague. Regarding discovery of these important documents, see Sept. 9, 12, 13, and 16, 1644. Such of these minutes as have been translated by Mr. Van Laer are so noted. The others are taken from translations made by Mr. Versteeg from Dr. Wieder's trascr. 29

At a "meeting of the Lords for the dividing of the Coast," the "bounds were thus laid out; Beginning from the Westermost parts of the land the Lords of the ORANGE [1632] have begun his limits, and ended the same at the river called Hudson's river, to the Eastward of the river was placed the Duke of Lenox," etc. Sir Ferdinando Gorges' patent was from the "midst of MERINECK to the great River of Sagadacheke being Sixty miles, and so up into the Maine land one hundred and twenty miles."—Sir Ferdinando

The following record is made in the Resolutieboek of the chamber at Amsterdam: "Henricz Arensten Keertekoe, having plied [by ship] to Canada, requests to serve the Company in New Netherland, or where their Honors shall be pleased to employ him. [Conclusion thereupon] There is no opening."—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, XLVI, fol. 30. See also N. Y. Gen. & Biog. Rec., XLIX: 219.

— Mr. Forts requests to serve the Company as map maker (cartographer). Will he be engaged when the time and occasion present themselves."—From "Mio. of the Amsterdam Chamber of the Dutch W. I. Company, 1635-1656" (translated by A. J. F. van Laar), in N. Y. Genealogical and Biog. Rec., XLIX: 218.

In the Resolutieboek of the chamber of Amsterdam, this record appears: "A letter was read from Mr. Ambassador Joscha from London, dated the last of March, concerning damage done to the New Netherland by the English owing to their pretensions."—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, XLIX, fol. 28.

An entry in the Resolutieboek of the West India Co., chamber of May Amsterdam, states: "Willem Riewerts is appointed skipper of the 'Sevenster' [a vessel directly that ship] to sail for New Netherland, on the old wage scale formerly received by him at Campen."—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, LII, fol. 31 v. See also N. Y. Gen. & Biog. Rec., XLIX: 220.

A minute is made by the directors at Amsterdam, that "Simon Janzen, of Durenberg, has been accepted as mate on the 'Sevenster,' for the next month."—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, LIII, fol. 32 v.

The directors at Amsterdam resolve that "the commissioners for New Netherland shall inform themselves concerning a capable under-commissary for the commerce of New Netherland."—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, LIV, fol. 32 v.

The directors at Amsterdam resolve to send, after it has been read in meeting, "the drafted letter to the Director and Council of New Netherland." This is one of the lost texts.—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, LV, fol. 33 v. See A. Addenda.

Jan.

At a meeting of the directors at Amsterdam "a petition of Bastiaan Jansen Crol [Croll] is read and 'referred to the commissioners for New Netherland.' The text is one of the lost documents.—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, LVIII, fol. 45.

— Isaac de Raiserte requests an order for the payment of his July itemized bill signed by skipper Tonneman and Commissary Jongening, amounting to 47 guilders and 18 st. Huberts."—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, LV, fol. 47.

At a meeting of the directors at Amsterdam, the following record is made in the minutes: Mr. Conradus submits, that the wife of [Pieter Pietersz.] Byleveld, demanding damages and interest in New Netherland, exceeding 7000 guilders, on account of the recall of her people from New Netherland, besides Mr. Durt, has been to see Mr. Bicker and Reneselaer, and that Mr. Bicker has informed her that it was bought on credit by Mr. Reneselaer. That Mr. Byleveld has departed in the service of the Company, and not as a freeman. That now she offers, in hope of an agreement, to come to terms. Whereupon, it was resolved, that the old and new commissioners for New Netherland shall confer with her, and to report to this assembly for a final conclusion."—Records of old Dutch West India Co., No. 14, EX, fol. 51. See also Van Rensselaer Bouvier Manuscripts, 301; and June 14, Addenda.

This minute is made by the directors at Amsterdam: "Daniel Sept. Dintlangs [Lubbert van Dintlangs], fiscal of New Netherland, returned home by way of England, has handed over his journal, with [Mr.] Conrades who shall read and hand over to the commissioners for New Netherland." This journal is one of the lost records.—Records of old West India Co., No. 14, LXXIII, fol. 31 v.

The following minute is made by the directors at Amsterdam: "Lubbert van Dintlangs [for Dintlangs], former fiscal in New 17
Netherlands, requests a copy of the invoice of the \textit{winckel ende Sept. Keldergereden} of New Netherland, in order that he may examine the same, and further to request that Cornelis van Vorst be paid against his living expenses. It is referred to the commissioners for New Netherland, who shall examine the letter which Mr. Conradus has written concerning the matter. —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, LXIV, fol. 67 vo.

Oct.

1. As follows, is made by the directors at Amsterdam:

Leous Lucus, merchant of this place, requests according to the obligation [bond] of Director Wouter van Twiller, to receive the sum of four hundred and four guilders for various goods furnished by Samuel Chandler to the people in New Netherland. The matter is referred to the ship's crew, now expected from New Netherland, as we have no advice from the said party. —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, LXVI, fol. 72 vo.

11. The minutes of the chamber at Amsterdam state: "The father of Petrus Snyffinck, comynys, or supercargo, at Fernando Noronho [Fernando de Noronha], requests that his son escape from there to Pernambuco [Brazil], may be advanced to whatever position he may be allowed to fill. Referred to the XIX [Assembly of the Nineteen] to be mentioned in the general letter." —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, fol. 77 vo. (trans. in \textit{N. Y. Gen. & Bkg. Rec.}, XLIX: 221).

18. The directors at Amsterdam make this minute: "Aeggen Cornelis, mother of Cornelis Jansen, who sailed as smith to New Netherland, petitions to receive, without having been granted authority thereunto, six months of his wages. It was disallowed." —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, LXIX, fol. 80 vo.

29. It is referred to the Director [of New Netherland] in New Netherland, requests that he may receive some money on account. Referred to the Commissioners for [for] New Netherland. Also requests some medicines from the apothecary store to cure his dripping and bad health contracted on the voyage. —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, fol. 83 vo. (trans. in \textit{N. Y. Gen. & Bkg. Rec.}, XLIX: 224).

3. This record is made in the minutes of the directors at Amsterdam: "A letter of Wouter van Twiller, Director in New Netherland, dated Aug. 28, 1635, was read." This letter is one of the last records. —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, LXIII, fol. 86.

8. The following minute is made by the directors: "Jan Pietersen, of Elekhuysen, having sailed as second mate \textit{[ejempel]} in the 'Gelderland,' and appointed at St. Martyn skinner of the yacht 'Goede Hop,' was driven thence by the Spaniards and by necessity forced to go to New Netherland, and detainet there by the Director van Twiller until his present return hither on the 'Eendracht,' requests his pay and presents himself for service. Referred to the commissioners for New Netherland, to investigate the matter and make a report to this assembly." —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, LXIV, fol. 87 vo. (trans. in \textit{N. Y. Gen. & Bkg. Rec.}, XLIX: 223).

12. At a meeting of the chamber at Amsterdam, "a letter was read from Jacques Beijtgen [Jacques Bentyn, a member of Van Twiller's council], written from New Netherland." This letter is one of the last records of the company. —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, fol. 89 vo. (trans. in \textit{N. Y. Gen. & Bkg. Rec.}, XLIX: 223).

The widow of Hans Janssen Hontus (or Hunthum), who had been commis at Fort Orange and was killed in April, 1634, by Cornelis van Vorst, director of the colony of Pauviona (Jersey City), "in order to be attached in the warehouse of the Company [at Amsterdam, Holland] a case of beavers, marked No. 2, belonging to Cornelis van Vorst, which was sent to Mr. Hamel," one of the directors of the company. On Dec. 3, a "petition of the relatives and kinmen of Joris Honton, killed by Cornelis van Vorst," was considered by the directors at Amsterdam. His family wanted "to sell and dispose of the murder," but were informed that the directors had "received no certification other than that the Director [of New Netherland] writes that the murder took place." —\textit{Records of old West India Company}, No. 14, fol. 91 vo and 99 (trans. in \textit{N. Y. Gen. & Bkg. Rec.}, XLIX: 222, 223). Bachehus (K. A. Bachehus) says that Cornelis van Vorst refused to have the ordinances of the director-general and council posted in Pauviona, for which he was arrested; he also refused to obey the officer of the company, in whose custody he was "suxx dat by v. v. ter leten van die admjuider hefft doorstecken." A deposition dated Feb. 2, 1636, concerning the murder of Cornelis van Vorst, 30 years of age, made at the request of Vbd Hendricx, widow of Hans Joris Hontus, before Notary Jan Cornelisz Hogeboom, Nov. 22. —\textit{Records of old West India Co.}, No. 14, fol. 93 vo. (trans. in \textit{N. Y. Gen. & Bkg. Rec.}, XLIX: 222, 223).
The referred supercargo, appointed by order of Amsterdam, arrived at New Netherland, where he was wounded by the Maques [Mohawks] and also broke his leg in the service of the Company, claims damages. His case is referred to 'the commissioners of munitions.'—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, fol. 96 vo. (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bieg. Rec., XLIX: 222). The following record is made in the minutes of the chamber at Amsterdam: 'Arent Steffenier, who sailed as a master in the ship "Eendracht" to New Netherland and there was wounded by the Maques [Mohawks] and also broke his leg in the service of the Company, claims damages.' His case is referred to 'the commissioners of munitions.'—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, fol. 98 vo. (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bieg. Rec., XLIX: 222). A meeting of the directors at Amsterdam: 'The following minute is made by the directors at Amsterdam: "There was presented to this body by Mr. Jan Bicker a bill of lading, according to which 60 casks of tobacco, at 35 s. sterling freightage for each hundredweight, were sent from New Netherland on the "Eendracht." He requests to have the tobacco received according to the bill of lading. Motion prevailed, that the commissioners go into the matter thoroughly, and learn what the Assembly of the Nineteen have resolved therein, in order to refer the same to the meeting and come to a decision."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, XI, fol. 99 vo. [q. f.].

Michiel Simonsen, skipper of the "Eendracht," returns from New Netherland, and requests his monthly wages. The commissioners for New Netherland are authorised to act in the matters as the service of the company demands.—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, XCI, fol. 99 vo. (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bieg. Rec., XLIX: 223).--"Lobbert van Dinclagen, former fiscal of New Netherland, petitions as in his request to have reimbursement for all his expenses. It is left to the discretion of the commissioners for New Netherland.—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, XCI, fol. 99 vo."

At a meeting of the directors at Amsterdam, the following action is taken: "Upon request of Mr. Johan Bicker, to receive the tobacco arrived from New Netherland in the ship "Eendracht," provided he pay the freightage according to the bill of lading. After examining the report of Messrs. Van Curen and Van der Dussen from the Chamber of the Northquarter [Hoorn], and the resolution of the Assembly of the Nineteen, of date 14th April, 1635, against Davidt Pietersen [de Vries], it was resolved, that if [Bicker] may receive the tobacco under security, save and without jeopardizing the just cause which the Company believes it has against Davidt Pietersen, and associates."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, XCIII, fol. 100.

On this date, and on Jan. 3 and 7, 1616, the directors of the West India Co. at Amsterdam had before them a request from Bastiaen Jansen Crol (or Kroft) for the payment of "an account with him for land carried over for tobacco, originally sent over to his wife" from New Netherland, where he was commander at Fort Orange. On Jan. 10, 1616, he again requested "the balance of his account," and on the 14th, "the presiding officer" of the Chamber at Amsterdam stated that Bastiaen Jansen Crol claims payment according to his account for the delivery of brick burned in New Netherland and that upon inquiry it appears that the said brick was worthless. Therefore, the directors "decided to make further inquiry through the commissioners for New Netherland.—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, fol. 103, 108 vo., 110 vo., 112 (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bieg. Rec., XLIX: 222)."

At a meeting of the directors of Amsterdam, this minute is made: "Mr. President reported, that 6 bevarkins had been sent from New Netherland by W. van Twiller as a gift to H. Schaeff, J. Achtenh. and J. Timommen. This delivery of the skins was unanimously disapproved until further information shall have been received about the same."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, XCI, fol. 107 vo. (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bieg. Rec., XLIX: 222). "The following minute is made by the directors at Amsterdam: "Mr. President reported, that Cornelis van Vorst has passed an obligation and assignment in behalf of Claes Cornelis Swits amounting to 420 guilders. The holder of which requests payment from the company. The minute is passed, because the same was dated December 5, 1633, and originates in the purchase of a tallow colony of Pavonia [Jersey City], which this Company took over absolutely from Mr. Paew and paid for to his Honor. It was resolved, that Mr. Paew must free the Company from these debts and accordingly that they [the above papers] be sent back to his honor."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, fol. 107 vo. (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bieg. Rec., XLIX: 222)."
Aug. 1636 goods or people the Company has to send thither. — Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXI, fol. 158 vo.

Aug. 14 Kielaen van Renselaer, declaring that he is about to buy a small ship to be sent to New Netherland, offering to hire or buy a larger one in case this meeting should find it desirable to send some cargo; requesting thereupon a definite answer, as he is obliged to make an indenture thereon that day. Whereupon thanking his Honors, he was informed, that whereas the business is so pressing and the Commissioners for New Netherland cannot be in such a hurry, in order not to detain him, [it is resolved] that he may buy such a ship as seems best to him, and should there be space in the same, and the Company is in condition to send any goods, it will send some cargo with the same. — Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXII, fol. 160 vo.

Aug. 8 The 8th of August, the gunner of the fort [Fort Amsterdam] gave a parting feast to De Vries, and had a tent erected on one of the bastions of the fort, where a table and benches were set and many people hidden. — De Vries' notes in Jameson's Narr. N. Neth., 1798.

Wouter van Twiller writes to the directors at Amsterdam: "We very patiently await daily your honors' answer, together with general instructions for redress, which is needed. All that is wanted is to apply the rod of justice, for which [we] must be properly authorized by the supreme authorities.

"As to the trade, it would go reasonably well if the English did not interfere with it by many underhand means. They offer here abundant supplies of Dutch merchandise for sale, under pretext of trade with the Indians, which trade they think is open to them as well as to us. Those on the Fresh River [Connecticut] pretend that they do not come to trade, but to spend the rest of their days, but they are well stocked with goods and do not let any ships go by, if they are to be had."

"The house on the South [ Delaware] River is already under cover. I am at present busy to send four iron pieces thither to keep possession of the same.

"No English come here, or have ever been here, who behave otherwise than as becomes good friends and allies. If the Company maintains that they solely occupy these places for purposes of trade to the exclusion of them [the English], I fear that, getting into dispute, they will be defeated.

"... The crops this year have succeeded very well. We hope that we shall have bread enough for ourselves for one year. If agriculture were promoted a little, we could manage to have enough of everything, with the exception of salt, oil and vinegar.

"Cornelis van Voorst still resides in the Manor of Pavenria [Jersey City]. He does a great deal of mischief. The disputes between the patroons and the Company have undermined the respect for the Company, to the sorrow of those who would fain uphold it."—Letter to the Director Wouter van Twiller and his council send a letter to the directors of the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., which shows that Jacobus van Curlier and the elder Claes van Elshout are councillors of New Netherland, that Andres Hulde is provincial secretary, and that Jacques Rentin is the situation or chief prosecuting official at this time. As this general letter introduces us to a number of hitherto unknown facts relative to conditions on Manhattan Island and in the province, the following paragraphs are included here

"Donnie E. Bogardus, minister here [New Amsterdam], has very earnestly requested us to secure a schoolmaster to teach and train the youth of both Dutch and blacks, in the knowledge of Jesus Christ and to serve also as sexton and preacher. [See Aug. 4, 1617.]

"It would in our opinion also be advisable if the carpenters who are already here or are still to be sent, were put on a daily wage order that the Company might employ them according to their capacity. It would in that case be necessary to pay them every week, in order to stimulate their interest and inclination to work.

"As to our fort, it falls entirely into ruin, as it is built up of wood, which at present is entirely decayed. It is very necessary that it be entirely built of stone (as it was begun), as the palisades can not stand more than 3 or 4 years at the most, which would put your honors to excessive expense; and in case your honors should resolve to have this done, it would be necessary to have regard thereto in the sending over of men and materials, in which case the men doing the work ought to have extra wages, as in Fernambuco and other places, in order thereby to keep the men in a state of proper obedience and ready to perform their necessary duty.

"It is further suggested whether it would be advisable to explore the coast from Terra Neufi to Florida to see what trade might be carried on there. If your honors shall be in favor of this, be pleased to advise us."—From contemporary copies of two Dutch letters, recently discovered and translated by A. J. F. van Loen in the Quarterly Jour. of the N. Y. State Hist. Assoc. (Oct., 1919), 44-50.

Kielaen van Renselaer requests of the directors at Amsterdam "in a petition, in case there was no cargo of the Company in New Netherland, to be permitted to trade his own cargo and under what conditions. It was written in the hands of the Commissioners for New Netherland, to act upon the same and to report concerning that petition, as well as on the manner of redress, which should be inaugurated in New Netherland." — Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXIII, fol. 173 vo.

A minute of the meeting of the directors at Amsterdam states that the commissioners for New Netherland, "having been in conference with Mr. Renselaer, have reported, that through more expansive presentation on his former remonstrance [see Sept. 1], as recorded, the Messrs. Commissioners were requested to prepare duplicate drafts, concering the way the trade on New Netherland can be thrown open to others, but those on every point of the same is important as showing an impelling cause for the establishment of free trade in New Netherland.— Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXIV, fol. 177 vo. Trade to Brazil was opened in 1628.

"Jan Jansen from Ilpendam, captured in Porto Calvo, and returning home by way of Bahia [Bahia], and now going to New Netherland as supercargo on the ship of [Mr. Kielaen] van Renselaer, the "Renselaerswyck" — see Van Renselaer Bowier Manuscripts, 355, requests payment for his remaining wages to the amount of 60 guilders. Referred to the masters of accounts. — Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXV, fol. 177 vo.

"Henrick de Forrest requests [of the directors at Amsterdam] a patent for 100 morgens of land granted him by the Council in New Netherland subject to the approval of this Chamber, on condition that he pay the dues prescribed by the regulations; all more fully set forth by his petition," which was referred to the Commissioners for New Netherland. — Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXV, fol. 177 vo. (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Hist. Rec., XLIX: 225). Mr. Van Laer, the translator, annotates thus: "Henrick de Forest sailed soon after the date of this entry for New Netherland as mate on the ship 'Renselaerswyck,' which arrived at Manhattan on March 5, 1637 [A.D.]. The supposition has been heretofore that he immediately after his arrival secured a grant from Wouter van Twiller for 100 morgens of land on Manhattan Island. The present entry shows that this grant was secured at an earlier date, consequently that De Forest had been in New Netherland before 1636, probably in the ship 'Laer' and/or 'Vries,' which sailed to India in 1632 with Captain David Pietersen de Vries." — De Forest left De Vries at St. Martyn, but may have come to New Netherland in the service of the West India Co. — See April 16, 1635 (Addenda), and Nov. 22, 1635.

"A letter from the states general, dated August 30th, was read [at a meeting of the directors at Amsterdam], in which it is recommended that satisfaction be given Lubbert van Dislangen, fiscal of New Netherland, whereupon it is 'resolved, that a reply be made by the Commissioners for New Netherland.' — Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXIX, fol. 181 vo.

A letter written from the Texel, on the 26th, by Pieter Claessen Croon, is read at a meeting of the directors at Amsterdam, in which he reports "the arrival also of the 'Witte Leeuw' [White Lion]; also the ship 'Sevenester' [Seven Stars] from New Netherland, which has passed unnoticed; and Meurs. Blommerd and de Vries were delegated immediately to find said ship, visit her, and further to put things in order." — Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXX, fol. 184 vo.

Following out their duties, delegated to them by the directors at Amsterdam the previous day, Messrs. Blommerd and de Vries went to the Texel to search the ship "Harring," and have deposited it with Mr. Barterring, and further, that they have brought the ship 'Sevenester' here [Amsterdam] to the pier." — Records of old West India Co., No. 14, CXXI, fol. 184 vo.

A minute of the directors at Amsterdam states: "A letter was read from the Director [Wouter van Twiller] of New Netherland, dated March 22, 1636. Also another from the Director, dated
"The wife of Jan Hillebrandt, who more than 2½ years ago went out to New Netherland as a free woman and was accepted there as a master at 20 guilders a month, petitions [the directors at Amsterdam] to receive two months' wages of her husband, just as she received them last year."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, CXXXI, fol. 198 vo.

Mr. Courandus submits [to the directors at Amsterdam] that it will be necessary to send a ship to New Netherland, ideas to take measures regarding the government there and to find a suitable person for the office of commander. The Commissioners [for New Netherland] are instructed to look around for a capable person and to find a suitable ship and to report at the next meeting."—Records of Old West India Company, No. 14, CXXXII, fol. 193 vo., National Archives at The Hague. (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bingo Rec., XLIX: 227-228).

Out of this suggestion came the appointment of Willem Kiel.

The directors at Amsterdam resolve, among other things, to send the ship "Harlingen" to Curacao and New Netherland.

"Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, fol. 204 (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bingo Rec., XLIX: 218)."

Willem Rieuwertse, skipper of the ship "De Sevenster" (Seven Stars), requests the directors at Amsterdam for a settlement of his pay, and further offers his services. His request is referred to the Commissioners for New Netherland to dispose of the matter."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, CXXXIV, fol. 203.

"Cornelia Vockertsen [Vie], having arrived home more than a year ago in the ship 'Eendracht' from New Netherland and not being accounted for in the ship's return, requests that the directors at Amsterdam] to receive his wages, from that time on at ten guilders per month, as he was sick when the payment was made, as he says." The directors refuse "until further proof shall be forthcoming."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, CXXXVI, fol. 205 vo.

A college is projected in Massachusetts on Oct. 28—Nov. 7.—Addenda.

"Frederick Lubbertsen, Freeman in New Netherland, requests [the directors at Amsterdam] that his wife, Styntgen Jan's daughter, may join him at the first opportunity, according to the declaration of Wouter van Twiller, and as there is still due his husband by the Company, from over three years ago, six months' wages at 20 guilders per month, which the Directors have always promised to give her when her husband should return, and he now remains there [in New Netherland], therefore she requests that she may receive the same." It is referred to the commissioners for New Netherland.—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, CXL, fol. 209 (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bingo Rec., XLIX: 228).

Mr. Reepmacker submits [to the directors at Amsterdam] Dec. 4 that David Pietersen [de Vries] requests to communicate to the making some New Nervicism about "decide that he [de Vries] shall have to address himself to the Commissioners for New Netherland."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, CXLI, fol. 215 vo.

Mr. Courandus declares that David Pietersen [de Vries] requests to be sent as Director to New Netherland; and if this can not be done, that he may be given permission to plant a colony in New Netherland. Resolved [by the directors at Amsterdam] that a more capable person is needed for Director."—Records of Old West India Co., No. 14, CXLI, fol. 216 vo. (trans. in N. Y. Gen. & Bingo Rec., XLIX: 228). Captain de Vries established a colony on Staten Island, in 1625. For an account of his published journal of voyages, see Bibliography, Vol. V. 1637

On this day (or March 5—see 166), Sept. 11), the ship "Renselaarwyck" anchors "at the Manhattan," and remains there because the river is closed. "The cargo was discharged and Hendrik de Forest, the trader and mate, remained in the hired warehouse to carry on trade, while the ship went up the river to the colony on the 16th and dropped anchor on the 7th of April opposite Fort Orange."—I am Reepmacker. Manuscripts, 73. This reference to De Forest, "the supposed founder of the town of Harlem," shows that he arrived in the spring of 1637, and not, as stated by Riker, in the fall of 1636.—Ibid., 31. See also Sept. 11, 1636; and July 23, 1638.

Two Indian chiefs of Marechelick (Brooklyn), appearing before the Hist. MSS., Dutch, 33; Innes, op. cit., 64. On Dec. 26, he made out a conveyance of his house and lot to Govert Aertsen, probably because of his fear of punishment for having grossly insulted the wife of a neighbour, and when the 17th, he was tried before the council and sentenced to be whipped in public and then banished; but on the 17th, the council, in consideration of his four motherless children and on account of the approach of a cold winter, gave him a temporary reprieve, and ordered that sentence should be carried out at a future time.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 36, 1637; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV, 153.

In 1643, Roelantsen was engaged as a weighmaster in the service of the West India Co. at Manhattan.—Dunshoe, op. cit., 17. In 1646, while he was in Holland, his wife, Lyntie Martens, died, and therefore curators were appointed to administer her estate, and to care for the young children "till the arrival of the father or some news from him." One of these curators was Jan Stevensen, the new weighmaster.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 99. Roelantsen, returning in 1646 via Amsterdam, in the ship "St. Jacobs," of which Haye Jansen was skipper, arrived in New Amsterdam in July. When he arrived, his arrest was ordered by the new council, and he was taken into custody for probable violation of a recent act; inspection, he got into trouble with the fiscal, who sued him for slander. He was also sued by Augustine Heerman for the passage money of himself and a son, but proved satisfactory to the council that he had worked his way over as a seaman, and that his son had been allowed from the fiscal from the service. Roelantsen appears in the voyage.—Ibid., 107, 105. It has been shown already how Roelantsen, soon after his return, was sentenced to banishment, from which he received a reprieve that actually became permanent.

In March, 1647, he was sued the carpenter, Jan Tenenssen, for debt.—Ibid., 110. On June 14th, he was appointed a provost or jailer, holding subordinate relations to Elias Van Dyck.—Ibid., 40, 109; cf. also Innes, op. cit., 65. On Dec. 4, 1649, in contemplation of a voyage to the West Indies, he gave power of attorney to Jacob Tyzen, to take charge of his children and the administration of his affairs during his absence.—Ibid., 51. He is still found in New Amsterdam in 1657, as a private in the burgher corps (O'Callaghan, Hist. N. Y. Neth., II: 509); and in an action before the court of burgomasters and schepens, on Feb. 17, 1653, he was called "the woodcutter." It appears that one Stooff Eilers was charged with calling Roelantsen "from his work in the Church, outside the fort," and had then attacked and beaten him on the public street. Eilers denied "having called Adam Roelantsen out of the fort or beaten him," which shows that Roelantsen was employed on the church in the fort and not in the "packing house, the old church on Pearl Street," as stated by Innes, op. cit., 65.—Rec. N. Am., I: 54. The last record of Roelantsen in the N.Y. Co. is an action before the council, in March, 1653.—Ibid., 62, 70.

Willem Kieft is commissioned and sworn as director-general of Sept. New Netherland in the place of Wouter van Twiller.—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 104. See March 28, 1638.

The West India Company's bakery was built during Van Twiller's administration, namely between 1633 and this year.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 16. This bakery was also mentioned in a grant of an adjoining lot, made on March 29, 1647, to Rem Jansen. By June 6, 1649, the company's bakery lot had been granted to Juriaen Andriessen.—Dutch Grants, Block J, Lot 1, Vol. II: 388.

The earliest printed description of New Netherland, in English, appeared in Capt. John Underhill's News from America, printed and published in London in this year. It is given on p. 19, in an article which follows: "The truth is, I want time to set forth the excellence of the whole Country; but if you would know the garden of the New England, then must you glance your eye upon Hudson's river, a place exceeding all yet named, the River affords fish in abundance, as Sturgeon, Salmon, and many delicate varieties of fish that naturally appear at the mouth of the River, and a great plenty of fish in those parts." This estimate of Underhill is particularly interesting, because it was he who proposed to lead the first party of English settlers to New Netherland in the year following this publication.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 25-26.

Jan Celes (Seals, Se Ge), an Englishman, received a lease, grant, or permission, at about this time, to occupy a plantation lying north of the later Rutgers Swamp. The location on modern maps was About west of Middelburgh St., its south line being 233 feet north of Casal St.; and it extended north as the line of Casal St. It was never surveyed, and the line being the strand of the North River. This line later became very well known as "Old Jan's Land." After Old Jan's death, Tonis Nysan received a grant for the tract, April 3, 1647.—Liber GG: 208 (Albany). The parcel later became a part of the Trinity Church property.—See The Landmark Map Ref. 1642. See Manatus Maps, II: 283; Dec. 28, 1639.

Jonkheer Jacob van Curler, who, as factor of the West India Co., had built Fort Good Hope on the Connecticut River in 1635 (Jason, Nar. N. Neth., 205, 308), took possession of a tract of 200 acres in Harlem, sometime before 1638, which land was named Otterspoor (Otters-poor). Jonkheer Adriaen de Poiniet, his son, conveyed to Den Heren's Muscesta farm (afterwards Montagnie's flat), and was north of the Mill Creek at the present 108th St. extending from the Harlem River to near Fifth Ave. On May 18, 1638, he executed a lease of the farm to Clas Cornelissen Swits, but some months later (date not given) he decided the farm to Cornelis van Tienhoven, who in turn executed a lease on Jan. 24, 1639, to Swits and Jan Claessen Altaras. Apparently, the purchase of Van Tienhoven was made on behalf of Coenraet van Keulen, a merchant residing in Amsterdam, for, on Aug. 22, 1639, he conveyed the farm to Van Keulen, subject only to the aforesaid-mentioned lease. A ground-lease of the farm for this year is also stated in Van Keulen's De- Director Gen. Kieft, in July, 1645, on behalf of Van Keulen. It appears to have been the first patent obtained for this farm.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, I, 5, 7, 365, 369; Hikert, Revised Hist. of Harlem, 119, 127, 131, 378. See also Addenda.

Thijs Hendricksen van Amsterdam, received in this year a grant from Director Kieft, near Werpoes (an Indian village; see Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 96). The plantation was in the neighbourhood of the intersection of Grand and Mulberry Sts.—See N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 14; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 45, 1. The property was later granted by Gov. May 28, 1642.

A deposition, made on Jan. 12, 1645, before the provincial secretary, reveals that there arrived in New Amsterdam, on board the ship "Dolphins," in 1648, Jan Jansen Schepherpes, his wife, and two children, the youngest a nursing babe, also Leendert Arentzen and Bareet Jacobsen Cool.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghans trans.), II: 139 (N. Y. State Library).

In this year, Wouter van Twiller received a ground-lease for 100 morgens, lying near Sapokankan, bounded north by the road from the Schanck to the land along Jan van Rotterdam's land, west by Jan van Rotterdam's plantation and that of Edward Fiscook, and extending so far into the woods as to include the said 100 morgens, provided that "all such roads and foot-paths as already run through this land shall continue there for the use of the inhabitants."—See Manatus Maps, II: 189; C. A contract is made between Cornelis van Tienhoven, party of the first part, and Claes Cornelis Swits and Jan Claes Alters, parties of the second part, "for the hire of the Bouwery heretofore occupied by Jacob van Culer situate over against Johannes la Montaeng's Bouwery called Vredendael." The contract involved the delivery to Swits and Alters of the house, outbuildings, and implements, and 100 morgens of land, as well as four mares and six cows. The house was "...very clean,..."—

Jan. 24, 1639, by Jan Claessen Alters, and we learn from a report of referees, of Aug. 50, 1642, that improvements were made on the island by him. The island is laid down and named on the Castello-Manatus Map, of 1639 (see Vol. II, Pl. 41, and data on p. 207). We do not know what name was given to this island by the Indians. It was not Minnihan schon, as has been generally supposed, for that was the name of Rannals Island,—for which, see July 1647.

Feb. 10th February, I have begun to make a plantation... and a half or two miles above the fort, as there was there a fine location, and full thirty-one morgens of maize-land, where there were no trees to remove; and bay-land lying all together, sufficient for two hundred cattle, which I went there to live, half on account of the pleasure of it, as it was all situated along the river. I leased out the plantation of Staten Island, as 200 people had been sent me from Holland, as was stipulated in the contract which I made with Frederick de Vries, a manager of the West India Company.--------Voyages de Vries (trans. by Henry C. Murphy), 129.

In a court proceeding of this date, it is stated that goods that were brought over to New Amsterdam by the ship "Love" (Liefde) were sold on board ship by members of the crew, contrary to order. For this, the captain, Martin Cael, is held responsible and condemned to pay a month's freight, 1,900 guilders ($156), one-half to go to the West India Co., one-fourth towards the building of a new church, and the remainder to the fiscal.—Cal. Hist. MSS. Dutch, 66. From this we see that a "new church" was contemplated as early as this date.

Gerritsens made, in a deposition of this date, of Isaac Allerton's ship, "whereof Mr. Peter Gerlyn is skipper, lying in the roadstead in front of the Island of Manhattan in New Netherland."—Records N. Neth (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 66 (N.Y. State Library).

Claes Cornelis Swits conveys to Mary Adriaens van Adriaen a lease and plantation heretofore in occupation of Master Ficecock and Hans Hansen, situated on the North River of New Netherland near the plantation heretofore occupied by Tonis Nyssen, for the sum of $4,000, calculated at 20 st. to the guilder.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 73 (N.Y. State Library).

A note by the translator adds, "This farm was granted 20 November, 1642 to Thomas Hall, and is described as being bounded North by the plantation of the late Director van Twiller and East by the Cripple bush. It lay on that part of the Island called Greenwich, in the present North Ward of the City of New York."—

"Mo. 1. A Printing house was begun at Cambridge by one Stephen Daye, at the charge of Mr. Glover, who died on sea hitherward. The first thing which was printed was the freemen's Oath; the next was an almanac made for New England by Mr. William Pierce, Mariner; the next was the Psalms newly turned into metre."—Evans' Biblio., I: 2, citing Winstrop's Jour., I: 289, in the library of the Mass. Hist. Soc. The N.Y. Pub. Library owns a copy of this rare Psalm Book (1642). The Daye printing press was the first in the English-speaking colonies of America.

Jacob Stoffelen, of Zieriksee (prov. of Zeeland, Netherlands), describes his visit to Boston in 1643 and the administration of Wouter van Twiller, as overseer of the negroes belonging to the company, who were engaged in building Fort Amsterdam, "which was completed in the year 1615, also in cutting building timber and firewood for the Large House as well as the guardhouse, splitting palisades, clearing land," etc.—N. Y. Col. Desc., XIV: 18.

Gillis Pietersen van der Gouw, a master house-carpenter of New Amsterdam, on this day makes a detailed deposition concerning the numerous building operations during Wouter van Twiller's administration (not in "1639"), as stated in Vol. I, p. 427. For details, see 1635.

The house, indicated on the Manatus Maps (see C. Pl. 44-45, Vol. I, and II: 187-88) as "Een Treffelickey Huy," was erected during Van Twiller's administration, on Bouwery No. 1. It was completed before this date.—N. Y. Col. Desc., XIV: 16.

Later, Stuyvesant's "Petersfeld" was erected on the same site.—Landmark Map Res. Key, III: 352.

Harvard College is founded.—See Addenda.

An ordinance is issued providing that "every Inhabitant of New Netherland, be his state, quality or condition what it may, is forbidden to sell any Guns, Powder or Lead to the Indians, on pain of being punished by Death," and informers against violators are to be rewarded with 500 guilders ($400).—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 19.

Notwithstanding this ordinance, violations continued. Ammunition was sent from New Amsterdam secretly up the Hudson River and elsewhere. The French ambassador lodged a complaint with the lords of the states-general, in which he averred that the French in Canada suffered great injury from this clandestine trade in arms, and the lords of the states-general, in consequence, recommended stringent measures to the authorities of New Netherland to prevent its continuance. The result was another ordinance on the subject, on Feb. 23, 1645.—Ibid., 47.

Director-Gen. Kieft makes an agreement to lease for six years, on behalf of the West India Co., to Jan Cornelissen van Veer, "the Bouwery No. 6 heretofore occupied by Wolphert Gerritsen, situate on the Island of Manhatte, belonging to the... West India Company, Chamber of Amsterdam." The farm contained 374 acres.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 94 (N.Y. State Library).

Frederik Lubbertsen is referred to as "present chief boat- swain on the Island Manhattan."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 94 (N.Y. State Library).

In a power of attorney of this date, mention is made of "Claes Jacoben from Schagen, formerly master workman at Fort Amsterdam; he may have held that post prior to 1635."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 102 (N.Y. State Library).

Claes van Elsland, commissary of provision in New Netherland, gives a power of attorney to his wife, Willemijntte Harbers, "living in Harlem" Holland.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 103 (N.Y. State Library).

An agreement is made between Anthony Jansen, from Vees, May (in Morocco) and Barent Dircksen, baker, for "the purchase of the Bouwery hitherto occupied by Anthony Jansen, situate near Fort Amsterdam, bounded westerly by Hendrick Jansen, tailor, and eastward by Philip de Troy." The sale includes "...the land as it is sowed and fenced, the house and barn, together with all that is fastened by earth and nail, except the cherry trees, pear and all other trees standing on said land, which Anthony Jansen...reserves for himself and will remove at a more seasonable time, one Stiling in two years, one dritte of one year, 1 wagon, plough, and 1 harrow with wooden teeth." Dircksen agrees to pay Jansen 1,570 guilders in 170 years' time.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 104 (N.Y. State Library). On June 7, an inspection made by Secretary Cornelis van Tienhoven with Jansen showed that they "found twelve Apple trees, 40 Peach and 73 cherry trees, 26 sage plants and 15 Vines."—Ibid., 128. On July 27, Jansen gave a satisfaction to Dircksen for the receipt of 680 Carolus guilders as part payment.—Ibid., 125. Regarding Jansen's banishment, see Aug. 5, 1639.

Director-Gen. Kleef leases for a term of six years to Leendert van den Enden and Arentjen's "Bouwery No.3," belonging to the West India Co. and "heretofore occupied by Pieter Bylevelt."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 114 (N.Y. State Library).

O'Callaghan, in a note, says: "The Bouwery mentioned in the above Lease contained Seventy eight Acres (39 morgens). It was

It seems to have been subsequently a part of the De Lanecy farm.—Hoffman. Estate & Rights of New York, III: 242.” Judge Hoffman, however, is in error in this statement about Blyvielt’s Bovvrey (No. 3), subsequently Leandert and known as of Stuyvesants; it all subsequently divided up between the Stuyvesants; and it did not become part of De Lanecy’s estate. Spielman & Brush show the “Leendert Farm” perfectly. See, further, Oct. 19, 1643; and The Manatus Maps, II: 189-89.

8 Director-General Kieft leases to Hendrick Harsemaen the bovvrey No. 5 of the West India Co., “heretofore occupied by Mr. Jacob van Curly, “including the cattle, for a term of six years, beginning on May 1, 1639.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 115 (N. Y. State Library). In a note, O’Callaghan says: “The above Bovvrey contained somewhat over 50 acres. It was situated east of the Bowery and north of Division Street.—Hoffman’s Estate & New York, II: 236.” See also N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 22-33; and The Manatus Maps, II: 188-89.

10 Bancet Dircksen conveys to Gerrit Jansen from Oldenburg and Volkert Evertsen a tobacco plantation, bounded southerly by the plantation of Mr. Fisscop and northerly by that of Mr. Lesley. The purchase price was 1,482 guilders, payable in installments—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 119 (N. Y. State Library). This bovvrey was at the present Christopher St. and Hudson River. See The Manatus Maps, II: 191, and C. Ph. 41, 42, 478, No. 11, Vol. II. On the same day, Dircksen made a contract for a lease to the same parties “of the Bovvrey called Waldersteyn,” for a term of six years.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 118 (N. Y. State Library).

7 In a deposition, undated, but made during the summer of 1639, mention is made of “the path near the Fresh Water.”—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 126 (N. Y. State Library).

16 Evidence of business relations in Holland between Jonas Bronck, first settler of the present Borough of the Bronx, and Andries Huddle, early settler of upper Manhattan, is shown in an acknowledgment of this date, in which Huddle acknowledges the “full satisfaction in the City of Amsterdam long before the executing hereof” of a repayment made by Bronck “arising from loaned or disbursed moneys.”—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 124, 129.

18 Before Secretary Van Tienhoven appears “Mr. Jonas Bronck on the one part and Pieter Andriessen and Lourens Datys on the other part,” who make the following agreement: “Mr. Bronck shall show the abovenamed persons a certain parcel of land belonging to him situate on the mainland opposite the flat of the Manhattes, on which aforesaid land they shall be at liberty to plant Tobacco and Maize, on the express condition that they shall be bound to clear every two years new pieces of land for the planting of Tobacco or Maize, and, on changing the place, the land which they had previously planted shall remain at the disposal of the abovenamed Mr. Bronck.” Whenever they abandon an acreage, it is to be in condition “fit to be plowed and to be sewed with grain for a three-years and no other claim than the cleared land. Bronck also agrees within one year to furnish the lessees with two horses and two cows “on the same conditions as the Company hath at present supplied other free people.” On their part, the lessees covenanted to repay Bronck the said “disbursed moneys.”—“The Fire of Troy (Brand van Tuyen),” namely, Andriessen, fl. 814 and Datys, fl. 2012.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 141 (N. Y. State Library). For location, see Manatus Maps, July II: 204, and C. Ph. 41 and 42, Vol. II.

21 Cornedel van Hoykens (Huyghens) being sent over by the directors at Amsterdam to supersede Ulrich Lupoldt as fiscal of New Netherland, the provincial council votes to appoint Lupoldt as a member of the council and to appoint him commissary (secretary) of New Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 44 (N. Y. State Library).

27 Cornelis van Hoykens is serving as fiscal of New Netherland.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 144 (N. Y. State Library).

9 Nine soldiers having committed mutiny by refusing to work at Fort Amsterdam, two of their ringleaders are by the court declared unworthy and unfit to bear arms, dishonourably discharged, with loss of pay, and sentenced to be transported beyond the seas.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 60. In another mutiny case the court, on Aug. 4, sentenced the defendant to be conveyed the next day to the place of execution, to be there shot to death.—Ibid.

3 George Holmes and seven other Englishmen, settlers in New Netherland, take the oath of allegiance (the original being unaged), as follows: “You swear to be true and faithful to the High and Mighty States, the his Highness of Orange and the Honorable Director and Council of New Netherland, to follow wheresoever the Director, or any member of the Council travels: loyally to give instant notice of any treason and injury to the country that may come to your knowledge; to assist, support and protect by your life and property the inhabitants thereof against all public enemies so truly help you God.”—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 24-25. See 1635.

2 Anthony Jansen, from Salee (also called Vies, or Fizo) in Morocco, appears before Secretary Van Tienhoven with letters, acknowledging “that he being banished from the island of Manhatte and the limits of New Netherland, requested the Honorable Commander Willem Kieft to be pleased to grant him a parcel of land in the bay of the North river of New Netherland in order to support himself there with wife and children.” And Kieft had granted him 100 acres “situate on Long Island about the bay” (Gravesend)—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 148 (N. Y. State Library).

6 Thomas Sanderson, smith, acknowledges having leased to Isaac Abrahamson and Caspar Dircksen, for the term of seven years, beginning “at Easter No 1640, the house and the plantation containing ten morgens, heretofore in the occupation of Evert Foppe.”—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 146 (N. Y. State Library). This was near the Indian village of Werpoes. See grant to Sanderson under 1638.

12 Ulrich Lupoldt is serving as commissary of stores at New Amsterdam.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 159 (N. Y. State Library).

11 Mechanies and labourers in the employ of the West India Co. are not New Amsterdam and are required to begin and end their labours at the ringing of a bell. Gilliss de Voocht is appointed their commissary, or superintendent, “to go around, and to notice those who are in default and report their names” to the director-general and council.—Letter & Ord. N. M., 20.

6 Cornelis van Tienhoven conveys to Coenraet van Crelen (Keulen), of Amsterdam, the bowery on the island of Manhatte heretofore in the possession of Jacob van Coer (Curly), and situate opposite Johannes la Montagne’s bowery, with all the stock, implements, &c. thereunto belonging.—Letter GG: 31 (Albany). This is the “Otter-spoor” tract or plantation, at Van Keulen’s Hook. See 1635: Jan. 24, 1635 1645, and July 1645; also Manatus Maps, III: 105; C. Ph. 41, Vol. II.

6 The deacony of New Netherland loans 50 Carolus guilders Sept. to Pieter van der Linte, at five per cent interest, and Dominie Everardus Bogardus becomes his surety.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 206 (N. Y. State Library).

7 George Holmes and Thomas Nellis make a deposition at the office of the governor and escort the secretary that they intend “to make a plantation and build a house near Deutel bay on the island of Manhatte;” that they have agreed to “jointly bear all the expenses of the building, wages of laborers, and all other implements” needed on the plantation, and to share equally all profits.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 200 (N. Y. State Library). See also Nov. 15, 1635; and Sept. 6, 1640.

7 The deacony of New Netherland makes a loan of 50 Carolus and Hall formed a partnership and contracted "to make a plantation and build a house near Deutel bay." They raised tobacco.

In Sept, 1649, Holmes bought Hall's half interest in the plantation for $1,500 pounds of silver, from the estate of Jacob de Vries. "It is the aim of this man to make two settlements, one on the north side of the river, and the other on the south," wrote the director-general. "He has in mind to build a house, and to plant corn, potatoes, and tobacco." He asked for a continuance of his privileges until 1650, "as he is not yet settled in his business." The governor agreed, and the settlement was extended until Aug. 22, 1650.

"Old Jan Cale" was really an Englishman named John Sealn, as is shown by his autograph attached to a power of attorney of this date, given to Isaac Allerton and witnessed by Thomas Willitt, both from the colony of New Plymouth. In this instrument, Sealn is called "an inhabitant here on the Island of Manah."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 179 (N. Y. State Library).

About this time, Tymen Jansen received a ground-brief (see recital in Liber GG: 91, Albany) for land at Pearl St., between Wall and Pine Sts. (on modern maps). See Castello Plan, II: 339; Pl. 174, Vol. II.

In this year, Jacob van Coopera (van Corler, Curler, or Collar) executed a lease of his plantation at the East River, "with the contiguous hook called, in the Indian language, Nehntan," to Willem Hendrikse and Gysbert Cornelssen.—Cal. Hist. MSS., 14, 22. On Feb. 22, 1649, he deeded this property to Willem Beeckman, and it was confirmed to the latter on Aug. 10, 1667.—Liber Patents, II: 90 (Albany). The land, which had been granted to Van Coopera by Van Twiller and his council before 1648, was about 76 acres in extent, and lay along the East River, mostly between Grand and Stanton Sts., east of Attorney St., including the point called the Hook or Hook.—See Manatus Maps, II: 193; C. Ph., 41, 42, 42a, Vol. II; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 917; and Pl. 175, Vol. III.

nies van vieren) by the provincial council of New Netherland, in Nov., 1649, is preparatory of provisions (on the place of Claes van Elandt, resigned, at a salary of $25 per month and $150 for expenses per annum. On the same day, Skipper David Pietersen de Vries becomes security for Provost, in the sum of 1,500 guilders, "for his fidelity and correct accounts," and another bondman, Domine Bogardus, who signs his name "Theodorus Bogardus," becomes liable for 1,000 guilders.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 56; ibid. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 181 (N. Y. State Library). See also Aug. 23, 1650.

The skipper David Pietersen de Vries leases his plantation and house on Staten Island, for a term of six years, to Thomas Smyth, who binds himself "to clear land sufficient for 2000 palisades,"—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 185 (N. Y. State Library). This plantation was begun only a year before, as De Vries himself states, and he lived for a while, but he was forced to lease it, "as no people had been sent . . . from Hol- land, as was promised . . . to the contrary," which he did and made with Frederick de Vries, a director of the West India Company.—Jameson, Nat. N. Neth., 201, 205.

Acknowledgment is made at the office of the provincial secretary by "Hendric Pietersen from Wessel" of a conveyance to "Adrian Pietersen from Alkmaar of his present plantation situated against the Reed valley beyond Sannician on the island of Manah," including a house. Hendric Pietersen was a Mason.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 184 (N. Y. State Library).

David Provost leases to Thomas Brown, cum servis, "his plantation situate on the Island Manhata, with the dwelling house," for three years. The agreement stipulates that the entire plantation "be fenced at the expense of the Lessor and Lessee," half and half.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 188 (N. Y. State Library).
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

A certificate is given by Tobias Tomasson and Willem Fredericksen, two men who have worked three years "on the bowery called Vredendael," releasing from all claims the owner of the farm, Provincial Councillor Johannes la Mottagine.—Records N. Leth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 192 (N. Y. State Library).

Director-General Kieft issues an order recommending Hudson, from which it is discerned that the ship "den Harinck" arrived at New Amsterdam on July 7, 1649, and the ship "de Engel Gabriel" on Sept. 25, 1659, that both ships are still in port as late as March 14, 1649, laden with goods shipped over to Hudson by "Mr. Henric Hamel, director of the West India Co.—Records N. Leth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 169 (N. Y. State Library).

See also, regarding these ships, Van Reneswier Bever Manuscripts, 452-53, 456-57.

As daily complaints are made of damage and loss by goats and hogs to the cornfields on Manhattan Island, to the great injury of cultivation and serious damage of the West India Co., the council passes an ordinance for penalizing trespasses.—Laws & Ord. N. Leth., 21.

Surgeon Harmen Myndersten van de Bogaert, through power of attorney given to an Amsterdam merchant, seeks to collect from the director at Amsterdam, "money" as he earned in the West India Company's service, "since the 21 March 1630 when he sailed in the ship Eendracht, Jan Brouwer, Skipper, from the Texel, and arrived on the 24th May following here in New Netherland, to the first of February A.D. 1633, as appears by the Book of Monthly Wages that he has."—Records N. Leth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 109 (N. Y. State Library).

Ulrich Lupoldt, commissary of merchandise for the West India Co. in New Netherland, acknowledges having received from his predecessor in office, Wybrant Pietersen, for the behoof of the company, 12,049 guilders, 3 stuivers, 6 pennies, "being the balance of merchandise," that was delivered to him by Pietersen.—Records N. Leth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 196 (N. Y. State Library).

Jan Pietersen van Essenderdt, a ship's surgeon in the employ of the West India Co., being sick abed "at his house in Fort Amsterdam," makes a will, and devises that "all the surgical instruments belonging to him," shall go at his death, to Master Hans Kierssteede, the New Amsterdam surgeon.—Records N. Leth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 199 (N. Y. State Library).

The "Short Parliament" begins; it ended May 5.

An ordinance is passed by Kieft and his council establishing the militia and requiring that every male inhabitant residing at and around Fort Amsterdam shall "provide himself with a good gun," and keep it ready for use. Since they live apart from one another, each man is assigned to a corporal, to whom to report in time of danger. If mischief from enemies or traitors occurs at night, the warning is to be given by the rapid firing of three cannon, if by day, by striking a bell. He who is required "to repair instantly to his corporal at the place appointed."—Laws & Ord. N. Leth., 23, dated May 9, but in Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 71, dated May 10. These are the earliest militia regulations for New Netherland on record.

Phillip de Troy receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 34, Albany) for land near the Smith's Valley. Its location on the modern map would be, approximately, between Pearl, Gold, Fulton, and Ferry Sts. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 947; Pl. 174, Vol. III. This is perhaps the earliest recorded mention of the locality by name in the land records. For first mention, see May 16, 1656.

Olof Stevensen van Cortlandt is appointed commissary of cargoes in New Netherland in place of Jacobus van Curll.—Records N. Leth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 100 (N. Y. State Library). See Sept. 27, 1641.

Kieft's Tobacco War. Van Tienhoven, with a force of soldiers and sailors to punish the Raritan Indians for their depredations upon the property of David Pietersz de Vries and the West India Co. on Staten Island.—De Vries, Notes, in Jameson's Nat. N. Leth., 208, 227; N. Y. T. Col. Docs., I: 159, 198; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 72. This was one of the acts of Kieft's administration that presumably precipitated the Indian war.

The West India Co. exhibits to the states-general a proposed new "Charter of Freedoms and Exemptions" for New Netherland, by which anyone may be acknowledged a patron of New Netherland who plants there a colony of fifty souls, above fifteen years of age, in the space of three years after declaring and giving notice of his intention to do so; and anyone is to be acknowledged a master or colonist who shall remove to New Netherland with fire souls over fifteen years of age. To all of the last named the director-general is to grant in property one hundred morgen, Rhineland measure, of land (200 acres). No such grants, however, are to be made on the "Island Manhatta," for the company reserves this to itself.—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 116, 119.

This treaty is made by 34 Indians, on a piece of land next to that of Tonis Cray, beginning at the little brook called the Old Wreck (Oude water), extending to the land of Claes Sybrantsen de Verilgs, stretching along the East River in its breadth north-east and south-west and from the river into the woods to the foot-path, north-west and south-east, containing in breadth along the beach 3½ leagues and 3½ leagues in space.—Liber GG: 16 (Albany). This grant was conveyed by Vande Linde to Cornelis Conmeggis, June 12, 1658; the latter mortgaged the property, Sept. 1, 1658, to Willem Beeckman; and on March 7, 1665, Beeckman petitioned for the grant of this land, describing it as "about Suuyersen's bowry."—Cal. Hist. MSS., Eng., 241.

Jan Tomasson, "cadet," makes acknowledgment before the provincial secretary that he has leased from Thomas Sanderson, smith, the bowery and house "situate on the Island Manhata, near Wespoe, formerly occupied by Evert Foppe," for a term of five years, beginning on the 1st of November, and an annual rental of 150 guilders.—Records N. Leth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 212 (N. Y. State Library). Wespoe was the name of an Indian village on the shore of and to the north and west of the Fresh Water (Collect Pond)—i.e., on the present map of the city, lying between Flatbush Lk. on the north and the marsh and between Church and Lafayette Sts.—Liber Patents, III: 17 (Albany). See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 957; and Pls. 174 and 175, Vol. III. Wespoe became part of the Bayard farm, for which see map of the farm lands, Vol. V.

Farm and house servants are commanded by ordinance to serve out their time according to their contracts. Harbouring those that run away is penalized by a fine of 50 guilders, to be divided equally between the informer, the fund for the new church, and the fiscal.—Laws & Ord. N. Leth., 24.

David Prouvoost, commissary of provisions, on account of irregularities, is dismissed from his office, and Mauritius Jansen, formerly assistant, is named in his stead.—Records N. Leth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 75 (N. Y. State Library). See also, regarding Prouvoost's appointment, Jan. 5, 1650.

Before Secretaries Van Tienhoven appear "Monteagle Johannes la Montausagne and Sieur Andries Hude as husband and guardian of Gertrude Bornstra, widow of the late Hendrick de Forest deceased, who conjointly acknowledge to have amicably agreed and arranged on the 12th July A.D. 1650 respecting the purchasing bowery and goods and chattels lying on the Island of Manhate, named Vredenialde, left by the late Hendrick de Forest, right of the West India Co., with all the buildings which Hudson, in quality as foresaid, may in any wise claim." They request a legal instrument releasing one another from any future claims.—Records N. Leth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 216 (N. Y. State Library). Vredenialde was at Harlem. See also July 20, 1650.

George Baxter and Walter Harfouts receive a ground-brief for a piece of land "on the Island of Manhattan, extending in breadth between the two creeks where the water ripples over the stones and the tree lies over the creeks, and this with the same breadth westward both the creeks into the woods."—Liber GG: 41 (Albany).

Thomas Hall makes acknowledgment of having sold to George Holmes "the hall of the house and plantation situate by the Deutel [Turtle] bay," including "the furniture therein, except a boat, gun and dog which Thomas Hall reserves." The price is 1,600 pounds of tobacco "payable from the crop which George shall make A.D. 1641, and the remainder of the field remaining to pay their joint debts." Until the payment is made, Hall is "at liberty to eat, drink, sleep, go and come to" the house of Holmes. A postscript adds: "George Homs has paid to D' Kieft this 1,600 pounds of Tobacco."—Records N. Leth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 274 (N. Y. State Library). See also Sept. 7, and Nov. 15, 1649.

philipus Jacobus van Curll, carrying the title of "Willem Hendriessen and Gysbert Cornelissen, tailor, and Thomas" his plantation, "situate on the Island Manhata on the East river with the hook called, in the Indian language, Netchame, lying contiguous to said plantation" for a term of three years from Jan. 1, 1641. The lessee is to "pay annually "living costs, and the loss of the hook aforesaid," and also to "keep in proper repair at their own expense, the house and all dependencies" of the plantation.
they make improvements or build a tobacco house, these will, upon expiration of the lease, be quitclaimed to the Cornehs to the "southside of the plantation" for himself, in case he returns from Holland while the lease is in operation.—
Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), I: 219 (N. Y. State Library). This planting, containing about 76 acres, lay along the East River from Houston St. around Corleer's Hook.—See The Missionary and the Sea, p. 143.

The inventory of the estate of Hendrick de Forest, made for his widow, Gertrude Bornstra, amounts, net, to 984 guilders "over and above all reciprocal debts." Johannes de Montaigne now acknowledges a satisfaction of his share, received from "Sier Andries Huys, husband and guardian" to the dowry, to whom she has been married.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan), I: 217.

The "Long Parliament" begins its end March, 1660.

The inhabitants are notified by proclamation that the prices of goods in the West India Company’s public store at New Amst, terdam have been fixed at 57% advance (over cost), net; that a price list is affixed to a board in the store, and, if overcharged, report thereof is to be made to the council.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 74.

Director Gen. Kieft makes a lease for three years to Thomas Broun [Brown], David Davidsen [Davidsoj], Ralph Cardel, and Pieter Breley, of "a certain parcel of land situated on the Island Melyn [Angola]." Cripples, which belong to the Honble Elias de Raet and Mr. Conraet van Coelen, both residing at Amsterdam." The conditions are: to plant tobacco, and pay to Kieft for the owners’ account 200 pounds of cured tobacco annually as a rental. Kieft agrees for the owners that a tobacco house, to be called the "Netherland," and a Cripplshus shall be made of "as much Dutch grain as can be sown in the ground."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan’s trans.), I: 229 (N. Y. State Library).

For location of Bestevaer’s Crippleshun, see Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 905.

— Cornelis Melyn arrived in this year in New Netherland, in the ship "Den Eyckenboom" (The Oaktree), and settled on Staten Island with 41 colonists. They began to build houses immediately, to plough, and to do everything toward the establishment of a good colony, sparing neither money nor work.—Melya’s “Remonstrance in Melyn Papers, N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1917), XLVI: 109-16. Speaking of the Indian troubles of 1643, Melyn said his houses, farms, and everything else, were consumed by fire, and his cattle, as well as some of his people, slain, and he, his wife and children forced to flee for their lives and to reside at Manhattan until 1647. He added that, as a result of the troubles of the Eight Years, the French, with Stuyvesant, he (Melyn) and Jochem Pietersen Kuyter were banished by Stuyvesant, and both "departed for Fatherland from New Netherland with the ship The Princess Ameha (de princes Amadila) in company with Director Willem Kieft."—Ibid. This ship was named for the Princess Ameha (Amalia von Solms), wife of Frederick Hendrick, stadtholder of The Netherlands. See also Sept. 27, 1647.

murdered. Several of the negro slaves of the company were implicated in the murder at a court session of the provincial council on Jan. 17. They admitted killing him in common, and the court, being unable to determine which one actually gave the death blow, therefore, required that they draw lots, to determine which one of their number should be hanged in expiation of the crime. The lot fell, "by God’s direction," on Manuel de Grettot (de Reys of Van Rensselaer Besier MSS., 802), called the Giant. He was led to the gibbet, on the 24th of this month. The foreground was turned, the negro, tied to a strong rope placed on the gibbet, and the rope parted. The commonalty who witnessed these operations called out for mercy with great earliness; whereupon Manuel was granted his life and pardoned, together with all of the other implicated negroes, subject to future good behaviour and a willing service.

with the military punishment, or owes its origin to the proximity of his own} underground, and the instrument upon which military offenders were made to do penance, cannot be positively determined. The irregular plot on which his tavern stood was granted to him by Director-Gen. Kieft, on July 15, 1643 (q.b.).—Liber Pertar., II: 164 (in office of sec. of state, Albany). This grant is recited in a confirmation to Kieft, by Carl testers, Jan or Jean, on Feb. 14, 1668, by Gov. Nicolls. —Ibid. No mention of the tavern is made in this recital of the original patent to Gerardy, or in the ground-brief of Aug. 7, 1645, from Kieft to Adam Roelantsen, who was Gerardy’s next-door neighbour.—Liber GG: 86 (in N. Y. State Library, Albany). The earliest tavern sign in the name of "the sign of the wooden horse" hangs out, i.e. at the sign of the wooden horse, being a cakehouse (Koekhuyt).—Conuymeries, Liber A: 164 (in register’s office, N. Y. City). The sign was removed to a house next door on the east, at No. 8 Stone St. Here Maria Pollet, the widow of Gerardy, kept the tavern. She was a sister of an Englishman named Fee (in cf. ibid., III: 313), and she continued the business in 1668.—Ibid. VII: 142, 150. Maria de Vos (as she then was, having married in 1666 the notary, Mattheus de Vos) died in 1668; her son, by Gerardy, sold the house on Jan. 26, 1672, to Capt. Thomas Delavall.—Liber Doods, II: 185 (New York); cf. Both of Records of Deeds & Grants (exc. 1665-1672 translated), 205-6. The building of the N. Y. Produce Exchange now covers both sites of the Wooden Horse.

Hendrick Jansen, tailor, acknowledges an agreement for the purchase of his house, barn, barrick, hereditaments, and arable land, by Mary Adrianaesi, delivery to be made in May, 1642, and Jansen reserving to himself "the brewhouse and two brew-kettles," which he agrees to remove at his convenience. The purchase price is 2,000 Carolus guilder, payable in three installments, the first on taking possession.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 256 (N. Y. State Library). The location is not known, but it may have been on a plantation somewhere up Manhattan Island.

Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 76, 77; N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 837, 845; De Vries, Notes in Jenner’s Nat. Neth., 213, 214. The board was dissolved peremptorily on Feb. 8, 1642.—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 203. “The Twelve Men, and afterwards [1642] the Eight had in court matters neither vote nor advice; but were chosen in view of the war [the Indian wars of 1642 and 1643] and some other occurrences, where they received no consideration and were little respected if they opposed at all the views of the Director.”—Representation N. Neth., in Jenner’s Nat. Neth., 233. This is often called the beginning of representative government in New York.

On this day, for the first time, shipping is recorded as anchored in "the road that a horse may go through."—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 269, 272 (N. Y. State Library). See Manatus Maps, Vol. II, for its location.

Lourens Cornelissen receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 45; Albany) for land at Pearl and Liberty Sts. (on modern maps). See April 14, 1643; Pl. 174, Vol. III.

Because lately some people were murdered on Staten Island by Indians, the provincial council now votes to protect the remaining residents against further trouble, by the erection on that island of a little redoubt, at the least possible cost.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch), I: 101; N. Y. Min. Reg., 3, 41. Because of the Indian wars the government had decided to expend a little money in the erection of a fort or house, and to take a mortgage and mortgage his "house and plantation situation on the Island of Manhattan," no doubt meaning his Colsera’s Hook property.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s translation), I: 276 (N. Y. State Library).

The council had by its council that "there shall be held annually at Fort Amsterdam a Cattle Fair on the 4th of October, and a fair for Hogs on the 1st of November," so that whoever “hath any thing to sell or to buy can regulate himself accordingly.”—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 29. It is unlikely that the cattle and hogs were exhibited and sold within the fort during the fairs that were held under this ordinance. It is probable that the transactions took place in the open space outside of the fort and between it and the company’s stores. Regular markets were not yet established, and "Markvelts," or the Marketfield, was yet unknown in the topographical nomenclature of New Amsterdam. Cf. De Vries, Market Book, 17, 28-29, 55-56. See also Castello Plan (Redraft), II: 341-45.

Director-Gen. Kieft makes a contract for a lease to Hendrick Pietersen from Hasselt of "a certain piece of (maitie) land situate on Manhattan Island, on the Highway where Jan Damen is next adjoining on the South, and Everardus Bogardus on the North." Kieft agreed to direct hires at the expense of the West India Co., "a barn fifty feet long and 20 feet while with an entrance, and a barric of four rods." The lease is for eight years, commencing on May 1, 1642, at a rental of one third the yield of the soil.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 230 (N. Y. State Library). This plantation was identical with the "old Company’s Bounny," or the later “King’s Farm," and lay between the Bogardus and Anneke Jans farm and the farm of Jan Jansen Damen. On modern lines, the leased farm was bounded north by a line from the Hudson River (then at Greenwich St.) to Broadway, running from a point a little north of Warren St., at the river to a point at the south corner of Broadway and Chambers St.; the eastern boundary was Broadway; the southern boundary was Fulton St., and the western boundary was the river.—See Landmark Map, Pl. 174, Vol. III.

Director-Gen. Kieft certifies to a contract for a lease to Thomas Johnson of the plantation out of Monthly wages at the expense of the West India Co., "a barn of good as good as the Donatje’s [Bogardus] fifty feet long," which, at the expiration of the lease, shall revert to the owner of the plantation, and toward the cost of which 100 guilders and the nails are to be contributed by the owner.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), I: 281 (N. Y. State Library). This plantation lay some miles to the south, on the Greenwich Road, south-west of Greenwich Lane.—See Manatus Maps, C. 16, pp. 190-91, Vol. II.

The Grand Remonstrance is presented by the English parliament to King Charles I.

About the beginning of this year, the West India Co. completed the city tavern (Stadts Herberg), and opened it to the public. — De Vries, Notes, in Jameson’s Nar. N. Neth., 212; Innes, New Am. and Its People, 176. It stood on what is now the northwest corner of Pearl St. (Nos. 71–73) and Contains Alley, originally facing the Fan River, and became, in 1671 (q.v.), the city hall (Stadt Huys). The first lessee was Philip Gerritsen, who rented it from Director-General Kieft, on Feb. 17, 1643, for a term of six years, beginning with Jan. 1, 1642, at 500 guilders per annum, with the right to retake the company’s wine and brandy, on which he was allowed a profit of six stuivers per can. A well and a brewhouse were also to be built behind the tavern. — Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 21: Rec. N. Am., I: 49; Innes, op. cit., 178. This building was for a long time used by the city, and remained its property until Aug. 17, 1699 (q.v.), when the authorities sold it, and the land belonging to it, to John Rodman. — Liber A. 254 (in comptroller’s office, N. Y. City). It was at the time of its demolition early in the spring of 1700, as is shown by a complaint lodged by a neighbour against Rodman “for intending to pull down a party wall between her house and the city hall.” — Cal. Crown. Min., 145. By Oct. 19, 1700, the building was done and had been replaced by another. — Liber A. See also Feb. 6, 1653; and Landmarks Map Ref. Key, III: 973.

Ill feeling between the Indians and the Dutch was increased by the murder of Gerrit Janse, a servant of the lord of Nederhoorder at Hackensack, by a drunken native. The Indians refused to give up the murderer, as he was the son of a sachem, offering, however, 100 or 200 fathom of wampum to the widow of the dead man. Several Indians were said to have been killed in revenge of this murder. — De Vries, Notes, in Jameson’s Nar. N. Neth., 215–16: Broad Advice (Murphy, 1854), 147.

About this year, Cornelis Dirckzen was established as ferry-man on Long Island, the landing on the Long Island side being at the foot of the present Fulton Street, Brooklyn. For his ferry on the Manhattan Island side, see 1658. See also Jan. 24, 1653.

The four church-wardsen of New Amsterdam were Director-General Kieft, Capt. David Pietersen de Vries, Jochem Pietersen Kuyt, and Jan Jansen Dammen. — Jameson, Nar. N. Neth., 312.

About this year, Jan Stevenson became schoolmaster. — See Addenda.

Feb.

Jan Teunissens, house carpenter, acknowledges having entered into a contract with Adam Roebantten, from Dockum, first schoolmaster of New Amsterdam, for the building and building a house “thirty feet long, eighteen feet wide, eight feet story under the beams, the end cross-beams strengthened with brackets all square, the house enclosed all around with clapboards, and covered with a good red roof, such as shall be proper, a close ceiling of clapboards, 3 transom windows, two outer [doors], one portal, one pantry, one bedstead, an enclosed [staircase] to ascend to the gar- ret, to make the chimney [outside] above of wood with a mantel-piece, a passage way three feet wide with the partition.” This Teunissens agrees to complete by Aug. 1, 1642, at a cost of 350 Carolus guilders, Holland value. — Records N. Beth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 7 (N. Y. State Library).

The twelve men whom the commonalty have chosen to give their advice concerning the murder of Claes Cornelissen Swit, the wheelwright (see Aug. 29, 1641), are commanded by Director-General Kieft to “hold no further meeting, as the same tends to a dangerous consequence, and to the great injury both of the country and of our [Kieft’s] authority.” They are not to assemble except by “express order” from Kieft, “on pain of being punished as disobedient subjects.” — N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 205. This first prorogation of the first popular representative body in New Netherland proved to be its virtual dissolution.

The East India Co. acknowledges a contract made with Nicholaes Willem Bout (or Boedt) for building a house 32 feet long, and 18 feet wide, “provided that the land which the Governor of New Netherland hath granted to Bout, ‘whereof the aforesaid house is to be built,’ is to be divided by parties on the first of October A.D. 1642.” The land was a tobacco plantation. — Records N. Beth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 8, 9, 97. See Addenda.

John Ogden, Pieter Pieneman, and Cornelis Leendertse receive from the director and council a bill of sale or grant of a house and land near the outlet of the fresh water hill at the East River, and adjoining the land of Cornelis van Tienhoven, whose palisades extend from the Huereweg (Broadway) to the East River. — Liber Pat. 47 (Albany). According to modern streets, the land was bounded north-westly on Park Row from about the corner of Pearl St. to the corner of Frankfort St.; and from that point southerly along Nassau St., to a point a little south of Ann St.; thence along the south side of Ann St. to a point east of Gold St.; then on a circular course, so as to exclude the “Swamp” and De Tracy’s grant, to the corner of Ferry and Cliff Sts.; thence along Ferry St. to the East River, and along the river shore, now almost on the line of Pearl and Cherry Sts., to the mouth of the outlet of the Fresh Water at Catharine St.; and thence along the course of the stream, between Catharine and Royston Sts. to the place of beginning. See Landmarks Map, Pl. 174, Vol. III.

An import duty of ten per cent is imposed on all goods entered Apr. in New Netherland, if no tariff has been paid before in Holland. — Brazil, Guiana, or the West Indies, and an export duty as authorized by the List set forth in 1641, was also paid to “the Receiver of the Company’s revenues, or whomsoever shall be appointed thereto.” — Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 31.

Jan Francen, a soldier of the garrison of Fort Amsterdam, was deposed that while he stood on guard as a sentinel at the fort on April 3, he “saw Abraham Planck tear down the Plackard which was posted on the gate of the fort, as he Planck was going out of the fort.” — Records N. Beth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 16 (N. Y. State Library). On May 22, Planck was fined 300 guilders. — Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 80. Perhaps the ordinance was the one that had been promulgated and posted on April 3, imposing certain duties on imports and exports. — Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 31.

On account of the number of fugitive servants that come to New Netherland daily from New England and Virginia, carrying “their passports under foot,” an ordinance is passed forbidding the harbouring of strangers for more than one night, “without first notifying the Director and having their names recorded,” so that it may be known “what sort of people are here, and whence they come.” — Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 32. This ordinance was renewed, June 13, 1643. — Ibid., 52.

During the administration of Director-General Kieft a new stone church was erected in the city, extending from the north to the south. — *De Vries, Notes, in Jameson’s Nar. N. Neth., 212–13: Representation of N. Neth., in ibid., 252–26.* The church occupied almost one fourth of the space in the fort. — N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 333. See A.

The contract for building it read as follows:

“Appeared before me, Cornelis Van Tienhoven, Secretary in behalf of the general privileged West India Company in New Netherland, the Honourable William Kieft, church-warden, at the request of his brethren, the church-wardens of the church in New Netherland, to transact and in their name to conclude the following business. So did he, as church-warden, agree with John Ogden about a church in the following manner, viz.: —

*John Ogden of Stamford, and Ritsert [Richard] Ogden, engage to build in behalf of said church-wardens a church of rock-stone, seventy-two feet long, fifty-two feet broad, and sixteen feet high above the soil, all in good order, and in a workman-like manner. They shall be obliged to procure the stone, and bring it on shore near the feet at their own expense, from whence the church wardens shall further convey the stone to the place where it is intended to build the church, at their own expense. The church wardens aforesaid will procure as much lime as shall be required for the building of the aforesaid church. John and Ritsert [Rich- ard] Ogden shall at their own charge pay for the masonry &c., provided that when the work shall be finished the church wardens shall pay to them the sum of 2500 gl., which payment shall be made in heavier, cash, or merchandise, to wit—if the church wardens are satisfied with the work, so that in their judgment the 2500 gl. shall have been earned, then the said church-wardens 1662 shall reward them with 100 gl. more; and further promise to John Ogden and Ritsert [Richard] Ogden to assist them whenever they are in their power. They further agree to facilitate the carrying the stone thither, and that John and Ritsert [Richard] Ogden may underwrite the city, the city of six weeks' wages, or build-inging themselves and the aforesaid John and Ritsert [Richard] Ogden to finish the undertaken work in the manner as they contracted. Done in Fort Amsterdam, in New Netherland. [Signed] Willem Kieft, John Ogden, Richard Ogden, Gysbert op Dyck, Thomas Chamber and Murray the trans., in N. Y. Hist. Soc.
O’Callaghan’s translation, in Records N. Neth., III: 18 (N. Y. State Library), is quite different.

The church was roofed in 1643 (Breden Raets, Murphy’s trans., in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections, 24 ser., II: 264) with shingles of hewn oak, which, from exposure to wind and rain, turned blue and looked like slate (De Vries, Notes in Jameson’s Nar. Neth., 213). The Montanus (PL No. 6, Vol. I) and earlier views of New Amsterdam show this roof with two peaks and a steeple between them, but this arrangement seems to have been altered in 1672 (g.v.); the “Restitutio Viti” (Ph. Nos. 8 and 16, Vol. I) shows only one peak, with the steeple. See also PI. 5, Vol. I.
The church, in Nov., 1647, was still unfinished (Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 114; Lans. MSS., N. Y., 69; but Stuyvesant took up its completion and repair in 1847-8 [representation of N. Neth., in Jameson, op. cit., 330].

The money for this church was given by Kieft, on behalf of the West India Co., and by the people in voluntary contributions.
See A. —Ibid., 326. De Vries, Notes, in ibid., 212. In 1650 it was said that it “cost much more than eight thousand guilders wherefor it cannot be proved that the people paid eight hundred; the collect-tion taken up by subscription, hath realized the least;” because a “subscription list was signed which amounteth to 1800. The accounts of most of the subscribers were debited accordingly, but they have not yet [1650] paid the money.”—N. Y. Col. Docs., III: 399, 472.

A Dutch inscription was placed upon the church, of which the English translation is as follows: “1642, Willem Kieft, being Director-General, the congregation caused this church to be built.”
—representation of N. Neth., in Jameson, op. cit., 326. The stone which bore this inscription was found, in 1799, by workmen who were leveling Fort George (Daily Adv., June 23, 1799), and was preserved in the Garden Street Dutch Church until 1853 (g.v.), when it perished in the fire which destroyed that edifice (Corwin, Manual Rep. on Am. in Am., 42d ed., 42). It was a stone precipitously covered with shingles. Some time prior to 1672, the shingles had been replaced with tiles. In 1672, the city allowed 300 guilders for removing the tile roof and replacing the shingles, because the tiles had become broken by the concussion of the firing of the cannon at the fort. In 1799-80, when the Labor-dis put the church on a new basis and the church had a

In 1693, Gov. Fletcher had the King’s Chapel in the fort pulled down, because it was so dilapidated as to be a menace to life and limb.—Jour. Leg. Coun., of N. Y., II: 42; see also 1693.
Plans for building a new chapel were being considered in Oct., 1694 (ibid., 65-66); and the monastery seems to have been completed by the beginning of 1695. On March 5, of that year, Derick Van-denburgh, mason and bricklayer, petitioned for £52,414 1/2, payment for erecting a chapel and other buildings in and about Fort William Henry.—Col. Hist. MSS., Leg., 524. As late as April, 1696, Fletcher urged the completion of the chapel.—Jour. Leg.
Coun., I (1861): 89. This edifice was destroyed by fire on March 18, 1741 (g.v.)—Ibid., 760; N. Y. Col. Docs., VI: 184, 185.

6 Thomas Chambers, an English carpenter, contracts to build in eight weeks’ time, for Jan Jansen Schepmoe, “a house 30 feet long and 20 feet wide,” at a compensation of 116 guilders and board.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 17, op. cit.

The following record under this date is made in the “Register of the Chamber and the Directors of the Chamber in Amsterdam:”
“The Directors of the Incorporated West India Company at the Chamber in Amsterdam have granted and allowed, and do hereby grant and allow, to Wouter van Twiller, late Director in New Netherland, that the said Wouter Twiller shall not have to pay to the Company the six sheaves as the stipulated rent of the Company’s bouwery situate on the Island of the Manhattans in New Netherland,” under the bouwery, planted lands, the first of September 1695, and the meadow lands, the middle of November 1695, when the said bouwery shall return and be delivered up to the Company, and the Leeceet during the lease keep the house, harric and barn in good and proper repair. . . .

Before Secretary Van Tienhoven, on this day “Annijtie Jans, widow of the late Roulloff Jansen from Masterland, and present wife of Everardus Bogardus Minister here, with the [Hoo]v[le] Willem Kieft, director general of New Netherland and Mr. Johannes La Montango [sic] her chosen guardians herein, who declared that she, in the month of March A5 1658, previous to, and before that the Annijtie Jans had entered into the marriage state with her present abovementioned husband, had agreed with the people of the state children which the aforesaid Roulloff Jansen had in his lifetime preounced by her, respecting their share of their deceased father’s estate, which aforesaid contract was drawn up and written by the late secretary Hulse, and is at present not to be found in the old Books, Papers or Registers. Wherefore for the security of the aforesaid children and Annijtie Jans abovementioned, she hath caused this instrument to be drawn up as a supplement to the aforegoing contract, and in case the latter happen to be discovered elsewhere, she . . . holds it as valid and of no less force than the present.” The five children are named, with their ages, between five and sixteen years. In this mentioned contract is included clothing, feeding, etc. of the minor children, and for their education it states, “to keep them at school, to let them learn reading, writing and a good trade.”—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s

Andries Hudden (or Huddie) is appointed surveyor of New Bouwery in Kieft and his council, at an annual salary of 200 florins. On Oct. 16, Hudden asked the council for an “acte,” as surveyor; whereupon the council noted that he could charge three guilders per day and also two stuivers per morgen for exped-

Through “warrens, drawing of knives and fighting, and the multitude of Taverns and low Groggeries, badly conducted,” many accidents happen daily, to prevent which an ordinance is passed forbidding anybody to “presume to draw a knife much less to woun dany person, under the penalty of £5, to be paid immediately, or, in default, to work three months with the Negros in chains;
this, without any respect of persons.”—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 33.

Ulrich Klein makes a declaration before the provincial secretary “that he deliberately purchased from Adam Roelantzen lodging, with the garden adjoining thereto.”—Records N. Neth.

Barent Dircksen, baker, leases to Bout Fransen “the bouwery called Walsteyn,” together with the cattle, for a term of six years.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 26 (N. Y.

present Christopher St. and the Hudson River.—See Manatus Maps, II: 191.

This is the date in common acceptance for the beginning of the Civil War in England between the royal and parliamentary party. 224-225. For the first overprinted map of the Sept. standard of Charles I was raised at Nottingham, “summoning 1642. One of the points which the West India Co. considers, as shown Sept. in the Resolutionbook, is "in what manner a solid and sufficient 15 foundation shall be determined on regarding the places in New Netherland, concerning the freedom and population of the same, and generally in what manner the aforesaid conquest shall be visited in ships and the claims of the States General are confirmed.

20 Mary Adriaensens conveys to Jan Jansen dam land in the Smith’s Valley which he derived from Hendrick Jansen, tailor, by a deed of Jan. 4, 1642, following upon a bill of sale of Aug. 27, 1641.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 33 (N. Y. State Lib.).

Oct. As the court has suffered from much loss of time, occasioned 16 by the default of defendants, an ordinance is passed, prescribing a fine of six stivers for the first, a fine of 12 stivers for the second, and condemnation for the third default.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 34.

30 A resolution is passed by the director-general and council providing for assisting newly arrived settlers; otherwise, it is believed "the country will come to nought, and the people remain in a miserable condition."—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 83; N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 100.

Nov. A man named Hael (Halle) receives a grant of land lying on the North River, formerly occupied by Edward Finck, Hans Hansen, and Mary Adriaensens (having been owners), bounded on the north by the plantation of former Director Wouter van Twiller and Laurens Dircksen, baker, and eastward by the swamp.—Liber GG: 55 (Albany).

36 Jan Pietersen and Abraham Rycken receive a ground-brief for one lot, at the north-west corner of Bridge and Broad Sts.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. I, and I: 385.

42 Hendrick Jansen, tailor, sells to Willem Adriaenssen, cooper, "his garden, dwelling and brewhouse... and the dependences of it... for 2,000 Carolus guilders, payable in three instalments.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 37 (N. Y. State Library).

Dec. Jeriaen Hendricksen, from Osnabrugge, makes acknowledgment 6 before the provincial secretary that he has undertaken "to build for the Honourable William Kieft, director general of New Netherland... a house at the Otterspool [Otter’s track]... the house to be one hundred feet long... fifty feet wide, tapering off to a breadth of twenty feet within the posts, with passages running throughout, one nine and the other ten feet wide, one front room fifty feet long, twenty feet wide, with one large cellar, a double chimney, all which shall be of brick, wherein he, Jeriaen Hendricksen, shall make and by the cellar and garret beams of plank necessary thereto, together with the window and door frames, and whatsoever else shall be necessary for the aforesaid building." The contract price is 600 Carolus guilders and board.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 39 (N. Y. State Library). The location mentioned was in Harlem.—See Manatus Maps, 194–95, Vol II; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 967. See Addenda.

11 George Baxter is appointed, provisionally, by Kieft, as English secretary for New Netherland, on account of "the great number of English who come daily to reside here under us" and the "numerous law suits and their consequences" which require such service. His salary is to be 250 fl. per annum.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 41. He was reappointed by Stuyvesant, on June 28, 1647.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 110.

—Father Isaac Jogues, the Jesuit missionary who visited New Amsterdam in this year, wrote, in 1646, a description of this visit:

"...New Holland, which the Dutch call in Latin Novum Belgium—in their own language, New Netherland, that is to say, New Low Countries—is situated between Virginia and New England. The mouth of the river, which some people call Nassau, or the Great North River, to distinguish it from another which they call the South River, and which I think is called Maurice River on some maps, has lately been seen, is at 40 deg. 30 min. The channel is deep, fit for the largest ships, which ascend to Manhattles Island, which is seven leagues in circuit, and on which there is a fort to serve as the commencement of a town to be built here, and to be called New Amsterdam.

"This fort, which is at the point of the island, about five or six leagues from the [river’s] mouth, is called Fort Amsterdam; it has four regular forts and garrisons, provided with several pieces of artillery. All these bastions and the curtains were, in 1643, merely inclosures, most of which had crumbled away, so that one entered the fort on all sides. There were no ditches. For the garnison of the said fort, and another which they had built still further up against the incursions of the savages, their enemies, there were sixty soldiers. They were able to defend it, if first, the gates and bastions with stone. Within the fort there was a pretty large stone church, the house of the Governor, whom they call Director General, quite neatly built of brick, the storehouses and barracks.

"On the island of Manhattan, and in its environs, there may well be four or five hundred men of different sects and nations: the Director General told me that there were men of eighteen different languages; they are scattered here and there on the river, above and below, as the beauty and convenience of the spot has invited each to settle: some mechanics however, who ply their trade, are ranged under the fort; all the others are exposed to the incursions of the natives, who in the year 1643, while I was there, actually killed some two score Hollanders, and burnt many houses and barns full of wheat.

"The river, which is very straight, and runs due north and south, is at least a league broad before the fort. Ships lie at anchor in a bay which forms the other side of the island, and can be defended by the fort.

"Shortly before I arrived there, three large ships of 300 tons each had come to load wheat; two found cargoes, the third could not be loaded, because the savages had burnt a part of the grain. These ships had come from the West Indies, where the West India Company usually keeps up seventeen ships of war.

"No religion is publicly exercised but the Calvinist, and orders are to admit none but Calvinists, but this is not observed; for besides the Calvinists there are in the colony Catholics, English, Puritans, Lutherans, here called Adriaensen’s [Nethermenns], etc. [In two previous letters (Jameson, 314 et seq.), Jogues refers to Roman Catholics and to the confessional on Manhattan Island.]

"When any one comes to settle in the country, they lend him houses, cows, etc.; they give him provisions, all which he returns as soon as he is at ease; and as to the land, after ten years he pays to the West India Company the tenth of the produce which he reaps."

Probably from this year dates the view of "New Amsterdam" reproduced and described in Vol. I, PL. 5. This view is the only one known showing the church in the fort before the addition of the clock or bell. In the exception of the Hunting’s View (PL. 1, Vol. I) it is the earliest known engraved view of New York.

The church in the fort, begun in 1642 (see May, 1642), was 16 roofed in this year (Bredren-Raad, etc., in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collec- tions, 1857, p. 261), at which time a belfry was evidently added.

At different times between the years 1643 and 1647 patents for land were given to emancipated negroes who had been slaves of the West India Co. in New Netherland. These grants centered about the Fresh Water (Kolck) and the public waggon-road, i.e., west of the Bowery and between Canal St. and Astor Pl. This seems to have been the first quarter for free negroes established on Manhattan Island. For their earlier quarter as slaves, see 1649. Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 365, 369, 370, 372, 374; Hoffman, Estates and Rights of the Corporation of the City of N. Y., II: 191, diagram no. 6.

In the year 1643, the Republic of New Haven was formed by the union of the towns of New Haven, Milford, Guilford, and Stamford.

"Thomas Hall, tobacco planter," makes acknowledgment of a debt to Mary Adriaensen of 1,000 Carolus guilders, "being for the purchase of the plantations situated on the Island of Manhattan on the North River, heretofore cultivated by Hans Hans- sen," payment of 12 guilders, "in the event the said debt and security is given by "Francis Lasley and John Sealls," Englishmen.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 43 (Albany).

Cornelis Dircksen, also called Cornelis Dircksen Hoogblatt, 24 sells to Willem Tomassen, pilot of the yacht "Pauwe" (Pawnee), his house and garden on Lower Is., "together with the [Brooklyn] Ferry for his, Cornelis’s service. One, subject 1643, to the approbation of the Honble Director" (Kieft).—Records of Jan. N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 44 (N. Y. State Library).

24 N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 42. See 1648 for Dircksen's ferry on Manhattan Island. It is not known how long Dircksen had been ferryman at the Brooklyn reef, but it must have begun in 1646, if not earlier. See Stites, Hist. of Brooklyn, I: 35.

Feb. On account of an Indian war, begun by certain armed Malianins from the neighbourhood of Fort Orange (Albany), who sought tribute from the navages of Wickquas-geek and Tapana and of the adjacent villages, many of the latter fled to the Dutch on or near Manhattan Island. [Mor. N. Neth., 235-36; Jour. of N. Neth., in ibid., 277.] These were among the Indians attacked at Pavana and Corliss's Hook, on Feb. 25-26 (9:0).

17 Philip Gerritsen, from Hierlern, Holland, makes a contract with Director Gen. Kieft, in the presence of the provincial secretary, "for the hire of the Company's house" or city tavern (present Pearl St. and Counties Alley), for a term of six years from Jan. 1, 1642, at a rental to the West India Co. of 500 guilders per annum, and delivery of "the Company's wines to the lessees "so far as he will be able to retain them," for which he is to have "a profit of six stivers" per quart, except for French wine, which is to yield "no more than four stivers;" also, no wines are to be sold by retail in the company's cellars, or to make or cause a beehouse to be put up in the rear, or to give the use of the Company's beehouse. The lessee signs his name "Philipus Gerritsem." An appendix to the instrument states: "On the first of January Amlo 1647, this contract has been extended for six years with Adrian Gerritsen who married the widow of the late Philip Gerritsem, so that the lease terminates on the first of January, 1653."—Records of N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 45 (N. Y. State Library).

From the Revoluciov of the West India Co., this record is taken: It was still found that New Netherland costs much to the Company and up to now has produced but little profit, and that the throwing open of the trade to the said place has not the desired effect, as was expected, because many go there to trade without establishing a residence, on account of which the population does not increase there, but the trade is greatly diminished; therefore, the question is submitted to the members if it be not proper to put the domestic trade there in the hands of the local inhabitants; and for the purpose of increasing the numbers and to encourage the people and the culture of land, fruits, and fisheries there, whether it is not necessary to encourage the inhabitants, who engage themselves to keep open the trades there, to put in an election in behalf of the Company, and vice versa from Brazil again to New Netherland.—Records of old West India Co., No. 24, XX, fol. 71, in National Archives at The Hague.

25 Maryn Adriaensen having been commissioned by Director Gen. Kieft to attack a party of Indians behind Corliss's Hook, on Manhattan Island, and Sergeant Juriaen Rodolfi to attack another party at Pavana, N. J. (Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 85; N. T. Col. Docs., I: 194; XIII: 10-11), these attacks are made simultaneously, about midnight (Feb. 23-24). About forty Indians are massacred in their sleep at Corliss's Hook, and about eighty at Pavana.—Breden Kruizd, in Doc. Hist. N. Y. (4th ed.), IV: 66, or Murphy's ed. (1854), 148-49; D. Vries, Notes, in Jameson's Nar. Neth., 227-28; Jour. N. Neth., in ibid., 279. When the affiliated Indians (see Feb., 1643) awoke to a realization of this treachery, they retaliated themselves by killing many men on the farm lands, and devastated the outlying districts by burning "houses, farms, barns, stacks of grain," in fact everything they could lay waste and so "they began an open and destructive war."—Broad Advice, Murphy's ed. (1854), 150. This war lasted until the general peace concluded at Fort Amsterdam on Mar. 25-26.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 85; N. T. Col. Docs., XIII: 18.

27 On account of the precipitated Indian war, Kieft and his council pass a resolution for enlisting a number of planters, "in order to put a bit in the mouth of the heathen."—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 85; N. T. Col. Docs., XIII: 11-12.

Mar. By a resolution of the director-general and council, a day of general fasting and prayer was appointed for this day, in consequence of the war precipitated with the Indians.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 85; N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 44.

Maryn Adriaensen enters the room of Director Gen. Kieft "with predetermined purpose to murder him," but is prevented and put in prison. By May 27, Jan. Jameson's Nar. N. Neth., 278; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 85. About an hour after the arrest of Adriaensen, his servant, Jacob Slagh, and another, "came to the Fort, where the Director was walking up and down," and Slagh fired two shots at Kieft, who was recessing into the door of his house thereupon a sentry shot Slagh dead. Hence, "within an hour and a half," Kieft's life was twice in danger.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 12-13.

Proclamation is made at Fort Amsterdam that peace has been concluded with the Long Island Indians.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 44-45. The circumstances that led to this peace are given by D. Vries.—Jameson's Nar. N. Neth., 239-32.

Because large quantities of intoxicants are sold daily to the Indians, "where serious difficulties" have arisen, and further complaints are apprehended, the director and the council order "all Tappers and other inhabitants, from now forth forth, not to sell, directly or indirectly, by themselves or others, any liquors to Indiana's. Violation of this interdict to be penalised by fines and otherwise. — Laws. & Ord. N. Neths. 34.

18 None the less, an illicit traffic was carried on with the Indians. The fine of 25 florins for a first offence was raised to 300 gilders by a renewal of the ordinance, on Nov. 21, 1645, double for a second offense, and trebled from the country, etc. — Ibid., p. 22. Still the traffic continued, and in another order against it, of July 1, 1647, it was sought to overcome the evasion that had been practised by persons conveying liquors surreptitiously from hand to hand to the Indians.—Ibid., p. 64. In the regulations for taverns issued by the mayor and his council of the city — the selling, bartering, or giving away of intoxicants to Indians was made punishable by forfeiture of the taverns and arbitrary correction.— Ibid., p. 95.

Notwithstanding this, it was plainly evident from the number of Indians who were seen every day "running drunk along the Manhattan" that the previous ordinances were unheeded. On May 13, 1648 (q.v.), there was added to the fines "an arbitrary corporal punishment" upon those who offended, because it was deemed better "that such evil disposed persons be punished than that a whole country and people should suffer in consequence of their actions." The mayor and his council of the city then, as now, appear to have been quite arbitrary in deciding the violations, though the evidences of their violations were, as Stuyvesant and the council declared, observable "by the deplorable experience" of seeing many "Indians" daily "drunk and fuddled," and committed in this state "many grave acts of violence" (Stevensen), the same many ordinances of the city of Amsterdam. The gravity of the situation inspired a new ordinance, of Aug. 28, 1654 (q.v.), which added to former provisions a prohibition against supplying strong drink to natives "on the Rivers, Streams and Kills, out of Shops or in any manner or by any means." But many, drunken Indians were to be arrested and imprisoned until not only known from whom they had obtained intoxicants. — Ibid., 182-3.

The very dangerous, injurious and damnable sale went on space, so that on Oct. 26, 1656 (q.v.), a more detailed ordinance was promulgated by the council, which provided that "no person shall sell or dispose of any intoxicants or distilled Spiritu; or give, furnish or carry or allow to be carried, to or for any Indians, in or out of the house, by land or water, from Yachts, Bars, Boats, or Canoes, Carts or Wagons, by what name soever such vehicles may be called, either directly or indirectly, any Beer, Wine, distilled Spirits or Liquors, under a penalty of Fifty hundred gilders, and in addition to be arbitrarily punished on the body, and banished from the country." Also, "all superior and inferior officers, free or hired servants of the company, and inhabitants of the province were to be, by their office and fealty, informers of violations or, failing this, to be adjudged participes criminis, subject to the same punishment as the principal offender."— Ibid., 456-467. The order was renewed, on June 13, 1667 (q.v.), with provisions for having proper entry made of all liquors taken on board of the vessels.—Ibid., p. 311. It was again renewed among the general consolidated ordinances of April 9, 1658 (q.v.).—Ibid., p. 345.

It appears, from an ordinance of July 19, 1662 (q.v.), that the sale of intoxicants to Indians was "for some time now more prevalent than ever before." The edicts were disregarded and Stuyvesant and his council found themselves unable to cope with the situation. Therefore, they empowered the inferior courts to issue, in each village and jurisdiction, such orders as were deemed to be "best and most proper for the suppression of that scandalous traffic," "to destroy, give, furnish or carry or allow to be carried, to or for any Indians, in or out of the house, by land or water, from Yachts, Bars, Boats, or Canoes, Carts or Wagons, by what name soever such vehicles may be called, either directly or indirectly, any Beer, Wine, distilled Spirits or Liquors, under a penalty of Fifty hundred gilders, and in addition to be arbitrarily punished on the body, and banished from the country." Also, "all superior and inferior officers, free or hired servants of the company, and inhabitants of the province were to be, by their office and fealty, informers of violations or, failing this, to be adjudged participes criminis, subject to the same punishment as the principal offender."—Ibid., 456-467. A few months later, on Dec. 31, the last ordinance of Stuyvesant and the council on this subject was issued. It provided for the arrest and fine of Indians who were found drunk on Sundays.—Ibid., p. 452.

Prior to this date, which is that of a ground-brief to Evert Duyckingh made for a parcel of land by Willem van Breeck, ibid., p. 239-246, a house for the country's negroes, which had been erected upon a plot of ground covered by the present Nos. 32 and 34 South William St., it was demolished about 1662.— Liber Deeds, B: 31 Deeds & Conveyances, 1699-1664, trans. by O'Callaghan, 294-95. On this land, a horse-mill was erected sometime before 1667.—Book of Records of Deeds & Transfers, 1665-1672 (translated), 114-116; Liber Deeds, B: 173, 200 (New York); If. Book of Records of Deeds & Transfers, 1665-1672 (translated), 227-228. The mill was here in 1677, as appears by an entry in the M. C. G., I: 58. It is referred to as late as 1824 in an original deed in possession of the Title Guarantee & Trust Co.—See Castello Plan, II: 237-238; C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and III: 257-258; Map of Dutch Grants, II: 375; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 987; Pl. 174, Vol. III. See also Oct. 15, 1667.

Andries Rouloffs, chief boatwain, has charge of the weights and scales in the warehouse of the West India Co. at New Amsterdam. — See N. V. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 63 (N. Y. State Library).

Tymen Jansen receives a ground-brief for a piece of land between William and Wall Sts., Exchange Pl., and Pearl St.; a large tract, intersected by the present Beaver St. On this land now stand the National City Bank, the Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. building, and many similar structures of the financial district.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and III: 409.

Jan Stevensens, the schoolmaster, is granted a ground-brief for a lot, for his house and garden, on the west side of Broadway, now covered by the Bowling Green building.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and III: 376. For reproduction, see Pl. 7, Vol. IV.

Touchay (Toussaint) Briel receives a ground-brief for a piece of land, containing 12 morgens, 330 rods, by the Great Crippe-bush (swamp), between the land of the negroes and that of Thomas Stuyvesant (see Deeds, 269-270), according to the ground-brief of July 3, 1667, recorded on the western shore of the Cooks River, on the east of the New York Great Western Canal, and near the south shore of the present borough of the City of New York;— Liber GG: 77 (Albany); Liber Patents, III: 79 (Albany). This ground-brief was reissued, Oct. 19, 1665.— Liber GG: 124 (Albany).

Roelof Jansen Haere receives a ground-brief for the lot now covered by the building at No. 25 Beaver St.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and III: 371.

Catelina Antony, widow of Joichim Antony, negro, receives a ground-brief for a piece of land "lying north of the wagon-road, extending along said wagon-road south-west, 66 rods, to the land of Domingo Antony; reserving both a common wagon-road next to (or along) the said Domingo's land, to the land of Thomas Sanderson, the smith, north-west-by-west, 60 rods, and further to the aforesaid wagon-road, being the place of beginning, along the land of the said Anderson's, amounting to four morgens and 90 rods."— Liber GG: 81 (Albany). According to modern streets, this land lay west of The Bowery, near Canal St.

Dumeningo Antony, negro, receives a ground-brief for a piece of land containing five morgens and situated 505 rods beyond the Bowery No. 5, "extending from about the wagon-road west by north to the Fresh Water on the Cripple-bush, the land of Thomas Sanderson, north 50 rods, and next to the land of Thomas Sanderson to the aforesaid Cripple-bush, 20 rods."— Liber GG: 80 (Albany). This land was west of The Bowery, north of Pell St.

Philip Gerardy receives a ground-brief for a lot on Stone St., near the corner of Whitehall St., the site of which is now covered by the building of the New York Produce Exchange.—See Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82, 82a, Vol. II, and III: 239-240; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and III: 376.

Cornelis Vulkens receives a ground-brief for a double lot on Broadway, which site is now covered by the northern part of the Exchange Court building, the bed of Exchange Pl., and the southerly part of the Knickerbocker Trust Company's building.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and III: 376.

Rutger Arentsen Van Seyl receives a ground-brief for a lot on the east side of Broadway, south of Exchange Pl., which is now covered by the southern portion of the Exchange Court building.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and III: 370.

Adam Roelantsen receives a ground-brief for a lot on Stone Aug. St., near the corner of Whitehall St., the site of which is now An infernal peace having been concluded with the Indians, in May of this year, which was broken by Indian depredations along the Hudson River begun by the Wappingers during the summer (Jour. N. Neth., in Jameson's Nar. N. Neth., 275-79; N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 190-91), and Director-General Kieft having summoned the commonalty to choose representatives to advise with him in the matter, the commissioners appointed eight men: Jochem Pietersen Kuyter, Jan Jansen Damen, Barent Dircksen, Abraham Pietersen, Isaac Allerton, Thomas Hall, Gerrit Wolpertschen (van Couwenhoven), and Cornelis Melyn. As Jan Jansen Damen is considered objectionable by the seven others, they protest unanimously against his selection, and choose his son Everert Beut in his stead—but not without a counter protest from Damen. This body composed the board of "Eight Men."

—N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 185, 191-93, 212; XIII: 16; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 86; Jour. N. Neth., in Jameson, 275. On Nov. 3, they signed a memorial to the states-general, in which they deplored the policy of Jan van der Heyken, "make pacific, with wives and little ones that still survive, in poverty together, in and around the fort at the Manahatas, where we are not safe even for an hour."—N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 139: "Fort Amsterdam, utterly defenceless," stands "open to the enemy night and day."—Ibid., 139. The "Eight Men" drew up "some good and suitable regulations; forbidding taverns and all other improprieties; appointed a week's preaching instead . . . but it was not executed by the officer. These eight men, aforesaid, were never called together again on public business, from the 4th November, 1643, to the 18th June, 1644; though in that period many things occurred. It was, indeed, sufficiently manifest how little were these Eight men respected, for no sooner did they open their mouths to propose anything tending in their judgment to the public good, than the Director met them with sundry biting and scoffing taunts; and sometimes had them summoned, without asking them a question, thus obliging them to return amidst jeers and sneers, as wise as they went."—Ibid., 212; Repres. N. Neth., in Jameson, op. cit., 313.

The "Eight Men" resolve to renew hostilities against the Indians, except those of Long Island (who are to be encouraged as allies), and to enlist as many men as possible.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 86; N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 16: Fifty Englishmen were enrolled under the command of Capt. John Underhill, who took the oath of fidelity on Sept. 29.—Ibid., 86; Broedhead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 366.

These Eight were discharged, on Oct. 30, before the provincial secretary, "that they, the aforesaid, being commanded by the Hon.ble Director, Willem Kieft, to defend the Colonie of Acharter's Col [ibid infra], their strength being five soldiers, a very heavy attack was made on the house in the Indians in the night between the seventeenth and eighteenth of September." They continued: "We, the aforesaid, being five strong soldiers, five boys and one man who resided in the Colonie, defended ourselves until the Indians set the house, in which we were obliged to defend ourselves, on fire over our heads, wherefore, we were forced to abandon the house in consequence of the heat, and succeeded with great difficulty in saving cattle, bringing with us the prowling enemy that was there only our firearms."—Records N. Neth., (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 85. "Achter 't Col" referred to Newark Bay and the country beyond. The last Director of Acher Col consisted of the towns of Elizabethtown, Woodbridge, Shrewsbury, Newark, Picquiscaw, and Middlebrough. N. J. —N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 124; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 507. See C. Pls. 41 and 42, Vol. II.

The "Eight Men" send a letter to the "Assembly of the XIX." of the West India Co., praying for help, in which they write: "On the Island of the Manahatas [sic], from the north even unto the Fort, there are no more than five or six spots inhabited at this date. They are threatened by the Indians every night with fire, and by day with the slaughter of both people and cattle. . . . The Fort is defenceless and entirely out of order, and resembles (with submission) rather a modell than a fort against an enemy . . . they [the Indians] have removed all their Oct., women, children and old men into the interior, the rest of the more expert warriors hanging daily on our nets, with fire and sword, and threaten to destroy the Fort, which consists of about 1500 men; this we hourly expect, for all the outside places are mostly in their power. It is owing entirely to their pleasure if any cattle are found alive throughout the entire country . . . The population is composed mainly of women and children and the free male, exclusive of the English, are about 200 strong, who must protect by force their families now skulking in straw huts outside the Fort; the cattle are partly burnt and killed, what remains has been conveyed to the Fort on the Manahatas, where for want of food they must starve this Old Jan's plantation had driven with a good the cattle into the said marsh, so that the cattle sunk into it over their backs, and inasmuch as the cattle were strong and well in flesh, they finally got through the swamp."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 90 (N. Y. State Library). "Old Jan's Land" lay, generally speaking, with reference to the modern plan, between Hudson and Macquolou, Spring and King Sts.—See Pl. 175, Vol. III.

Harck Sybesen acknowledges before the provincial secretary the sale to Barent Dircksen of "his house and lot . . . as the same is situated and computed . . . lying on the Island of Manahatas, near Fort Amsterdam," for 175 guilders "and a half barrel of beer as a treat for the company."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 89 (N. Y. State Library).

Cornels Jansen Coelen impowers Kieft and his council "to remove all the property which may yet remain in the Colonie Achter 't Col [see Sept. 17-18], and to take the same under their care until further notice."—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 86; N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 16. On the 26th, "Philippe du Tryeux" (or de Tracy), the court messenger, attached, "in the name of Joannes Winkelceman," the power of attorney granted by Coen to Kieft and the council, in behalf of Meyndert Meyndertsen van Kerem and himself, and also his authority, leaving however that the Council, which is still under subject to the Company & the power of attorney aforesaid."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 86, 91 (N. Y. State Library).

Pieter Cock and Rouloff Jansen depose before the provincial secretary: "at the request of Cornels Jansen Coelen . . . that after the Colonie Achter 't Col had been burnt by the Indians" (see Sept. 17), there was "no opportunity to go or sail thither to examine the condition of the place, in consequence of the multitude of Indians who burn and kill all what they can find in the woods, on water or elsewhere."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 107 (N. Y. State Library).

After the Indian depredation in the Colonie Achter 't Col in September (p. 1), Meyndert Meyndertsen van Kerem's agent, Joannes Winkelceman, lodged the refugees at the city tavern of New Amsterdam, conducted by Philip Gerritzen. Winkelceman now acknowledges an indebtedness to Gerritzen of 172 guilders, four stuivers, to "be paid by Mist' the proprietors of the Colonie Achter 't Col, or from the effects thereof." On Nov. 27, Gerritzen gave power of attorney to Willem Tuck to collect this sum "from Meyndert Meyndertsen van Kerem or the Patroons of the Colonie."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 89, 92 (N. Y. State Library).

Abraham Jacobsen van Steenwyck receives a ground-brief for a lot, now the site of Nos. 31 and 31 Bridge St.—See Map of Dutch Giants, C. Pl. 89, Vol. II, and II: 382.
Regulations for the burgier guard are made by ordinance, providing fines for offences of profanity, drunkenness, discharging a gun or musket without orders from the corporals, etc.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 35.

Manuel Trompetter, a free negro, receives a ground-brief (Libert Patents, II: 137, Albany) for a piece of land on the east of that of Antony Puttgarden.

Maryck, a free "negrique" (negress), widow of Lawrence, a negro, receives a ground-brief (Libert Patents, II: 128, Albany) for a piece of land to the west of Swager's land, stretching next to that of Antony Puttgarden.

William Castell, in his book printed in this year, gives the following account of New Netherland: "Between these Nations [the Sequinni and Novas] and the Mataracons, who live by fishing, there lieth an Archipelagius, wherein are many Islands: On the north-side of the Dutch Plantation springeth the river Machicham, called the great North River, which running through one of the widest parts of that part of the continent, as yet discovered, afforded convenient habitation for the Aquamachies, and the Manahots on the east-side. For the Sasanchans and Tappans on the west-side. Neare of this great River, the Dutch have built a fort, and have planted plantations not only for the convenience of the natives adjoining, but likewise for their more free trading with many of Florida, who usually come down the River Canada, and so by land to them. A plaine prooe, Canada is not far remote."—A Short Discoverie of the Coasts and Continent of America (London, 1644), 25 Oct.

A fight takes place on the bank of the East River in front of Melyn's house (present Pearl and Broad Sts.), between "Hans Hendrich from Trease in Holstein" and Jacob Hendricks, from Dort. Hans (a servant of Jochem Pietersen Kuyter) is stabbed by Jacob during the brawl, in which both use knives, driving one amongst the river "up to the knees." Hans was so badly wounded that he was put to bed "at the house of Adana Roelantsen, from Dockum," where his will was drawn in the presence of the provincial secretary.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 93 (N. Y. State Library).

Hendrick Jansen, a tailor, receives a ground-brief for a large tract of land running from the present Stone St. to Beaver St., and covering part of William St. and Hanover Sq., the site of which is now covered by the New York Cotton Exchange.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 399.

Pieter vande Linde makes the following deposition before the provincial secretary, at the request of Barret Dircksen and others: "That he, yesterday [36th] was out shooting deer on the Island of Manhattan; having done nothing he returned to his plantation where he heard a shot in the woods, whereupon he resolved to go thither and there found snow tracks of 2 persons, which he followed and found at Jan Bout, son of Jochem Bout, knighthood, of that island, who gave his arms but not out of the other." It is also brought out at the hearing that a pose which had followed the footsteps was "led to the threshold of the house" of Thomas Atkinis.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 96 (N. Y. State Library).

Kiet and the council complain to Andries Roodfoffsen, chief burgier, that the West India Company's property is being greatly neglected by him; they command him to do his duty, "that all equipments be properly made," and "that all vessels be in good order." Apparently on the same day, Kiet and the council address Tyzen Jansen, the ship carpenter, as follows: "Whereas complaints are daily made to us that you do not properly repair the vessels, and that the Skippers must navigate for a year and a day among the rest, the yachts Amsterdam and Prince Willem, [so] that they cannot keep anything dry in the cabin, in consequence of which the yachts suffer great damage which can be prevented by a little labor, therefore we do charge you herein to perform your bounden duty, so that the Company may not suffer loss and you be free from blame." Jansen replies that he is doing the best he can, but cannot "know when a vessel is leaky, unless those in charge of her inform him of the fact;" also "that nothing can be effected without means."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 97 (N. Y. State Library).

Trynstie Jonas receives a ground-brief for a lot, the site of which, with the surrounding lots, is now covered by the Battery Park Building, Nos. 21-24 State St.—See Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82, 82c, Vol. II, and II: 269-705 Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 57, Feb. Vol. II, and II: 356.

Tyzen Jansen, the ship carpenter of the company at New Amsterdam (see Jan 28), furnishes testimony from the skippers of the vessels "Prince Willem," "Amsterdam," "St. Martin," and the "Vreeze," in defence of his services. They declare "that during our skippership he hath worked on our boats and Yachts and afforded all necessary assistance, but he was sometimes in want of materials."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III 98 (N. Y. State Library).

Certain negroes, named, who have been slaves in the service of the West India Co. for 18 or 19 years, are granted conditional freedom, with their wives, "on condition of their service to another Free people here in New Netherland, where they shall be able to earn their livelihood by Agriculture, on the land shown and granted to them." But their children, born or yet to be born, are to be slaves of the company.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 36-37; see also the manumission of another negro, on Sept. 27, 1646, ibid., 60.

Depositions were made on Nov. 19, 1644, before Secretary Van Tienhoven, by Sergeant Martin Ael and Abraham Nieuman, a soldier, at the request of Director-General Kieritz, regarding the complete destruction by fire of incendiary origin, on March 5, of Jochem Pietersen Kuyter's Harlem farm called Zegenland (Vol. III: 96, No. 215). Kuyter's house, burning, was "that which his servants stood sentry." They had in number four soldiers and five farm servants, two of whom were threshers, and the owner had gone to the Hanovers, having taken with him two soldiers.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 135 (N. Y. State Library); N. P. Cal. Doc., XIV: 55-55.

Jan Evertsen Bout, Claes Jansen, and others, who understand the Indian language, deposes that on this day they "heard an Indian named Ponkes say in the Indian language . . . that the Indians, our enemies, did not burn Jochem Pietersen's house, and that he never heard any Indian say so, who, when they had done any mischief, he, boasted of it, but that nothing was better known among the Indians than that the Dutch themselves had burnt the aforesaid house, and removed through dread of being killed there." Ponkes was "an Indian of Marschelikuck," who was with the hostile Indians during the Indian war.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 142 (N. Y. State Library).

Nicholas Coorn, Hans Kiersted, and others deposes that while they, the minister, and their wives, were, on the evening of the 15th, at the "Stadt Herberg," conducted by Philip Gerritzen, who had invited them to sup with him, Capt. John Underhill, Lieut. George Baxter, and other Englishmen, made an outrageous attack on the party.—Cal. Hist. Miss., Dutch, 27. For the details of this fracas, see Innes, New Am. and Its People, 180-81.

Roger Williams obtains a patent for Rhode Island. 1647

Thomas Badgworth is referred to as a "planter on the Island of Manhattan, in the bread-loaves, knight, with full power and authority of the Collector of London, in Old England;" he pledges in payment of a debt his tavern called The Kings Head standing in Bishopsgate street, London.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 105.

A contract is recorded at the office of the provincial secretary by the appearance of Thomas Hall and Thomas Goodman, who acknowledged to have contracted to set up for Jan Damen 250 rods of posts and rails, "to be set so close and tight that hogs, goats or other cattle shall not pass through; all good and strong work which must be completed before May. Jan Damen must transport the posts and rails from the Strand out of Juffrouw's valley [Maiden Lane] or therabouts, to the place where they are to be set up. In addition to the transportation Jan Damen shall pay for every rod aforesaid 35 shillings in the pay at present current in Netherland."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 106 (N. Y. State Library). See also April 25, for Damen's farm.

Because the Indians daily commit much damage, both to men and cattle, and there is a great suspicion that the Dutch Christians, who go to look for stray cattle, may be lost, Director-General Kiet and the council decree that there shall be constructed a "Fence, Palisade [failing], or Clearing [enclosure], beginning from the Great Bouwery to Emanuel's plantation;" and every one who owns cattle and desires to pasture them in this enclosure, is warned to repair thither with tools on Monday morning, April 4, at seven o'clock, to aid in constructing this fence.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 37; Records N. Neth., IV: 186 (N. Y. State Library). "Emanuel's

Hendrick Jansen Smith receives a ground-brief for a house and garden. This land was in the interior of the block now bounded by Exchange Pl. on the north, Beaver St. on the south, Broadway on the west, and New St. on the east; it lay in the southern portion of this lot, just north of the old fort and on the old Beaver St.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, and p. 368, Vol. II.

Cornelis van Tienhoven receives a ground-brief (recited in Liber Patents, II: 113, Albany), which, by modern streets, would be bounded between Broadway and the East River (now Pearl St.); on the partly cultivated, partly occupied land of Ann St. at Broadway, farther eastward, along the south line of Ann St. and by Maiden Lane on the south. Part of this tract later became the “Shoemakers’ Land,” for which see Pl. 24-a, Vol. I, and 2: 216-38.

An excise on liquors and beer is prescribed by ordinance, to raise means for continuing the soldiers in service, made necessary by the Indian war, and to provide protection in harvesting, “for neither grain, nor hay can be cut without Soldiers.”—Laws & Ord. N. Y., 50-53; N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 188-89. The ordinance also prescribed the fines for the violation of this law. See also to order a further excise on August 4.—Laws & Ord. N. Y. Neth., 40-41. On the latter date, William de Key was appointed receiver of the excise.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 96. In August, the brewers of New Amsterdam were charged in court with delinquency. In July 1721, the Court of Adm’rs, of the city (1721, 1722), held that if they paid the excise voluntarily they would have the “Eight Men” and the commonality “about their ears.”—Ibid., 90.

In a deposition, Tryntje Jonas is called “middle” of New Nether- land.—Records N. Y. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 118 (N. Y. State Library). She was so called on Nov. 26, 1673 (Q. 5).

Jannite, wife of Tomas Broen, mortgaged “to Mr. Isaac Aller-ton her house standing on the Island of Manhattan by Fort Amster-dam, and occupied by Pieter Piu,” until such time as “Tomas Broen has repaid to Allerton 209 guilders and 15 stuivers,” as appears by the Note.”—Records N. Y. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 121 (N. Y. State Library). This was the property subsequently known as No. 1 Broadway. See also August 25.

“Geertje Nannincx,” widow of “the late Abel Reddinaum,” Aug. 2
acknowledges sale and makes conveyance to Cornelis Melyn of her house and lot situate on the East River near the Fort, where he Melyn alspina westwardly and Borger Jonisen easterly,” for the sum of 200 Carolus guilders.—Records N. Y. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 121 (N. Y. State Library).

In Marriage Records of Ref. Dutch Ch. (Purple), 11, the name of the husband is given as Oen Reddenhasen. See also Van Rensselaer Beveri Manuscripts, 836; and Min. of the becoming the owner, 14. The marriage took place Nov. 17, 1671, 836: 14.

Thomas Broen receives a ground-brief for a lot, now No. 1 Broadway. This property, the site of one of the best known colonial residences on Manhattan—the Kennedy house—passed by the deed, the date of which has not been ascertained, to Gerrit Douman, and from him, on May 15, 1648, to Pieter Cock.

After Cock’s death, Gov. Nicolls confirmed the land to his widow Annatie, Feb. 13, 1668 (Liber Patents, II: 166, Albany). Broen erected the first house on this site.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 29.

On May 31, 1714, Charles Sleigh and Annatie, his wife, sold the property to Abraham de Peyster (Liber Deeds, XXIV: 242-46, New York). While there is no evidence in the records as to how the Sleighs gained possession of the lot, it is supposed that Annatie Sleigh was a descendant of Annatie Cock. De Peyster sold the corner, Aug. 26, 1756 (q. v.), to Archibald Kennedy, the receiver-general, for $600. At that time, the land had “several small gardens, gardens, and meadows, and a great opening upon it,” facing Battery Pl. Kennedy also became possessed of the land in rear of this plot, ex-tending to the North River. Some time after 1756, and before 1760, Kennedy built, on the corner, the handsome residence long known as No. 1 Broadway.

On the early days of the Revolution, the house was occupied by Washington, and during the British occupation by Sir Henry Clinton, Sir Guy Carleton, and Sir William Howe.—Kemble, Journal in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1883), 82, 143. Later, the house was occupied as a young ladies’ boarding-school, as a select boarding-house, and as a private residence.
It remained in the Kennedy family until 1839, when it was sold by Robert Kennedy to Nathaniel Prime, the merchant and banker. Prime's heirs later leased the property to Jonas Barett, a hotel-keeper, and it became known as "The Washington" and the Washington Hotel. In 1881, it became the property of Cyrus W. Field, who demolished it in 1882 and erected upon its site the Washington building.—See Cantell Plats, C. Pl. 82, 82v, Vol. II, and III: Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: III 319. Peter Cornelissen (Timmerman, i.e., Carpenter) receives a ground-brief for a lot on the east side of Broadway, about 145 feet north from the corner of Beaver St. The building of the Standard Oil Co. now occupies this lot.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 38.

Peter Jansen, from Gorcum, receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house and garden, on the east side of Broadway, about 125 feet north from the corner of Beaver St. The building of the Standard Oil Co. now occupies this lot.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 38.

Richard Jacobsen, Roy, gunner, receives a ground-brief for a lot between what would now be Pearl and Bridge Sts., east of State St., now covered in part by the Battery Park building and in part by the Maritime building.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 38.

Hendrick Jansen, tailor, conveys to Burgert Jorissen "the house situated on the Island of Manhattan, and the garden (the garden from the house to the brookhouse and the appurtenances which are at present in use in the brewery," for 1,500 Carolus gulden in three installments.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 124 (N. Y. State Library).

The Jesuit missionary, Father Francis Joseph Bressani, is given safe conduct by Director-General Kieft, by slip sailing from New Amsterdam for Europe.—O'Callaghan, Hist. N. Neth., I: 337. For fuller particulars relating to Bressani's departure, see the accounts of the Negro traders, in the following years, yearly, for 69 persons. The salary of the director-general is 5,000 florins, and he is "to board himself"; that of the factor and receiver, 1,410 florins of the fiscal, the secretary, and the commissary of merchandise and store goods, each 720 florins; that of one clergyman, and one corporal, acting as assistant and sexton, 360 florins; of the military establishment, over 10,000 florins; besides other persons.—N.Y. Col. Docs., I: 125-56. Of 1696.

Symon Congoe, a free negro, receives a ground-brief (Liber Patents, I: 129, Albany) for a piece of land to the west of the land belonging to Jan Celes ("Old Jan"). Later part of Trinity Church land near Richmond Hill.—See Liber Deeds, II: 452 (New York).

Gratia Dangola (d'Angola), a free negro, receives a ground-brief (Liber Patents, I: 131, Albany) for a piece of land later included in Trinity Church's upper farm, near Richmond Hill.

Groot Manuel, a free negro, receives a ground-brief (Liber Patents, I: 126, Albany) for a plot of ground between the land of Manuel Trompetter and that of Swager. See also Oct. 19, 1645.

Paulo Dangola, a free negro, receives a ground-brief (Liber Patents, I: 130, Albany) for a certain piece of land which probably later was included in the Bayard farm.

Clyn Antonio, a free negro, receives a ground-brief (Liber Patents, I: 130, Albany) for a piece of land, probably part of that which later became Trinity Church's upper farm.

In or about this year, Cornelis Aertsen received a ground-brief, not found of record, but recited in Liber Deeds, II: 164 (New York).

In relation to the modern streets, the land was bounded on the west by Montgomery St., between the East River and Division St.; on the north, by a line running from the intersection of Division and Montgomery Sts. obliquely to the middle of Henry St., midway between Scammel and Jackson Sts.; on the east, by a line running from the above-mentioned point, between Scammel and Jackson Sts., to the river; and on the south, by the river. The river shore, in 1645, lay, generally speaking, along the line of the present Water St.—See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 946; Pl. 175, Vol. III.

Thomas Willett "sells to Cornelis Tenens from Gorcum... a lot and house situate on the Island of Manhattan, adjoining the Public Tavern" (present Pearl Street and Coenties Alley), for 775 guilders.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 153 (N. Y. State Library).

Cornelis Groesens receives a ground-brief (recited in Records N. Neth., III: 33, Albany) for land situated (on the modern city plan) between Rector and Thames Sts., west of Broadway, including Trinity churchyard, and extending from Broadway as far as St. John's Park (now Greenwich Ave.) and a strip of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 319. Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 947; Pl. 174, Vol. III.

Cornelis Groesens receives a ground-brief (recited in Liber...
Deeds, A: 11, New York) for a lot, the location of which on the present city plan is at the north-east corner of Broadway and Hanover Sq.—See Castello Plan, C. I: 321; Map of Dutch Grants,

4. Teunis Janissen ("sailmaker") receives a ground bri e, later, through error, the same lot was granted to Jerzyzen Blank (April 15, 1647), but the mistake was rectified. The lot was at the present No. 20 Pearl St.—See Frontispiece, Vol. I,

5. Thomas Willet (1640 after 1651) receives a ground bri e for a lot lying towards the East River, on the north side of Pearl St., running eastward from Coenties Alley, Nos. 75 to 89 Pearl St. now covering the land granted. The widow of Willett was married to Charles Bridges, who was confirmed in this property June 11, 1667.—See and II: 404.

Teunis Tomassien from Naarden receives a ground-bri e for a lot for a house and garden, lying on the east side of the present Whitall St., about 100 ft. south from the line of Markf eld St.
The land is now entirely built over by the Produce Exchange.— council with the warring Indians. There come this day "to the Fort Amsterdam before the director and council, in presence of the whole community, sachems or chiefs of the savages, in their own behalf and as attorneys for the neighboring chiefs,—to wit, Ora-tamy, chief of Achkinehokwy (Hudson's) and chiefs of the Tappan, Rechawawannec (Haverstraw), Pacham, and other Hudson River tribes. The treaty is concluded "in the Fort under the blue canopy of heaven in presence of the Council of New Netherland and the whole community called together, also in presence of the Mosquas (Mohawks) ambassadors," who have been asked to attend the negotiations as mediators, and with these as co-mediator has come also their interpreter, Cornelis Antonissen.—N. Y. Col.

Docs., XIII: 18. The court messenger previously notified all of the inhabitants to assemble in the fort, at the hoisting of colours and ringing of bell, to hear the proposals for peace read, and if any one had good advice to offer to the director-general and council, it was to be given freely at the meeting.—Cal. Hist., N.Y., Dutch.

Oloff Stevenson van Cortlandt receives a ground-bri e for a lot on the island of New York, now No. 11-15 Stone St.—See Castello Plan, C. I, Vol. II, and II: 251-52; Map of Dutch Grants,

On this grant he later erected an extensive Brewery and other buildings.

Isaac de Forest receives a ground-bri e for a certain lot of land for a house and garden in the block between Beaver and Stone Sts., Whitehall and Broad Sts., the ground being now principally covered by the building and court of the Produce Exchange.—See

Jan Snelder receives a ground-bri e for one lot for a house and garden on the north side of Beaver St., west of Broadway. Part of the Welles building now covers this lot, and part of the lot lies in the bed of New St.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. I, Vol.
II, and II: 369.

By a proclamation of Aug. 31, this day was set apart as a day of general thanksgiving throughout New Netherland, in con-

Leendert Aerdien receives a ground-bri e for a house and garden lying on the east side of Broadway, where now stands the building of the Union Fruit Company (60 Broadway).—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and 30.

Jochim Calder receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house and garden, now No. 33 Stone St. and included in the site of the Curtis building.—See Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82, 82e, Vol. II, and III: 397; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 401.

Harry Poets receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house and garden, between the present Whitehall, Beaver, Stone and Broad Sts., it is now covered by the building of the Produce Exchange.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, and p. 175, Vol. II.

In the Resolution beck (resolution book) of the West India Co. this record is found: "Petrus Stuyvesant, appointed Director of New Netherland, is to purchase personally the services of he intends to go to Amsterdam under recommendation that this Chamber (meaning the Zealand chamber) be pleased to expedite the equipment to the aforesaid New Netherland, in connection with the resolution at the last meeting of the Assembly of the Nineteen. He was answered, that the gentlemen delegated to the front in the five stone workshops of the West India Co., was divided into five grant-lots. These lots faced the later Marksveldt (Whitehall St.), and covered the block from Brouwer (Stone) Street to Brugh (Bridge) Street, creating a narrow lane on the east, called Winkel Street, between them and the workshops of the company. The northernmost lot, bounded by the corner of Bowery Street, was granted to Isaac de Forest, on May 12, 1646, and by him was conveyed to Joost Teunissen, from Naerden, on Aug. 14, 1649, who in turn conveyed it to Hendrick Willemse, on May 12, 1657. Gov. Nicolls gave Willemse a confirmation of the lot, on Aug. 3, 1667.—Patents, II: 86, sec. of state's office, Albany. The second lot to the south was granted to Everardus Bogardus, on Feb. 12, 1646.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 402.

Leendert Aarden receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 120, Albany) for a piece of land consisting of the bouwery called Byleveldt's bouwery, lying behind Corlear's plantation. It extends from the valley (market) near the said plantation, and a valley (marsh) 170 rods further on west, 60 rods, to the wagon road; further along the wagon road north-by-east a little easterly, 115 rods; thence south, 35 rods next the land of the bouwery of the schout to the valley west, next to a "Cripple Bush" (swamp), 180 rods, along the marsh, with several turnings, 100 rods; amounting in all to about 300 morgens. Leendert Aarden conveyed this bouwery to Pieter Stuyvesant, July 18, 1663, and Stuyvesant was confirmed in its possession by Nicolls, Nov. 6, 1666.—Liber Patents, II: 140 (Albany). This tract is bounded, on the modern plan, approximately as follows: Beginning at a point north of Delancy and west of Eldridge St., running thence north-easterly to a point west of the intersection of Ave. B and East 6th St.; thence south-easterly to a point in the block bounded by Aves. C and D and East 3d and East 4th Sts.; thence south-westerly to the place of beginning.—See Landmark Map, Pl. 175, Vol. III; and May 18, 1649.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 373.

Hans Lodewyck receives a ground-brief for land at Turtlet Bay.—Liber GG: 117 (Albany).

Edward Marrel receives a ground-brief for a certain lot for a house and garden now covered by the building at No. 60 Broad St.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 373.

The ordinance prohibiting sale of intoxicants to the Indians (see June 18, 1643) is renewed with an increase in the fines and penalties for violations.—Laws & Ord. N. Y., 52.

Cornelis Claessen Swits receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 125, Albany) for a piece of land known as Bouwer No. 5, lying on the north end of Cornelis Jacobson's land or Bouwer No. 6. It extends along the said land east a little south 242 rods and further north-by-east 68 rods to the bouwery named Pangnebacker's (tile-maker's) bouwery; next along said bouwery west and west-by-north 260 rods; further on south-south-west to the wagon road south of Bowery St., 25 rods, and thence south to the west side of Clinton St. just north of Broome St.; the eastern boundary being the intersection of Division and Attorney Sts; thence along Division St. to the Bowery; and northerly along The Bowery to the place of beginning. Some time prior to this date, the brewhouse of the West India Co. was erected, it being mentioned in Liber GG: 159 (Albany). It stood on the south side of Stone St. (the Brewster's Street of that day), between Whitehall and Broad Sts. It was demolished prior to 1651.—Colonial MSS., III: 75 (Albany); Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 397.

Nov. 28, 1646. Adriaen van der Donck, with Kieft's consent, receives from the sachem Tacksmack and other Indians a deed for land north of Papparinick Creek, containing some 30 or 40 morgens.—Riker, Hist. of Harlem, 162. Cf. Scharf, Hist. of Westchester Co., 1: 25.

During 1646 and 1647, a portion of the open space of the esplanade before the fort, situated in front of the five stone workshops of the West India Co., was divided into five grant-lots. These lots faced the later Marksveldt (Whitehall St.), and covered the block from Brouwer (Stone) Street to Brugh (Bridge) Street, creating a narrow lane on the east, called Winkel Street, between them and the workshops of the company. The northernmost lot, bounded by the corner of Bowery Street, was granted to Robert Bottcher, on March 12, 1647 (Liber GG: 176); yet he seems to have built upon it. Later this plot was in the possession of Caspar Steymets and Steenman, who conveyed it, on Aug. 22, 1647, to Pieter Jacobs Buys.—Conveyances, Liber A: 107-8, in register's office, N. Y. City. It is known that the grant to Bogardus was earlier than that to De Forest, because the latter mentions the former. The fourth lot was granted to Robert Bottcher, on March 12, 1647 (Liber GG: 176); yet he seems to have built upon it. Later this plot was in the possession of Caspar Steymets and Steenman, who conveyed it, on Aug. 22, 1647, to Pieter Jacobs Buys.—Conveyances, Liber A: 107-8, in register's office.

In this year, Robert Dudley began the publication of his Icono della Mare, at Florence.—Winsor, III: 503; IV: 376. See also C. Pls. 35, 36, and 37, Vol. II.

Rooold Jansen (de Hae) receives a ground-brief for a lot for a Feb. house and garden lying on the south-east corner of Beaver and Whitehall Sts., now covered by the building of the Produce Exchange.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 370.

Abraham Ryxten receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house and garden at the south-east corner of Brood and Beaver Sts., now occupied by the building of the Consolidated Stock Exchange.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 370.

Gerrits Jansen receives from Oldenborch a ground-brief (Liber GG: 114, Albany) for a certain piece of land formerly known as "Pannebackers" (tile-makers), or, as the original has it, "Bouwery No. 7." Bouwy No. 7 was that granted to Cornelis Claessen Swits, and the Pannebackers Bouwery is really No. 4. It is described in the ground-brief as extending next to the land of Cornelis Claessen Swits; along the wagon-road to Hans Kierstedten's (Kierstede's) plantation; and farther on straight through the woods to the division line of Leendert Aarden, "to the three roads," or, as the translator explains, the place where three roads met. It contained in all, 455 morgens, 125 rods, or more than 90 acres. On the modern atlas, this farm was bounded approximately as follows: Beginning at a point on the east side of The Bowery a little south of DeLancey St., running north-east to a point in the centre of South St., north of St., then easterly to the west side of Clinton St. near its intersection with Broome St.; thence south-westwardly to The Bowery at the south-west corner of Canal St.; thence north along The Bowery to the place of beginning. See Landmark Map, Pl. 175, Vol. III; also Oct. 27, 1649.
Sibbaut Claessen receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 149) for 15 morgens, beginning at Hellgate Point where Hog (Blackwell's) Island terminates (recited in Liber Patents, II: 148 (N. Y. State Library)).

Govert Loockerman receives a ground-brief for a certain lot, now the north-east corner of Broad and Stone Sts., extending through the block and becoming the south-east corner of Broad and South William Sts.—See Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82, 82v, Vol. II, and II: 306–9; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 400.

Govert Loockerman and Dirck Cornelissens from Weenween appear before the provincial secretary, as "guarantees for their copartners residing in Holland," and make a declaration that they have "sold to William Coulder a parcel of land situated on the Island of Manhattan, on the East river, on the west whereof Mr. Allerton and Philip de Truy are adjoining," which they convey "by virtue of the ground-brief granted to the copartners by the secretary and his council." This land is described thus: "It runs from the hill (boughe) next the strand along said Allerton's and de Truy's land in the length twenty eight rods to the creekbush, in the breadth along the creekbush eighteen rods, one foot, thence towards the hill (boughe) by the strand in the length thirty rods, next the land of Lockmans and [blank], and broad along the strand to the hill (bouche) eighteen rods, one foot, which parcel of land amounts altogether to five hundred and twenty four rods, five feet," for which Goudier is to pay 200 guilders in instalments.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 148 (N. Y. State Library).

Govert Loockerman receives a ground-brief which he has "received from the secretary and his council," with 200 guilders in instalments.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 148 (N. Y. State Library). The land was bounded south by the East River, at the present Cherry St., north by Battery St., and west by Roosevelt St. Wolpert's Valley was named from Wolpert Gerritsen van Couwenhoven.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 375 (patent May 15, 1667).

Govert Loockerman and Cornelisens acknowledge a contract of a lease to Hendrick Pietersens from Hasselt of "their land situated on the Manhattan by Bestevans Creekbush," for ten years, from March 1, 1647, for the "fifth part of all the grain that will be raised on the aforesaid soil and eight fowls."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 145 (N. Y. State Library). This lease covered their grant (see March 26, 1643), excepting what had been conveyed heretofore to Peter Cornelissens.

Peter Cornelissens receives a ground-brief for a certain lot for a house and garden at present Nos. 8–22 Stone St.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 382. The earliest reference to the brewery of the West India Co. is in this ground-brief, which describes the lot as on the road "to the Brew-House of the Company."

Volckert Evertsen acknowledges the sale to Cornelis Masse of "the house and plantation on the Island of Manhattan . . . on the North River, on which plantation adjoin [those of] Mr. Wouter van Twiller and Thomas Hall."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 151 (N. Y. State Library). This farm occupied land in the vicinity of Christopher St. and the Hudson River. See MANUSCRIPTS, II: 191 (C. 11).

The ferry to Brooklyn is mentioned in a contract of this date.—

Nov. 1667

Jan Teunissen, the "schout of Breuckelen," agrees to furnish certain timber and other building materials for houses projected to New Amsterdam for Sergeant Gerrit Doorman and Adam Roelantsens.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 152 (N. Y. State Library).

Pieter Welpertens van Couvenhoven acknowledges conveyance to Mr. Arnoldus van Hardenbergh of "his house and lot consisting of a tract of land commenced to the south-west point of Manhattan Island for 1,600 guilders in wampum and goods. This was the plot granted to Couwenhoven on April 22, 1645, on present Broad and Stone Sts.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 152 (N. Y. State Library).

Nicholas Stillwell acknowledges the sale to Jan Jenspe Schepomse of "his house and lot hereof to be occupied by ensign Gerrit de Leuy, situated on the North Side of the Gulf on the Island of Manhattan" (present No. 25 and part of No. 27 Beaver Street), in exchange for Schepumse's "plantation hereof occupied by Niclaes Sloper, situated on the Island of Manhattan, near George Horsing's [Hulmes] plantation in Turtle Bay.—See R. N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 152 (N. Y. State Library). See Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 371; Castello Plan, II: 242.

A "Breuckelen" obtains a municipal government.—Brodhead, Hist. of the State of N. Y., I: 411–22.

Gerrit Doorman receives a ground-brief for a certain lot for a house and garden on the south-west corner of Marketfield and Broad Sts.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, and p. 377, Vol. II. Before Secretary Van Tienhoven, appears Leendert Arenden, and acknowledges the sale to Tonis Nyssen of "his house and lot situated and being on the Great Highway [Broadway], opposite the Company's garden, large and small as the same is bounded, according to the ground-brief dated 22nd September A.D. 1645, which lot and house Tonis Nyssen also acknowledges to have bought," for 160 guilders.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 152 (N. Y. State Library). While apparently a sale, the transaction may have been a mortgage, as the actual sale of this property was made by Arenden (or Aerden) to Lobertus van Duijckingen, on March 16, 1651.—Liber Deeds, A: 12–14, New York.

Gerrit Hendriickens receives a ground-brief (Liber GG 166, Albany) for the Schout's Bouwerie, containing "25 morgens of land in the middle marsh, on the west side of the valley, which is to be occupied by him during the company's pleasure. On May 13, 1654, the above valley was granted, by Director Stuyvesant, to Gerrit Hendriickens and his heirs forever.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 372. On the modern plan, this tract was bounded approximately as follows: by a line beginning at the north-east corner of the Bowery and E. 4th St., running north-easterly and easterly to a point on the north side of St. Mark's Pl., west of Avenue B; thence south, paralleling Avenue B, to a point on the north side of E. 6th St.; thence in a south-westerly direction to a point in the east line of Allen St., a little south of Houston St.; thence in a north-westerly direction to the intersection of the Bowery and E. 1st St.; thence north along The Bowery to the place of beginning. See Landmark Map, Pl. 175, Vol. III. The confirmation of this grant by Nicolls to Gerrit Hendriickens was dated May 3, 1667.—Liber Patents, II: 22 (Albany).

The attorney of Wouter van Twiller acknowledges a lease made by Van Twiller's housswy, "situated on the Island of Manhattan near the land of Couyo and Volckert Evertsen, to Geert Coerten and Wouter Aertsen" for a term of six years from Sept. 1, 1646, at an annual rental of 250 guilders. The lessor also "promises to have the new plantation, or the land on which the Negros dwell cleared at his heirs' cost and made fit for a permanent plantation, and remains also bound to have a well dug near the house."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 154 (N. Y. State Library). Van Twiller's plantation lay some distance west of the Bowery Road and southwest of Greenwich Lane.—See Manuscript Maps, 1: 90–91 (C. 10). The "new plantation, or the land on which the Negros dwell" is not definitely located, but it was near the lands of John Seale and Dominic Bogardus.—Ibid., II: 190.

Oct. 1667

Some time prior to this date, Dominie Everardus Bogardus erected a house on (the present) Whitehall St., between Stone and Bridge Sts.—Liber Deeds, A: 107 (New York). The house was sold by Annetje Jans, Bogardus's widow, in 1657, to Warner Wessels.—Ibid. Its site is now covered by the Kemble building.—See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 948.

William II becomes statholder, an office which he held until his death in 1665.

THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

Anna, a negroess, widow of Andries D'Angola, a free negro, receives a ground-brief for a certain piece of land lying on "the Island of Manhannan," its front is on Peter Tamber's (Drummer's) land; its rear on that of Touchyn Briel; it extends east by east 51 rods; north 30 rods; north-north-west 54 rods; northeast and north-east by east 43 rods and two hundred and forty rods. - Liber GG: 169 (Albany). For her patent, see also Oct. 19, 1667.

Two soldiers of New Amsterdam, for insolent behaviour toward citizens on the Heere Strait (Broadway), and for striking their superior officers, are sentenced to be shot at the place of execution, according to martial law. - Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 107.

Pieter Jansen and Hayyck Aertsen receive a ground-brief for a certain piece of land situated between Montague's hay marsh and Tobacco's Bowery, extending from the north corner of the said marsh in a south-south-east direction, 275 rods, past a spring of water against the highland, and therefrom to the end of the hill coming out of the North River; north-east-by-north along the high, billy land, 175 rods; and therefrom to the kill, which runs "back of the Island of Manhannan," 120 rods south-south-east, 70 rods south-east and 30 south-south-east, and along the aforesaid kill to the aforesaid corner (or the marsh), 200 rods, amounting in all to the 75 morgens, 106 rods; - Liber GG: 171 (Albany).

Thomas Barten receives a ground-brief for a certain lot for a house at what is now No. 48 Pearl St. — See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 386.

Robert Botteler (Bulder) receives a ground-brief for a certain lot between Stone and Bridge Sts. on Whitehall St., the site being now covered by the Kenbelle building. — See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 389.

Lourens Pietersen (Norman) receives a ground-brief for a certain lot on the south side of Beaver St., about 18 ft. west of Broad St., the lot being now covered by the building of the Consolidated Exchange. — See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 398.

Ollof Stevensen van Cortlandt receives a ground-brief for a certain lot for a house and garden at No. 37 and part of 39 Pearl St. — See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 395.

Ollof Stevensen van Cortlandt receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 174, Albany) for a certain piece of land "on the north end of the plantation of Saplek [Laale, Lesley] . . . all the way through the valley of Sapcanikant at the Strand." On the Manatus Maps, C. Pt. 41 and 42, Vol. I, Lesley's plantation is numbered 12, and is in the Greenwich neighborhood, the road over the Sand Hills leading to it. It lay to the south of this grant to Van Cortlandt.

Peter van Linden receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house and garden on the north-west corner of Broad and Beaver Sts., now covered in part by the Morris building. — See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 372.

Coyen Gerritsen receives a ground-brief for a piece of land 13 north-west of Van Twiller's plantation, stretching to the "Crumpellos" (cripplibush) east, etc. The original patent, signed by Willem Kieft and Cornelis van Tienhoven, with a fine seal of New Netherlands attached, is in the De Lancey Papers, 1647-1684, at N. Y. Hist. Soc. The location was the site of the present 48 and 50 Broadway, and a part of 52 Broadway (on which stands the southernmost end of the Exchange Court building). — See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 370.

Hans Hansen receives a ground-brief for a certain lot for a house and garden at No. 19 and part of No. 17 Pearl St., including the water-side portion of the head of the Maritime building. — See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 387.

Claes van Elstten receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 182, 1667.

About this year, Isaac Allerton erected his warehouse on what is now Nos. 10-12 Peck Slip. It is shown on Pls. 10, 10-3, Vol. I. See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 956.

Jan Pietersen received, some time this year, a ground-brief for a lot on the present Whitehall St. He sold it through his attorneys, on March 18, 1667, to Thomas Baxter, an Englishman, who having turned pirate forfeited his property. Director-General Stuyvesant took possession, and, on Feb. 15, 1668 (n. s.), petitioned the provincial council for a ground-brief to his behalf. — See Frontispiece, Vol. I, and I: 123; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 391. This was part of the site of Stuyvesant's great house, and the later Whitehall mansion.

From the period 1647-51 dates the very interesting series of maps of New Amsterdam, with inset views of New Amsterdam, known as the Visscher series, the original of which maps was probably based upon surveys made just before 1647, and lost in the shipwreck of the "Princess," on Sept. 27, of this year. The more important maps belonging to this series are reproduced and described in Vol. I, Pls. 7-9, 7-12, and 7-50; and in Vol. III, A Pls. 1-4, 1-6.

Paulus Heymanus, who hitherto has been a petty officer (Adelhart), is appointed by the director-general and council as "Guardian over the Company's negroes," at a salary of 23 florins per month and 120 florins per annum as board money. — Record N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 280 (N. Y. State Library).

Hans Kierstede receives a ground-brief for a lot at the present Nos. 23-25 Pearl St., corner of Whitehall St. In 1656, a market was established adjoining Kierstede's house. — See Frontispiece, Vol. I, and I: 255-64; Castello Plan, C. Pt. 82, 825, Vol. II, and III: 871-95; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 959.

The provincial government issues a proclamation offering a reward of 100 florins for the discovery of the person or persons who tore down notices for renting the ferry from New Amsterdam to Long Island, and for the sale of the house and effects of Cornelis Melyn (at Broad and Pearl Sts.), which notices were posted at the usual places, namely, Fort Amsterdam, the lodge (loki), a light frame building, possibly the ferry-house, or more likely the custom-house — see July 43, and the public tavern (Pearl St. and Counties Alley) — Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 107. The tavern referred to was undoubtedly the city tavern (Stads Herbergh). See also, regarding this ferry, 1638; 1641; Jan. 24, 1643.

Hendrick Jansen Smitt (Smith) secures a small house on the present site of No. 31 Bridge St. Here he conducted a tavern. — See Castello Plan, C. Pt. 827; Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 390.

Adam Brouwer receives a ground-brief for a certain lot for a house and garden in the southern part of the block now bounded by Broad and Exchange Pl., and Beaver St., the site being in part covered now by the Wells building. — See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pt. 87, Vol. II, and III: 398.
by the deceased Jan Celes (see 1658), extending on the south side of the land and valley (marsh or meadow) appertaining to Everhardus Bogardus, "Praedictum" (preacher), and on the north side to Corocius Maersten's land, and along the negroes' plantation to the Cripplebush of the said Bogardus, extending in breadth along the Strand now to north-north-east, 30 rods; from the Cripplebush south-east to the Cripplebush south by east, 150 rods, along the Cripplebush to the Negros' land, east-by-south, 45 rods, along the negroes' plantation, upwards, north-north-west, 60 rods, to the Strand; downwards, north-west-by-west, 37 rods; along the Cripplebush of Corocius Maersten, north-west by north-west, 27 rods, and still along the said Cripplebush to the Strand, westerly, 41 rods. — Liber GG: 208 (Albany). This tract, known as "Old Jane's Land" (See Manatus Maps, Vol. II: 150 n.), was conveyed by Teunis Nysjen to Augustin Heermans, June 11, 1651, who in turn conveyed it to Rut Jacobsen, of Fort Orange, May 11, 1655.— Liber Deeds, A: 19-20 (N. Y. C.). Judge Hoffman, in noting that this land later became a part of the property of Trinity Church, declares that it "cannot be traced as to the history of the title."— Estate and Rights of the Corporation, II: 180. See Manatus Maps, II: 196 (infra); C. 42, No. 21, Vol. II.

Peter van Campen, a negro, receives a ground-brief for a piece of land in the rear of the land of Tousaant (Toussaint) Briel. It extends north-east-by-east and north-north-east, 53 rods, to the negroes' land; north-north-west and north-west-by-north, 39 rods; further along by the said negroes' land, west-south-west, 45 rods; and to the place of beginning, south-east-by-south, 55 rods, a total of all to 73 morgens, 245 rods. — Liber GG: 209 (Albany). Van Campen's land was, very probably, part of the later Bayard or the Church Farm.

Philip de Truy conveys to Isaac Allerton (Liber Patents, IV: 92, 1809) a parcel of land lying on both sides of Peck Slip, along the waterfront of the East River. Allerton, a merchant, residing at the time in New Haven, Conn., proceeded to erect here a warehouse, which is shown on Pls. 10 ("Duke's Plan") and 10-a, Vol. I. It was upon the site now covered by Nos. 10 and 12 Peck Slip. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 962. For an account of Isaac Allerton and his dealings in New Amsterdam, see Innes, New Am. to 1672, I: 351 et seq. Isaac Allerton was one of the passengers on the "Mayflower," in 1620 (q. v.).—Bradford, Hist. of Plymouth Plantation (1912), II: 399. He settled on Manhattan Island about 1638 (q. v.). For his praise of New Netherland as a place of settlement, see 1639. See also Sept. 14, 1658.

Jochim Kierstede receives a ground-brief for a lot on the Strand. No record exists of the transfer, but later the lot passed from Stuyvesant's possessee to the possessee of Liber GG of "Great House," the later "White-hall."—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. 87, Vol. II, and II: 391.

Ariac Pietersen, from Acklmer, receives a ground-brief for a piece of land on Manhattan Island near to Sapsacanck, bounded on the south by the plantation of Jan Vilighius; on the north by that of Jan van Rotterdam, its breadth along the Strand is 65 rods; its length into the woods, extending south-east-by-east, on each side, 200 rods; in the rear in the woods its breadth extending south-west is 65 rods. — Liber GG: 212 (Albany). This constitutes the southern 60 acres of the property known in later years as the "Glass House Farm." Approximately, the grant stretched from the present 34th to 38th St., between Eighth Ave. and the North River. Pietersen had previously received a deed for this land from Hendrick Pietersen van Wessel, dated Feb. 3, 1640.— Manatus Maps, C. 41 and 42, Vol. II, and II: 1941 also Pl. 176, Vol. III.

Harry Piets receives a ground-brief for a tract of land called Gregory's or Gregorius's plantation, and the kill "where the water ripples over the stones," and abutting on Schepmoes's plantation; its breadth on the East River is 75 rods; and it stretches along the land and杀 male northern west, 1 yard in. It extends into the woods north-west and south-east to the division line of Schepmoes's plantation; its length to the brook is 187 rods, 5 feet. The length between Peter Linde's and Gregorius's plantation is 190 rods; behind, in the woods, the breadth is 75 rods. — Liber GG: 214 (Albany). Generally speaking, Gregory's plantation forms part of the later Kip farm.

Tomis Kray receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house and garden at the south-west corner of Stone and Broad Sts.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 383.

In a letter written in French by Director-General Kieft to Gov. John Winthrop, of Connecticut, he tells him of foreign news and of the defeat of the Portuguese in Brazil, adding: “At the beginning of next month you shall arrive here the arrival of the new Director [Stuyvesant] who has passed the winter at Curacao; we have been apprised of it by a ship which he sent here.”—Wintrop Papers, XIV: 91 (Mass. in Mass. Hist. Soc.). See also May 14, 1647.

Johannes La Montagne receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 216) by the lieutenant-governor and colonel in the south-east corner of land situate on the island of Manhattan, known by the Indian name “Mausenot,” which in the Nether Dutch language signifies the Flat Land, and containing 100 morgens in the flat lying between the hills and kill; and a point named Rechawance, stretching between two kills to the East River (which land was occupied by Hendrick de Forest, deceased, and has been purchased by La Montagne for 1,700 guilders). On the modern city plan, the land known as Mortayne’s Flat stretched from about 93rd to 110th St., and was included between Fifth Ave., Holloway, and the Harlem River. In 1664, says Riker, it reverted to the provincial government, which laid it out to inhabitants of New Harlem.—Hist. of Harlem (1881), 265, 592; map, appended, in ibid. See Landmark Maps Ref. Key, III: 966; Fl. 178, Vol. III; Manuscripts Maps, II: 193-94; C. Pl. 42, Vol. II; and Chronology, July 25, 1645.

Director-General Petrus Stuyvesant arrives at New Amsterdam to take up his government in New Netherland.—See July 28, 1646, also N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 93.

Sybou Claessen receives a ground-brief (Liber GG: 220, Albany) for a lot which, on the modern city plan would be on the east side of Broadway, somewhat north of the corner of Wall St., the site being now covered by the United Bank building.—See Landmark Maps Ref. Key, III: 946; Fl. 174, Vol. III.

At some time prior to this date, Pieter Collet received a grant (see Liber GG: 220, Albany) of land situated, on the modern map, at the south-east corner of Broadway and Pine St.—See Landmark Maps Ref. Key, III: 947; Fl. 174, Vol. III.

Isaac de Forest (de Forest) receives a ground-brief for 50 morgens on the hill running around the island of Manhattan south of Jochoam Piterkens’s (Kuyter’s) and east of Concart van Keulen’s lands,—“from Keulen’s to the Kill that runs around the Island.”—Liber GG: 219 (Albany). This “Kill” was the Harlem River. The great separation of the south of “Brouck’s Kill,” the passage parting Randall Island from the Westchester shore. “Upon this fifty-morgen tract of the village of New Harlem was subsequently laid out and ran its humble career.”—Riker, Hist. of Harlem (1881), 167.

Thomas Hall receives a ground-brief for a lot at the present No. 35 Pearl St.; it later passed into the possession of Cornelis van Tienhoven.—See Frontispiece, Vol. I, and II: 129; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 384-385.

Augustin Heermann receives a ground-brief for a parcel of land on the present William St. from Beaver St. to Exchange Pl. Lord’s Court, the Van Nostrand building, and the building of the Corn Exchange Bank are among the structures now upon this tract.—See Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82, 82e, Vol. II, and II: 258; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 395.

Sergeant Huybertsen (James Hubble) receives a ground-brief for a certain lot for a house and garden now included in Battery Pl. He was allowed to take the property from the riverfront. in 1637, because it stood too near the fort.—See Frontispiece, Vol. I, and I: 1265; Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82, 82e, Vol. II, and II: 276.

Paulus Leendertsen van der Gritt is appointed superintendent of naval equipments (Equippage master) by commission signed by Stuyvesant, Kieft, and van Dinklaghen, and dated June 26, 1647. On June 6, he was ordered to fit out as quickly as possible three ships, “de Grote Gerrit” (Great Gerrit), “de Kuth” (the Cat), and “de Liefde” (the Love), for speedy service in a cruise against the Spaniards and their adherents in the West Indies and adjacent islands.—Records C. Pl. 87 (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 287-88 (N. Y. State Library).

Willem Tenmassen is appointed naval commander. His commission, which gives his prae-nomen as “Jelmer,” is issued at Fort Amsterdam and signed “P. Stuyvesant, Willem Kieft, L: van Dinklaghen, La Montagne.”—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 287 (N. Y. State Library).

The sale or giving away of liquor is prohibited during divine service on Sunday and during the sessions of the city court, when there is no sermon, or otherwise, before four of the clock in the afternoon, .. under any pretense, be it what it may. Travelers and daily Boarder alone excepted, who may be provided therewith for their necessity in their lodgings.” All taverns are to be closed every day by nine o’clock in the morning, and as to the island property: “Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 60-61. The translation in Rec. N. Am., i: 1-2, is ambiguous and misleading. This is the earliest recorded ordinance of Stuyvesant’s council.

A vaccine existing in the office of “Proovent” (jailer), the provincial government appoints Adam Roehlant, formerly school-master, to the vacancy, at 26 guilders per month and 100 guildersboard money per annum.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 255 (N. Y. State Library).

The repeated violations of the ordinance against the sale of intoxicants to Indians (seen June 18, 1643) compel further attempts by law to suppress the traffic.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 64.

All inhabitants of New Netherland are charged and commanded to fence their lands properly, in order to prevent the cattle from doing damage. Horses, cows, and especially goats and hogs, are required to be herded or otherwise placed where they can do no harm, for which purpose Fiscal Van Dyke is to erect a pound, in which he may detain the animals until the damage they have done is made good and the fine is paid.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 65-67, Rec. N. Am., i: 3.

Among the public works that Stuyvesant and his council recommend on this day, less than two months after Stuyvesant’s arrival at New Amsterdam, is the erection of “a Pier for the convenience of the Merchants and Citizens.” It is the first proposal for a pier in New Amsterdam.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 66. See 1648.

An ordinance for regulating shipping at New Amsterdam is promulgated, in which anchorages are provided for as follows: “That all private Yachts, Barks, Ketches, Sloops and Boats under Fifty lasts, whether Dutch, English, French, Swedish or other, desiring to anchor under the Manhattanhout shall be allowed to seek for, nor land any other place; the said City shall lay out, between Cape Point and the Guide-board near the City Tavern, under a fine of Fifty Carolus guilders for the first time after they have been notified, and the large Ships may anchor between the said Point and the Second Guide Board, which stands on the way down towards the Smith’s valley.” Vessels are to be visited, and their goods inspected and entered before discharged. Loading or unloading after sunset or before sunrise is prohibited. Boats may convey officers on board or ashore, but it must be done “to the evening before the ringing of the rogue’s bell (de bone clock) and in the morning after Reveille, and from no other place than in front of, and about the office flagge.”—See Jan. 29. Notice of departure must be given twelve hours in advance, and ships must first be visited and receive proper clearance. No passengers may be taken without a pass signed by the director-general or his deputy.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth. 66-67, Rec. N. Am., i: 3.

An excise on imported wines and spirituous liquors is imposed for the purpose of raising money for public works at New Amsterdam, as follows: “Whereas the fortress New Amsterdam is now for some time past, during the War, greatly decayed, and the walls daily leaped over and more and more trampled under foot by Men and cattle, which endangers the Country. It has, therefore been directed, by authority, the contempt, ye disgrace of this State by others our Neighbors, whether English, French, Swedes, yea even by the Indians and Heathens, but also to the reproach of Us and our good Inhabitants, and is most perilous and dangerous in time of war, or of defence against all foreign enemies; Therefore, We, . . . intending, pursuant to the Order of the Honble Lords

Major, to put the Fort into proper repair: to complete the Church, which is to be the Prie for the convenience of the Merchants and Citizens: to construct a Sheet-piling to prevent the abrasion of the river in front of this city of New Amsterdam, all which being useful and highly necessary, public and general works, requiring a considerable sum of money, both to procure the materials, and to pay the workmen, therefore for facilitating this, namely, Lubbers, the Mayor, we have received to ordain and establish a reasonable Excise and impost on the Wine, Brandy and Liquors which are imported from abroad. Likewise, the purchaser is "ordered and commanded not to receive, ship, export nor store any Wines without having first obtained a proper permit from the Renter, and no right given to the Officer, on pain of forfeiting such Wines and Fire-Hooped guilders additional, to be applied one third for the Company, one third for the Church, one third for the Fiscal or the Complainant and Informer."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 69-71.

"Director-General Stuyvesant and the council pass an ordinance against smuggling, making it mandatory for merchants to exhibit their books and accounts when required, as well as to have all furs marked and stamped by a public officer at New Amsterdam before exportation. This ordinance was afterwards disapproved in Holland.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 69-69. A few days before (June 23), a present Daniel Livck was ordered not to allow any goods to be landed without permission from Stuyvesant or Secretary Van Tienhoven.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 109.

On behalf of himself and his partners, Thomas Broughton makes an acknowledgment of having "received and got full and prompt payment from the Honorable General Petrus Stuyvesant, of the ship Amandare arrived here [New Amsterdam] from Brazil, according to the bill of Sale and inventory dated the last of May A.D. 1647."—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 158 (N. Y. State Library). The ship was chartered to go to Boston, and her records were Isaac Allerton of New Amsterdam and Thomas Willett of New Plymouth.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 157. In other records her name is given as "T’Amandare." She brought negro slaves to New Netherland, and her sale was mentioned in correspondence from the directors at Amsterdam.—N.Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 77, 54, 201.

Rev. Johannes Cornelisz. Backer (or Backerus) is appointed in New Amsterdam as a supply minister there, because Dominie Backer, who happened to be in India, was to be 100 guilders per month and 200 guilders per annum for support, as well as free firewood. Backer had been a clergyman in the service of the West India Co. at Curacoa, and had accompanied Stuyvesant from there to New Netherland, intending to return that way to Holland. His stay at Manhattan was "against his intention and inclination," and was prolonged by the loss of Bogardus on the ill-fated "Princess," and the subsequent delays in designating another regular minister for the post. His impatience to return to Holland was quickened by the godlessness of the place and the political rows that were rife at Manhattan at this period. On May 8, 1649, Stuyvesant called upon Backer and forbade him to read, or allow anybody else to read, any political writings in the church of Fort Amsterdam. Backer, having obtained authority from Holland to return there, also sought his discharge from Stuyvesant and his council, from whom he was granted a release, on July 6, 1649. He sailed away in August (see Aug. 2, 1649), after "only 27 months'" of residence in New Netherland, and, on Nov. 1st, presented his credentials to the dais of Amsterdam.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 317 (N. Y. State Library); Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 113, 1222. He returned to Leiden, July 26, 1649, 235, 235, 237, 265, N.Y. Col. Doc., I: 116, 431; XIV: 115.

The Hon. Luibertus van Dincklagen is appointed president of the ordinary court, to be assisted by some of the principal officers of the West India Co., but with reservation by Director-General Stuyvesant to preside himself in important cases.—Cal. Hist. MSS., July 1647, 22.

In order to prevent a continuance of irregularities in the building and erecting of houses, such as extending lots far beyond their boundaries, setting up nuisances on highways and streets, and neglecting to build on granted lots, Stuyvesant and his council resolve to appoint three surveyors, literally road-masters (rijmensters) and cadastral, a member of the council; Paulus Leendertsen vander Grift, naval officer and member of the council, and Cornesias Tienhoven, provincial secretary. They are authorized and empowered "to condemn in and future to stop all unagiously and irregular Buildings, Pences, Palisades, Posts, Rails, etc.

All who have henceforth intended to build or inclose their gardens or lots in or near the city of New Amsterdam are forbidden to undertake it without the previous knowledge and consent of, and survey by, these surveyors, under a penalty of 25 Carolus guilders and the destruction of what may have been built or set up. Likewise, all who have formerly received lots are warned and notified to erect on their lots good and decent houses within nine months, according to law, or, in default thereof, such unimproved lots will be forfeited to the patron or landlord, or conveyed by him to whomsoever he please.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 74-75. Rec. N. Am., I: 4. The three surveyors were actually appointed on July 22, in advance of the ordinance.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 113; Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 316 (N. Y. State Library).

It being deemed necessary that the newly built church in Fort Amsterdam shall be made tight against the inclemency of the forthcoming winter, and, in order that the work on the church may proceed and the materials be provided, Director-General Petrus Stuyvesant, Jacob Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven, and Jan Jansen Damou are appointed church-wardens (kerkmoesters) to forward all necessary work and supervise the same.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 316 (N. Y. State Library). For an outline history of the "Church in the Fort," see May, 1642. Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 913; and descriptions of the frontispiece and other early plates, Vol. I.

John Dolloing deposes in regard to a visit he paid, in company with Fiscal Van Dyck and others, to the tavern of Gerrit, the miller (de Molenaren), namely Gerrit Follweyer.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 38. The site was No. 26 Broadway, where the Standard Oil building now stands. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 978. See also Rec. N. Am., I: 587.

An export duty on furs is established, in which a fixed duty is stipulated, "so that each resident who in the following year, and all who have previously been warned and notified to erect on their lots good and decent houses within nine months, according to law, or, in default thereof, such unimproved lots will be forfeited to the patron or landlord, or conveyed by him to whomsoever he please.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 74-75. Rec. N. Am., I: 4."

In an undated letter, written some time in midsummer, 1647, the directors in Holland say to Director-General Stuyvesant: "We were not less pleased with the reports from you, than with the very promising signs of the city. Several buildings are being erected around Fort New-Amsterdam."—N.Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 76, where the editor places the letter (p. iv) under date of May 2, which cannot be right, in view of its allusions, and of the fact that Stuyvesant only arrived at New Amsterdam on May 15.

"Johannes Backerus, minister here on the Island of Manhattan," gives power of attorney to collect from the Amsterdam chamber 4,154 guilders, 1 stiver, "earned by him at the Island of Curacoa together with four hundred guilders earned by the aforesaid De Backerus on the ship Princess."—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 161 (N. Y. State Library).

Egbert van Borsum is mentioned as master of the "yacht Prince Willem."—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 161 (N. Y. State Library).

"Evert Duyckingh, late assistant, now a freeman," gives power of attorney to Hendrick Jansen, tailor, to collect from the Amsterdam chamber 675 guilders, 10 stivers, earned by him in New Netherland, "as per balance of the annexed account in the Book No. F." His signature is "Evert Duycking."—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), II: 161 (N. Y. State Library).

Capt. Johan de Vries, at the provincial secretary’s office, issues an authorization to "Michiel Jansen and Simon Joosten, both inhabitants here [New Amsterdam], to take care of, and justly treat, in his absence, his five Negroes and Brazilian women till the said Jan de Vries shall otherwise 1647 order.—"Record N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 162 (N. Y. State Library).

9 Stuyvesant, assisted by his father and guardian Mr. Johannes La Montagne, councillor in New Netherland," at the provincial secretary's office, issues a power of attorney to Conrent van Culeen, a merchant at Amsterdam, to collect wages due for Jesse for his services in the employ of the West India Co., as shown in the Book of Monthly Wages, N. F.°, p. 11.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 163. Jesse de La Montagne was named after his grandfather, Jesse de Forest, the merchant-ayer of Leyden.

16 The ill-fated ship "Princess" sails from New Amsterdam on her last voyage. See Sept. 27.

17 The Book of Monthly Wages N° 2,° containing the accounts of persons employed in New Netherland in the pay of the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., is "now transmitted by the ship The Princess."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), II: 166 (N. Y. State Library). See Sept. 27, and Addenda.

26 Stuyvesant proposes to his council the providing of ways and means for repairing Fort Amsterdam and allowing the discontent of the Indians, who have not yet received the presents that have been promised to them at the conclusion of the general peace.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 112.

Sept.

25 Stuyvesant considers the declaration of the following public improvements necessary, in order that New Amsterdam may "grow and advance in good order, justice, police, population, prosperity and mutual peace and improvement," namely: to be "furnished with a proper and strong Fort, a Church, School, Sheet-piling, Pier and similar highly necessary public and common works and buildings."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 75.

The commonalty having chosen from their number eighteen men, Stuyvesant and his council designate nine of them to act as selectmen or spokesmen for the people whilst in conjunction with the director-general and council concerning cooperative measures to be adopted for promoting the welfare of the colony. Augustine Herman, Arnoldeus van Hardenbergh, and Gortor Locockermans, merchants; Jan Jansen Damen, Jacob Wolfheerts van Couwenhoven, and Hendrick Kip, burgheers; Michael Jansen, Jan Eversten Boat, and Thomas Hall, farmers, compose the first board of "Nine Men."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 75-79. This board was closely controlled by Stuyvesant, who appointed its president, authorized its meetings, and allowed consideration only of questions that he proposed. None of the less, the board "constituted a permanent element in the governmental system" for prospective acquisition of popular rights—hence was a step toward representative government. Six of the nine men retired annually, and their places were filled by men chosen by the director-general and council from twelve men nominated by the full board on the last day of each December.—Ibid.; Jameson, Narr. N. Neth., 287.

In the Representation of New Netherland, July 25, 1649, whose sig. is "in the name of the original inhabitants of New Men.," we have the following characterization of that body: "Nine men were chosen to represent the whole commonalty, and commissions and instructions were given that whatever these men should do, should be the act of the whole commonalty. And so in fact it was, as long as it corresponded with the wishes and views of the Director. In such cases they represented the whole commonalty; but when it did not so correspond, they were then clowns, usurers, rebels and the like."—Ibid., op. cit., 341.

27 The ship "Princess," also known to have been called "Princess Amelia," which sailed from New Amsterdam on Aug. 16 (g.r.), having among those on board former Director-General Kieft, Domine Bogardus, the late Fiscal Vander Huygens, Jochem Pietersen Kyuter, and Cornelis Melyn, is "reckoned in the [English] Channel on the 27th of Septb. and 81 souls, men, women and children, and all the above named" were lost in the wreck.—"MSS., 83; cf. such Maps;"—II: 164. See also 1643, and description of Pl. 7-4, I: 145.

The desire of the inhabitants to have a pier erected is reiterated in an ordinance of this date.—See Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 75. For further mention, see 1648.

Director-Gen. Stuyvesant informs the council that Andrew Forrester, of Dundee, Scotland, agent and attorney of Mary, widow of Lord Stirling, has been appointed governor of Long Island and places adjacent, demanding to see his (Stuyvesant's) commission and authority, which he has answered by having Forrester arrested and confined in the prisoners' quarters in the city tavern at the expense of the West India Co. The council resolves at a later date to release them, that he may be examined as to his commission and authority. The investigation results in the council resolving that Forrester be sent a prisoner to Holland, on board the ship "Valckenier" (Falconer), there to vindicate his commission before the states-general.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 80-81; Representation of N. Neth., in Jameson's Narr. N. Neth., 307-8. The ship was forced by bad weather into Spitshead, England, where Forrester was relieved from his imprisonment by the captain of an English man-of-war.—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 286; VII: 431; XIV: 55.

"Hans Wever is appointed captain-at-arms to the garrison of Fort Amsterdam.—Cal. Hist. MSS., 112.

Several questions are placed before the council by Stuyvesant, among them, whether the ensign and the sergeant are to form part of courts-martial, which is agreed to affirmatively; what shall be done in case of fire, as the houses in New Amsterdam are mostly built of wood and covered with thatch; and what provision is to be made for a school, "as there is none in New Amsterdam, and the youth are running wild." The last two questions the court refers to the board of "Nine Men."—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 114. Stuyvesant, by a written communication (Nov. 14), requested the council to choose a day (Nov. 25) for the meeting of the "Nine Men," and at the same time wrote to the "Nine Men"—representatives of Manhattan, Breuckelen, Amersfoort, and Pavinia—asking them to advise him regarding the best way to procure means to repair Fort Amsterdam, complete the church, provide a schoolhouse and dwelling for the schoolmaster, and make provision against fire.—Ibid.; Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 351 (N. Y. State Library).

Gov. Stuyvesant's statement to the commonalty regarding a school reads: "Whereas, for want of a school house, no school has been kept here during three months, by which the youth are spoiled, it is proposed to consider where a convenient place may be fixed upon, so as to keep the youth from the streets, and under strict subordination."—Quoted in Westerwind MSS., in N. Y. Pub. Library.

The military punishment of "riding the wooden horse," on the 15th, near the tavern of Philip Gervers (now the site of the Produce Exchange), was carried on under the Dutch as late as Colev's administration, in 1673. How early it came into practice in New Amsterdam is not known. Gerardus was himself subjected to it in rather ludicrous fashion, in 1643 (6.2). On Nov. 15, 1647, Jonas Jonassen, a soldier, for robbing horses and killing a pig, is ex of the wooden horse for three days, from two o'clock in the afternoon until the conclusion of the parade, having a 50-pound weight tied to each foot. The severity of this punishment did not act as a deterrent to this individual's indulgence in larcenies. Some months later (March 3, 1648), he was sentenced to be stripped of his military equipment; then to be chained to a wheelbarrow and put at hard labour during the pleasure of the director-general and council.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 79, 114, 115; cf. on this punishment, N. Y. Col. Docs., II: 624; Cal. Hist. MSS., Eng., 212; Döppler, Theatri poenarum (Leipsig, 1697), pt. 2: 616. See also Castello Plan, II: 249 (No. 4).

Fort New Amsterdam is "entirely out of repair," and it is considered "highly necessary that it be placed at the earliest opportunity in a thorough and complete state of defense," so as to afford "a safe retreat for all inhabitants in time of danger therefore, Stuyvesant and the council request the commonalty 'to lend a helping hand to this laudable work'; and, in order that the commonalty may not 'be aggrieved by heavy and intolerable burthen,' every male person from 16 to 60 years of age is required to work 12 days in the year at the fort; or, finding it inconvenient to perform such labors, he is required therefore, in payment of two guilders for each day.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 79.

Loose wampum is continued current in circulation, but "all imperfect, broken and unpicked beads can be picked out, which are declared Bullion, and shall, meantime, be received at" the company's counting house [in New Amsterdam] as heretofore. Nov. Provided that the Company, or anyone on its part, shall, in return, be at liberty to trade therewith among the Merchants or other Inhabitants, or in larger parcels as may be agreed upon and stipulated by any individual, or on behalf of the Company."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 8o. For earlier regulatory measure, see April 18, 1641.

Dec. Stuyvesant issues a proclamation offering protection and refuge to all persons whatever who have run away from the colony of New Haven, whether they are "noble or ignoble, freeman or slave, debtor or creditor, yeas, to the lowest prisoner included." This retaliatory act is the outcome of disputes between him and Gov. Theophilus Eaton.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 114; N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 341; Brodkill, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 480-81. The act was justly denounced. For the relations between Stuyvesant and Eaton at this period, see Records of New Haven Colony, 1638-1659, 507, ff.

— Some time prior to this year, Abraham Pieterszoon began to keep a tavern at what is now 14-16 Broadway.—See Hist. MSS., Dutch, 119, 120, 121. See Castello Plan, II: 211-25; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 980. See July 23, 1648.

— In the year 1648, the Hon'd Director General and Council of New Netherland offered at public sale, to the highest bidder, in Fort Amsterdam, or in larger parcels as may be agreed upon and stipulated by Harman Meyenders vande Bogaert, situated on the Island Manhattan, bounded on the west by the lot of Adam Roelantzen and on the east by that of Olof Stevenson [240 Cortlandt]. This was "on account of a claim presented in the Colone Klausdorwycz for damages by fire which the Indians of that quarter sustained at the hands of said Harman Meyenders." This lot, on the north side of Stone St., now covered by the Produce Exchange, having been purchased at the sale by Arisam Keyser, was formally conveyed to him on July 8, 1648, but he, on the same day, conveyed it to Evert Pels, who, it is thought, acted as agent for the widow of Bogaert.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 50 (N. Y. State Library). See Castello Plan, II: 215 (Nos. 8 and 9); 75 (lot 8).

— In this year, Pieter Andriesszoon was a tavern-keeper at 39 Stone St.—See Castello Plan, II: 307-8.

— Claes van Elshat was official surveyor in New Netherland at this time.—Ocalaghan's Reg. N. Neth., 37. See also under 1652.

— Some time during this year, or before the summer of 1649, a pier was constructed on the East River. Among the public works that Stuyvesant's council recommended, on July 4, 1647 (g.v.), less than two months after his arrival in New Amsterdam, was the erection of "a Pier for the convenience of the Merchants and Citizens."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 69. This was the first proposal for a pier in New Amsterdam. At the same time, the council defined the roadstead for anchorage to be "between Capske Point and the Guide-boat [or sign post, with a hand] nearest the shore," which neglecting by a "little Point and the Second Guide Board," at the Smith's Vly, for larger ships.—Ibid., 71-72. It is evident that the pier, wharf, or dock, was not in existence at this time (1647), notwithstanding that Imes (New Am. and Its People), on his compiled map (1659, p. 1), represents the "Public Dock" as extant in 1644, and 1676 (p. 199) that when Stuyvesant arrived, on May 11, 1647 (g.v.), "most of the inhabitants of the town assembled on Schreyers Hook and at the little dock when the new Director-General landed." The desire for building a pier was reiterated in an ordinance of Sept. 27, 1647.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 75. Provisions were made for construction of the pier in an ordinance of Dec. 3, 1647 (g.v.).—Ibid., 79. No pier, however, was built in that year.

The anchorage for vessels was renewed and confirmed by ordinance on March 10, 1648 (g.v.).—Ibid., 91. One of the acts of Stuyvesant, in 1648, was to "put in order the church [or the fort] which came into his hands very much out of repair, and shortly afterwards [he] made a wooden wharf." These public works completed before July 28, 1649 (g.v.), as is mentioned in the Ver- noogh, or Representation of N. Neth., in Jameson's Har. N. Neth., 336. In the ordinance of Aug. 11, 1656 (g.v.), the roadstead for anchorage was extended in front of the city of [New] Amsterdam, on the East River between the Pier and the City gate, and on the North river in front of and near the Beaver's path, and at no other place."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 273. Again, on June 12, 1657 (g.v.), the roadstead was described as "beyond the gates and walls of this City, and the Hand [erected for that purpose]," but on the East River between the Hand signpost or guide-board and the Capske on the North river, in front of and about the Beavers path and their unloading and loading," which was done by means of scows, small boats, rowboats, canoes, etc.—Ibid., 310, 312. These methods prevailed until the new pier or custom house "Bridge" was built, in 1659, when wharfage regulations were established. For the custom-house bridge, see Nov. 9, 1658; April 18, July 11 and 23, Dec. 12, 1659; and Nov. 3, 1660. The earliest roadsteads are shown by anchors on the Manuscript Maps (1659), C. Pls. 41 and 42, Vol. II. See also May 26, 1649.

The "Cambridge Platform," embodying the ecclesiastical policy of the Massachusetts church corporation, is drawn up. It was reprinted in 1659, and established by the general court in 1651.—Winoor, III: 314.

The council resolves to call in all the effects of the West India Co. that have been loaned to individuals during Kill'd's administration, and also orders that the company's sawmill on Nut (Governors) Island, being "wholly decayed and in ruin," be dismantled, if possible, otherwise burned down, in order to salvage the iron.

Jan. 23. The houses in New Amsterdam were "for the most part built of Wood and thatched with Reed, besides which the Chimneys of some of the houses were of wood, which was considered most dangerous." Careless people neglected to keep their chimneys cleanly swept and paid no attention to their fires, "whereby recently two Houses were burned" and greater damage was feared for the future. Therefore, Stuyvesant and his council now order that henceforth no chimneys shall be built "of wood or plaster in any houses between the Fort and the Fresh Water," but that those already in use may remain "until further order and pleasure of the Firewardens." For the proper execution of this ordinance, the following men are appointed firewardens: Commisary Adrian Keyser, representing the council; and Thomas Hall, Martin Cregier, and George Wolsey, representing the commonalty. They are empowered, "at their pleasure," to inspect the chimneys of all of the houses situated between the fort and the Fresh Water (Kolck), and they have the right to levy "a fine of three Guilders for every fine due on examination to be duly, to be expended in Fire ladders, Hooks and Buckets." If a house is burned, either through negligence or the fire on the hearth, the occupant is subject to a fine of 25 florins, to be applied as above. Notwithstanding this ordinance, and its reaffirmation from time to time, it was "banned by Governor Dongan, as a Point and the Second Guide Board," at the Smith's Vly, for larger ships.—Ibid., 82-85, 102, 208, 322; Rec. N. Am., 1: 5.

Because great damage daily is done by logs and goats to orchards, gardens, and other improvements, a nuisance which prevents "the planting of beautiful Orchards and Gardens," an ordinance is passed by Stuyvesant and his council enjoining in future the pasturing or keeping of any goats or hogs "between the fortification of New Amsterdam (or its vicinity) and the Fresh Water" (Kolck), unless they are kept within enclosures that are fenced high enough to prevent the goats from leaping over them. Goats beyond the Fresh Water are not to be pastured without a hards-man or keeper, on pain of forfeiture.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 55; Rec. N. Am., 1: 8.

Stuyvesant and his council pass an elaborate ordinance for the regulation of trade and navigation, providing for the establishment of a weekly market and an annual fair, and declaring the East River, from the Sound to the Bay, open and free for the passage of what quality or nation soever they may be." This ordinance regulates the retail and wholesale trade of New Amsterdam, prescribes Dutch weights and measures, limits trade on the Delaware and Hudson only to "the Burghers and Inhabitants" of New Amsterdam, and regulates the sale of ale, cider, and wine to three thousand guilders, and allows only those who own real estate below the Fresh Water (Kolck) "to have built or to buy Yachts, Sloops, or Vessels." Former restrictions relative to anchorage and discharge of cargoes are renewed. Concessions are In order to avert the persistent desolation of the Sabbath in New Amsterdam, Stuyvesant and the council, "with the pre-advise of the Minister of the Gospel" (Bacher), order that divine service with sermon shall be held "in the afternoon as well as in the forenoon;" and "during every three days Harvey Divine, and other customary avocations, trading and business either in Houses, Cellars, Shops, Ships, Yachts, or in the streets and markets," are forbidden under a heavy penalty. Drunkards are to be arrested and punished.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 98-99; Rec. N. Am., 1: 8-9. The ordering of conditions by Doctor Bacher of the Indies in May, 1650, is: 236.

The prohibitions that have been enacted against the sale of intoxicants to Indians, directly or indirectly, having been violated by a clandestine trade, which is evidenced daily by the sight of Indians "running drunk along the Manhattan," from which inhabitants distant from the town suffer "serious annoyance from drunken Indians," likely to engender "new troubles and wars;" a new ordinance is now passed, which prescribes "an arbitrary corporal punishment" upon offenders, as well as payment of fines.—

Maretie Jansen, widow of Dirck Cornelissen, receives a ground-brief (Leber Deeds, A: 218, New York) for a lot for a house, now covered by Nos. 20 and 22 Pearl St.—See Frontispiece, Vol. I, and I: 127; Key to the Dutch Grants, II: 399.

The council resolves to furnish guns and build a guard-house for the burgew corps (military) of New Amsterdam.—Cal. Hist.
MSS., Dutch, 117.

The council orders the officer of the burgew guard to fine such citizens as neglect to attend the guard in turn, or who behave in a disorderly manner, and to levy an execution in case the fine is not paid.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 118.

The council considers a petition from the farmers on Manhattan Island, in which they request a remission of the "tenths" for this year.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 118.

The council orders the taverns kept by Abraham Pietersen in New Amsterdam to be closed, on account of a murder committed previously.—Cal. Law, vol. I, May 23, 1650; See Castello Plan, II: 231-24; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 480.

The council of New Netherland finds that the company's mill
Aug. at New Amsterdam is nothing but a burden to the company, continually requiring repairs and providing an insufficient return from the leasing (pacht) to carry it on. It is considered, therefore, for the best interest and profit of the company that the mill be no longer farmed out, but that instead a miller be engaged at honest monthly wages, and that the miller's fees for grinding be paid to the receiver, out of which receipts the mill shall be kept in stock to cover his interest and the wages of the miller he pays.—Rec. N. Neth.
(Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 409 (N. Y. State Library).

On Aug. 23, the council formally resolved to engage a miller at 40 florins per month, and chose Abraham Pietersen, of Haerlem, as the most available person.—Ibid., 413. Pietersen had kept a tavern, which just a month before had been ordered closed for violation.

The ordinance against the sale of firearms, etc., to Indians, is renewed.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 101.

Rev. Johannes Cornelis Backer (or Backerus), writing on this date from Manhattan to the clergy of Amsterdam, remarks:
"The congregation here numbers about one hundred and seventy members. Most of them are very ignorant in regard to true religion, and very much given to drink. To this they are led by the seventeen tap-houses here. What has fruit's result therefrom, your Reverences will easily understand. You will also learn more in detail from the Records of the First, Master Jan Stevenson. If you could obtain from the Hon. Directors an order for closing these places, except three or four, I have no doubt, the source of much evil and great offense would be removed."

"The Rev. Brethren are requested to take care, that a pastor be sent to this congregation. He must be a man of full liberty in denouncing sin, for which he will find the way already prepared, and must do his duties with the good example of a decent life himself.

"It will also be necessary for the Rev. Brethren, to send over with such a preacher a good school-master, who not only knows his grammar, but also should be a man of pious life, and decent habits. He should have a good knowledge of the principal points of our Faith, and set a holy 1648 granted "to the Stranger and Inhabitant" of New Amsterdam, Mar. of a "Weekly Market-day, to wit Monday, and annually a Free Market for ten consecutive days," to begin on the first Monday after St. Bartholomew's day, i.e., Sept. 2, New Style, and-corresponding to the regular Amsterdam Fair. On these weekly and annual days "the Neighbor and Inhabitant," are to be allowed and permitted to supply the purchaser from a Booth, by the ell, weight and measure, wholesale and retail. The directors in Amsterdam disapproved of some of the trade provisions.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 86-92.

Feb. 16, 1647, against disposing of liquors during service on Sundays or on weeks-days after nine p.m., induces Stuyvesant and the council to renew that ordinance, henceforth to be observed strictly to the letter.

The cause of this infraction is declared to be "that this sort of business and the profit easily accruing therefrom divert and lead many from their original and primitive calling, occupation and business to resort to Tavern-keeping, so that nearly the just fourth of the city New Amsterdam consists of Brandon shops, Tobacco or Beer houses, by the multitude, whereof not only are more honorable Trades and occupations neglected and disregarded, but even the Common people and the Neglected's servants seriously debauched; and what is still worse, the Youth, seeing and following, as from their very childhood, this improper example of their Parents, are drawn from the path of Virtue and into all sorts of irregularity.
Hence, also, proceed Cheatings, Smuggling, and frauds, and the closest renewal of the Order and Brandon service is therefore necessary.

The council ratifies "the decision of commissioners appointed

The directors at Amsterdam, writing to Stuyvesant, refer to the church erected in Fort Amsterdam as follows: "The erection of a church building has really been necessary, but we notice also that it has been very expensive; the Colony cannot yet bear such expenses."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 84.

A proclamation is issued by Stuyvesant and his council for the observance of a general day of fasting and prayer in New Netherland, on account of the almost universal immodations, floods, shipwrecks, sickness, and pestilence, whereby thousands in Europe and America have met untimely death. New Netherland has suffered epecially from many rains and high seas. (Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 377 (N. Y. State Library).

Notice is given to Cornelis Jacobsen Stille, Gerrit Jansen of Oldenborn, Cornelis Claesen Swits, and Leendert Aerden, to lease in and cultivate the farms which the late Director-General Kieft granted them to beyond the Fresh Water on Manhattan Island, and that they are obligated to pay yearly the rents to which however they avoid, whilst neglecting to enclose and properly cultivate the soil. They are now threatened with the confiscation of their grants.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 383 (N. Y. State Library). These were the old Byleveld farm and land of the farms Nos. 5 and 6 of the West India Co., for which the patents had been given between 1645 and 1647.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 370, 372.
example to the children. In order to get the help of the church of God in this world, I think, we must begin with the children; for many of the older people are so far depraved, that they are now ashamed to learn anything good."—Eccles. Rec., I, 236.

8. Brant Aertsen van Slenchentorst, director of the colony of Renselaerswyck, issues a protest against Director-General Stuyvesant, in which he says that Stuyvesant has ordered "all the streets full of houses close under Fort New Amsterdam."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 94. Stuyvesant had, in an arbitrary manner, ordered Van Slenchentorst to remove a house at Fort Orange (Albany), on account of its alleged nearness to the fort, and even sought to force demolition by sending up soldiers and sailors. Therefore, Van Slenchentorst referred to the "General laws, and wishes that the General should take such needless trouble about the Patroon's Colony and worry himself about his buildings, whilst his Honor tolerates a number of streets full of buildings within thirty paces of Fort Manhattan where his government is, and does not apply a remedy there; more especially as the General himself writes under date of 3rd of May, 1649, that he is already expecting a war with the English, which God avert."—Ibid., XIV, 95-96.

18. Traders have come over to New Netherland, undersold residents, driven all his goods, and Stuyvesant and the council warn the inhabitants "to pay them without contradiction," and to pay them for any future employment.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 102-103; Rec. N. Am., I: 11.

28. Some of the inhabitants of New Netherland having employed Indians and then dismissed them without pay, thereby inspiring a threat of summary vengeance from these Indians, Stuyvesant and the council warn the inhabitants "to pay them without contradiction," and to pay them for any future employment.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 102; Rec. N. Am., I: 11.

Objections by the directors of the company at Amsterdam to provisions of this nature were voiced in the correspondence of March 12, 1654 (N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 251-52), and the modification suggested by them was promulgated by the ordinance which established the great and small burgert in New Amsterdam, on Jan. 19, 1657.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 298-300. See also N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1886), v 1 seq.

15. The fire-wards are ordered "to visit every house in this city or town, and to see all garrets kept clean; and if any persons do not properly clean by sweeping, and to oblige those in default immediately to pay the fine of three Guilders."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 102; Rec. N. Am., I: 10-11. See also Jan. 23.

2. "Juriaen Hendrickz[en] agrees [to build] for Jan Damen a house 60 feet long, with on both sides a passage way through; width, twenty-four feet deep; in front 11 feet high and in the rear 12 feet high, the floor being raised one foot in the rear and two feet in front. The front room 24 feet square, with a cellar underneath it. To lay and groove the attic floor; to wainscot the front room on all sides 2 bedsteads, one in the front room and one in the chamber; a window 23 inches, so that one can go through the window with a ladder, the front gable to be perpendicular, the rear gable sloping; a window with Mullion and transom [Grays Casing] in the front room; and a mantel piece. Juriaen Hendrickz must provide the roof frame of the house with split rafters and nail the laths. On each beam a half beam. Damen agrees to provide Hendrickz and his men with provisions and drink until the work is completed, and to pay, when done, 452 guilders down. The building operations are to commence in eight weeks."—Records N. Neth. (trans. by A. J. F. Van Lier), III: 22 (N. Y. State Library). This contract was for building Damen's so-called "great house," which must have been the building on Cedar St., immediately east of Broadway. This is one of the most detailed building contracts for a private individual which has been handed down from that period in New Amsterdam. See also Castellano, P., 339.

An ordinance is passed against harbouring, for more than a day, fugitive servants of the West India Co., or others.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., Oct. 25, 1647; Rec. N. Am., I: 11-12.

3. Jan Teunissen, sheriff of Brooklyn, is sentenced by the council for slander and abasing with the company's ferry-boat; he is to work 100 days for the company and 50 days for the church, and to give bail for the faithful performance of the work.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 120.

The "Peace of Westphalia" brings to an end the "Thirty Years War" between the Catholic and Protestant factions of Europe. The independence of the United Provinces of The Netherlands is recognized by Spain, and the "balance of power" is secured.

24. Pieter van der Linden is appointed by Stuyvesant and the council thereof and "rouwe" (quarter) master of the church at New Amsterdam, in the place vacated by Jan Stevensz, at a salary of 150 florins per annum. He filled the place ad interim until a more capable person could be brought over from Holland.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Conv. Min.), IV: 240.

3. Apparently, Jan Claesz, was charged on the books of the company with Lg20 to the "Malle Smits Berg," which he now promises to have transferred to the name of Ellicia Janis, having been paid Lg20 less Lg60. Did the West India Co. retain title to this land while Thomas Sandersen was in possession, or did it revert to the company after his death? They are not identical. Sandersen's rights to land were not completed, New Am., I: 11.

4. This land was originally in the possession of Thomas Sandersen, a smith, who lost his reason, from which fact the name of "Crazy smith's hill" was given to the elevation on his grant. See Manuscript Maps, II: 194.

5. Egbert van Borsum made a deposition, on March 10, 1649, that in December, 1648, when he was at the house of William Westerhuyzen, at New Haven, he "heard Cornelis Melyn say," in the presence of several Dutchmen and Englishmen, "that the High and Mighty Lords the States of the United Netherlands were greatly surprised that the English had not forcibly dragged Director Stuyvesant out of the Fort and hung him on the highest tree and that twenty-five thousand guilders damages each were awarded to him, Melyn and Jochem Pietersen [Kuyterj . . . Furthermore, Melyn said, . . . that he had seen letters with the States from which it appears that Mr. Stuyvesant had demanded from their High Mightinesses six to seven hundred soldiers to resist the English. To which letters their High Mightinesses and his Highness had answered, that it was not advisable to go to war with his neighbors for a foot of land. Melyn also said, I have brought Mr. Kieft to his grave; I shall surely bring Stuyvesant also there. The affiant declares that Melyn further indulged in other talk, so that he, the affiant, went away in order that he might no longer listen to the prattle."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 31 (N. Y. State Library).

The community of New Amsterdam was administered by the ordinance of July 25, 1647, to build at once decent houses upon their granted lots; but many of them were neglected. Moreover, it is now adjudged that their lots have been laid out too large and bigger than can be built upon by some of the inhabitants. Other persons are now desirous of building; yet scarcely a spot can be found on which a house can be built conveniently. Stuyvesant and the council ordered, therefore, that those who have made deeds shall be notified "once more for the last time to erect proper buildings on their lots," or in default the lots will be disposed of to those who are inclined to build houses in New Amsterdam, in which case the original owners will be indemnified, "at the discretion of the Street Surveyors."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 74, 105; Rec. N. Am., I: 1: "The Rump's Purge." The Bill of attainder was laid down to a fraction of its number; the career begins of the mighty "Rump," so called in the coarsest wit of the time because the rump was the "cutting part."—Homer, Life of Young Sir Henry Vane, 320.

About this time, George Gardiner made the following observations respecting New Amsterdam: "To the southwest of New England, lyeth the Dutch Plantation. It hath good ground, and good air; but few of that nation inhabiting there, which makes that there is few Plantations in the land, but one Village, whose inhabitants are part English, and part Dutch. Here is resident the the [illegible] Governour appointed by the West India Company. This Village lyeth on Hudson River in a go and a half, three miles within the mouth of the River, and almost paying to

A Fort that both Guns, but they are unmounted. There is the Fort of Orange, 30 miles up the said River, and there is a mill to saw boards for the Colony: they have here indifferent plenty of English and Indian Corn, but the trade is the same with the natives for Bever, and other drins. Those that trade here pay 16 in the hundred Custome to the West India Company of Holland. These Dutch are mischievous neighbours, for with their Indian trade they supply the natives with Guns and Ammunition, which in time of any war, our confusion and doth already prejudice their neighbours.—Gardiner, New World (1651), 92-94. For an account of this work, see Bibliography, Vol. V.

The "packhuyse" of the West India Co. (the pack-house or warehouse) was erected this year—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 105; Liber Patents, II i 70 (Albany), and in 1702. The site is now covered by No. 33 Pearl St. It was confiscated in 1665, and became the first English custom-house.—Ibid., I: 99. Being in a ruinous condition, it was granted, July 14, 1752 (q.v.), to Archibald Kennedy. See Castello Plan, II: 265-66; Key to the Dutch Grants, III: 384; C. Pl. 77, Vol. II; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 937; Pl. 174, Vol. III. For directions from the officers of the company in Holland regarding it, see Jan. 27.

The "Old Church Yard" is a phrase used in the records of this year. It referred to the burial-ground of New Amsterdam, which was on the site of what is now Nos. 27 to 37 Broadway, extending westward to the line of the Dutch Church of St. Peter, or larger grants for the church and a part of the Fort building now stand.—See Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82, 82e, Vol. II, and II: 332; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 407.

In this year, the "Breeden-Raady," the earliest separate publication concerning the city of New Amsterdam, was issued at Antwerp. For the history and contents of this work, see Bibliography, Vol. V.

In this year, a body of Puritans founds a settlement in Manhattan on the site of Annapolis.—Winor, III: 335.

Jan. The English house of commons resolves that, as representative of the people, it is the sole law-making power. See Jan. 30.

In a letter to Stuyvesant, the directors in Holland estimate that he must have received, since his arrival in New Netherland in 1647, "in values, money and goods about 170 to 180 thousand florins" ($68,000 to $72,000). They demand of him a "complete statement of the revenues and expenditures," and add: "Unquestioned are the increase of the church fund, or any part of it, in the trade with us, which was never completed and the repairs of the fortifications have cost something, but that cannot be so great a part of the aforesaid sum."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 103; cf. ibid., XIV: 119.

The letter continues: "We cannot understand, why your Honours have not declared, whether a storehouse or the trade with us, for we do not know, what it could be used for. It is true, you proposed, that the Company should open a saleroom there provided with all kinds of goods and you pointed out several measures for that purpose, for instance, to compel all private people to deliver the merchandise, which they import there, into the saleroom against a fair profit of 60 to 70 per cent."—Ibid., XIV: 105. For account of the pack-house, see 1649, supra.

The directors further say: "You think, that 10,000 l. in small coins could be sent there [New Netherland], it might be advisable to drive the wampum gradually out of the country, but your own judgment to the contrary, that in our present financial situation cannot be done, the more so as we are much troubled by our inability to supply the provisions, which you so urgently called for. If we do not receive the proceeds from the sale of hides, we shall be obliged, to leave your requisition unfulfilled."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 108.

Feb. 1. A resolution passed in the provincial council, as follows:

"The farmers on the Island Manhatsan seek by petition a free pastoruge on the Island Manhattan between the plantation of Shipmanos and the fence of the Great Bouwyer No. 1; the petitioners' request is provisionally granted, and it is ordered that no new plantations or cleared will be allowed in the vicinity."—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), IV: 416 (N. Y. State Library); N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 110.

Adriaen van der Donck is removed from the board of "Nine Men" for "committing Crimen issue Majestatis."—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 169, 20th Feb., cit. 350.

The "Rump Parliament" abolishes the office of king as "unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and public interest of the [English] people."—Gardiner, Const. Docs. of the Puritan Revolution (3d ed.), 384-85. The house of lords was abolished two days later.

Francis Doughty, a dissenting preacher, receives a ground-brief for a lot, the situation of which, on modern maps, would be in Battery Park, south of Battery Pl. and west of State St. He conveyed it, on April 30, 1652, to Charles Morgan. On this lot stood one of the houses ordered demolished by Colvile, in 1675, because it was too near the fort.—See Frontispiece, Vol. I, and II: 125; Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82, 82e, Vol. II, and II: 275; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 388.

Hendrick Janssen (de Ruiter), from Utrecht, receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house, the site to-day of No. 15 Broadway.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 388.

Stuyvesant having complied to the directors in Holland about the heavy duties imposed on tobacco raised in New Netherland, and, on Jan. 27, 1649, having obtained a concession that New Netherland tobacco should "henceforth not pay any more, than the tobacco coming from the West Indies, to wit 45 s. per hogshead," the reduction was conceded, because they wished to offset a tobacco monopoly that was carried on by the Swedes in the Delaware. This resolution of the directors is now proclaimed by an ordinance, issued by Stuyvesant and the council, to be "affixed not only here by the said Stuyvesant, but also to all other Colonies and Villages within this Jurisdiction," in the hope of encouraging farming.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 47; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 106-7.

Barent Jansen receives a ground-brief for a house on a lot which is now part of 29-31 Stone St., including the westerly part of the Curia building.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 407.

Because the ordinance of June 12, 1646, requiring all persons on legal instruments that are not drawn and attested properly, has been disregarded by some private persons, another ordinance is proclaimed by Stuyvesant and the council, making null and void "all affidavits, Interrogatories, or other Instruments serving as evidence, which are not properly written, or signed by two or three witnesses, not confirmed by oath before the Court." Henceforth, all affidavits, contracts, testaments, agreements, and other important documents are to be written by the secretary or some other duly authorized person.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 108.

Stuyvesant goes in person to the house of Dominique Johannes Cornelis van der Graeff (or der Graeffe) and officially orders him "not to read himself, or have read by any of the Church officers, from the pulpit or elsewhere in the church, at the request of any of the inhabitants, any writing, petition, or proposal having relation to the municipal or general government, whether generally or in particular," unless such writing is first translated by the director or the secretary, by order of the director and the council. Ecclesiastical affairs are excepted to the order.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 114. The motive of this act of Stuyvesant is to prevent publication by the representatives of the commonality of their remonstrances against him.—Rep. of New Netherland, N. Y. State Lib., 351.

Pauus Leendens van der Grift receives a ground-brief for a lot on the west side of Broadway, now No. 39.—See Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82, 82e, Vol. II, and II: 222-23; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 362. See also 1648. He is said "to have built a better dwelling-house here than anybody else."—Representatives (1649), in Jacobson's N. Neth., 339. This house was ultimately demolished, and a new house erected on its site by François Rombouts, in 1671.—Liber Deeds, Bt. 184 (New York). See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 953; and Pl. 174, Vol. III. See also May 14, 1649.
The Petition of the Delegates embodies a request that the states-general, who "cannot well have leisure as a body, being occupied by other public business," will examine their documents, appoint a committee "to examine the said Petition and Remonstrance," and "hear the Petitioners verbally."

In the New Netherland business, with a recitation of the causes that have led to "a very poor and most low condition" of the province. These causes are stated to be:

1. "Unsuitable government;"
2. "Scanty privileges and exemptions;"
3. "Onerous imports of duties, exactions and such like;"
4. "Long Contained War;"
5. "The Loss of the Province;"
6. "A superabundance of petty traders and peddlers (Schotten en Chinezen) and a want of Farmers and Farm Servants;"
7. "Great dearness in general;"
8. "The insufferable arrogance of the Natives or Indians, arising from our smaller numbers, etc."

After waiting, they say, "long in vain, for aid, redress and assistance from the Directors," they have "determined to fly for refuge" to the states-general. Among the things they desire is a "suitable municipal government, such as your High Mightinesses shall consider adapted to this Province, and somewhat resembling the laudable Government of our Fatherland." They also beseech that "at all cost and risk," "supply New Netherland with sufficient population to enable it to support, sustain and defend both Indians and others who may disturb and invade it . . . send some vessels hither in order that people, principally Farmers and Farm Servants may . . . be removed and conveyed gratuitously hither . . . order that all vessels proceeding and trading to those Southern parts of America should touch first in the harbors of the Netherland in New Netherland, and bring with them as many persons as seasonably present themselves, and they can conveniently carry at suitable fixed rates." Again, they seek "Exemption from imports, tenths and burthen, which, at the first beginning, are disadvantageous and oppressive, until the country becomes populous and somewhat permanently established;" also, "permission to export, sell, and barter grain, timber and all other wares and merchandise the produce of the Country, every way and every where your High Mightinesses have allays and have granted to the Netherlanders the privilege of trade and resort." Another request they make is that the home government "establish the Boundaries of this Country, both north and south, that all causes of difference, discord and trouble may be cut off and prevented: that your . . . subjects may live and dwell in peace and quietness and enjoy their liberty in trade and commerce within the established boundaries;" also, "preserve us in peace with the neighboring Republics, Colonies, and other your High Mightinesses' allies, so that we may pursue our country's trade, without let or hindrance, under proper regulations from your High Mightinesses, as well along the coast from Terra Nova to Cape Florida, as to the West Indies and to Europe, whoever the Lord our God shall be pleased to permit." They say, finally, that "in state and security, the inhabitants of this company or two of Soldiers here for the defence of those dwelling outside and in newly added plantations and colonies," it would "make manifest your High Mightinesses' earnest support of this Province to those who may be incredulous on that point."

As a further evidence that the petitioners intended to leave nothing undone to win over the home government to their cause, there is at The Hague another document entitled Observations on the preceding Petition (Fl. 8, Vol. IV). This takes the form of a running commentary on and responses to the High Mightinesses' faithful subjects."—N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 259-61.

THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

The Representation [or Remonstrance] of New Netherland (Vertaagh van Nieuw Nederland) is a bold arrangement of the incompetent administrations of Kieft and Stuyvesant. From internal evidence, as well as collateral documentary statements, it is evident that the work of Adriaen van der Donck was largely the work of Adriaen Wisselingh, who gave us no name for it. Secondly, it was for no reason nor in any real respect necessary. Thirdly, those against whom we waged war were ten times, yea, more than that, stronger than we who commenced hostilities. What is meant by "the loss of the Princess" is thus explained: "For in her were lost very exact Maps, fully a hundred different descriptions of Minorca and many other parts of China, now letters of the English think, explained: "To transport land, heels." Remark upon the "arrogance of the Natives or Indians," they say, in part: "It has been so long proclaimed, in New Netherland, that more people were coming, that the Indians laugh at it, and say: 'The Dutch do nothing but lie.'" The following comment goes with their appeal for some measures on the part of the home government that will increase the population: "Were there a thousand or fifteen hundred inhabitants in New Netherland, or even more, the Indians or the Swedes would never think or dream of daring to offer us any insult." Arguing for the gratuitous transportation of "Farmers and Farm servants," they say: "For traders and all such people have means, can go and come at their expence without any one's help." They strengthen their appeal for trade in "every way and everywhere" by calling attention to the fact that "Our neighbors in New England . . .
trade where they list without knowing either duty or suspicion." Regardine the settlement of boundaries, they say: "The English in that quarter readily admit that the country is justly ours; but their pretence [is] the richness of the land and that it lies waste; and, the Company will do nothing but protest, which they disregard, when admonished. Therefore, this matter is very urgent, if we are to be scoffed at by that nation and lose the country.
To attack them by force is too dangerous and innocuous in New Netherland. But their own offer is not unworthy consideration; for they frankly say—We have taken the land which was entirely, or for the most part, waste, and now occupy it; ye say 'it your's. Let us remain friends like our sovereigns, and refer this question to both your, and our superiors; what they do or order in the premises, we must admit, and neither of us will gain anything by talk." They define your High Mightinesses' allies as "the English who are beyond our limits . . .
New France, Virginia and the Caribbe West India Islands, &c., known to your High Mightinesses better than to us." And why, they ask, do they want a "suitable municipal government whereby all those interested in the country may also attend to its government and keep a watchful eye over it, without its being intrusted to a set of hairbrain people, such as the Company fings thiether, but to such as obtain in New England." They also think it advisable to accoordinate it with the states-general with the kind of government found in New England, thus: "Each town, no matter how small, hath its own court and jurisdiction, also a voice in the Capital, and elects its own officers. Few taxes are imposed, and these only by general consent. In their capital they have a Governor, a Deputy (which is, Viz.) Governor, a Councillor, that is Judge, a Secretary and two Provincial Councillors. In the individual towns they have a Constable, a Clerk and Selectmen. They call all these Magistrates, and, though they depend on the people, treat them with very great respect. Each town chooses, or may choose, its Magistrates annually, but they very rarely change them. The Governor and Deputy are chosen annually by the citizen province, although some have been continued from the beginning to their departure, or during their lives . . .
Nevertheless the People have a new election every year, and have power to make a change and they would make a change in case of improper behavior, and that they therefore say is the bridle of their great men. This is the mode of their election or choosing: Each town consults first by itself and sends then its deputies, and all these delegates choose the Governor, and he is for that year without any longer assurance. In the year following there is a new election, in form as stated, and every town the most voluntary it; these are elected as a Governor retires, he remains Deputy Governor."—N. Y. Col.

west side of Broadway (now Nos. 39-43), as is shown by the following: In the ground-floor residential lot was obtained by Van der Grift on May 14, 1649, as appears from a record in a confirmation from Gov. Nicolls, of June 1, 1667.—*Liber Patents, II: 73, in office of sec. of state, Albany. On the other hand, he obtained a ground-brief on July 19, 1649, for a lot on the Strand of the East River (now No. 37 Pearl St.), adjoining the "pack huys", to which he assigned the "Vandenberg". On July 25, 1659, Steenwyck issued a further grant permitting him to use the abutting stone wall of the "pack huys" as a party wall, which shows that Van der Grift's warehouse was not built before that date.—Confirmation of Nicolls, July 13, 1667, in *Liber Patents, II: 73, and confirmation of Love- lande August 12, 1667, in *Liber Patents, II: 74. The conveyance of property was conveyed by Johannes van Brugh, acting as the agent of Van der Grift, then out of the country, to Dr. Jacob Hendrickens Vanvervaeren. This deed conveyed also a passage of four feet in common between this lot and the property of Cornelis Steenwyck to the west, which abutting lot included a house, occupied by Rev. Samuel Driius at the time.—*Liber B: 196 (register's office, N. Y. Co.).

Steenwyck, in 1674, complained, in a petition, because the scheepens had awarded the passage or alley to Vanvervaeren, claiming that his patent and the declaration of the official survey proved that half of the alley belonged to him. In this document, Steenwyck says: "It appeared to him, from the very face of the records, and to his Honors that long after the same were obtained and the three houses built, Paulus Loendertsz obtained his patent for the lot lying between those houses and the Company's Warehouse, upon which lot he erected a building extending to the extreme edge of the Strand."

The representation was received by the states-general on Oct. 13, and referred to the "Deputies for the affairs of the West India Company" (*N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 319-26). Many documents are preserved which testify to the discussion around (ibid., I: 317-47, 339-59, 428-32). After the departure of his colleague, Vander Donck continued to plead for the reforms, and did not fail to arouse the ill will of the West India Co., which went indeed so far as to detain him after he wished to leave (ibid., I: 476). Of the controversy and its results, Jameson says: "So effective an exposition of the colony's value and of its misgovernment could not fail to awaken consideration and sympathy ... a few concessions were made—the export duty on tobacco was taken off, and a municipal government allowed to New Amsterdam (see Feb. 2, 1653). ... But no serious alteration in the provincial government resulted. Quoted from N. Y. Col. Doc., IV: 145, 152. After the departure of his colleague, Vander Donck continued to plead for the reforms, and did not fail to arouse the ill will of the West India Co., which went indeed so far as to detain him after he wished to leave (ibid., I: 476). Of the controversy and its results, Jameson says: "So effective an exposition of the colony's value and of its misgovernment could not fail to awaken consideration and sympathy ... a few concessions were made—the export duty on tobacco was taken off, and a municipal government allowed to New Amsterdam (see Feb. 2, 1653). ... But no serious alteration in the provincial government resulted. Quoted from N. Y. Col. Doc., IV: 145, 152.

Mrs. Van Rensselaer, in Hist. City of N.Y. Vol. I, Chap. XIX, notes that there were both legal and intercolonial conditions disclosed in the Remonstrance and other documents relating to New Netherland in 1649. These documents show that the Dutch and semi-Dutch inhabitants of Manhattan and its neighbourhood were making their struggle for autonomy unsupported. ... It is not even very instructively true, as has often been said since Baerout confirmed that the 'large emigration from New England' inspired New Netherland's desire for self-government.'

As Domine Johannes Cornelissen Backer (or Backerus) is on the point of returning to Holland (See July 22, 1647), the council resolves to request Domine Johannes Megapolens, late of the colony of Rensselaerswyck, to 'supply' the church of New Amsterdam, 'that at least one clergyman remain in this province among the Dutch people, both for this capital and Rensselaer's Colony, were it only for administering Baptism to the children who are commonly presented here every Sunday at the Manhattan for baptism alone, sometimes one, sometimes two, year even 3 and 4 together.'—*N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 116. Megapolens had come to New Netherland in 1642, under a contract to serve in Rensselaerswyck for six years. His time had expired, and, like Backer, he was awaiting a ship at New Amsterdam in which to return to Holland. At this time, Steenwyck and the council just mentioned praised the service of the West India Co., as minister of the church at Manhattan, and to this he consents. He served here until his death, in January, 1650.—*Van Rensselaer Bouwer Manuscripts, 606-8, 623, 828. Eccles. Rec., I: 153-57, 226, 227, 243, 248-52, 261-66, 607.

Africam James van Eipelmond, "at present schoolmaster here on High St. of Manhattan," gives power of attorney to "the worthy Sybolt Claesen, at present about to depart on voyage to other land," to "collect such sum of money, means, effects and goods as may be coming to him, the principal, by inheritance from his friends relative[s], at Leyden, or elsewhere."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's tran.), III: 60 (N. Y. State Library). This is believed to have been the earliest certain reference to a private schoolmaster in New Netherland. It is also the only known record relating to Eipelmond as a schoolmaster in New Amsterdam. See Kilpatrick, Dutch Schools in N. Neth., III; for biography, see Early Records of Albany, III: 15-18.

Aert Stuyvesant, as elder of the church of New Amsterdam, on behalf of its consistory, writes to the classis of Amsterdam, among other things, as follows: 'We need a pious and diligent schoolmaster and preacher. A year has now passed since we were deprived of such help. By this our young people have gone backward, even to grow wild—paar nink agenten mal aeger dissist. In view of the fact that a good schoolmaster is not less needed here than a good preacher, as we have above explained in detail to your Reverences and to the Hon. Directors, we rely upon your usual excellent facilities and pius zeal for securing the one, and a favorable decision in the other. We hope, that in a short time we shall have occasion to thank you for both. Eccles. Rec., 62.'

In compliance with this appeal, Willem Vestius, Vestsens, or Vestiens, was appointed, and he sailed in the "Valkenier" (Falcooner), in April, 1650. He officiated as schoolmaster, preacher, sexton, and comforter of the sick, but his services were considered unsatisfactory by the authorities in New Amsterdam. When he applied, in 1654, for an increase of salary, he was told: 'if the service did not suit him, he might ask for his discharge.' In Nov., 1654, he asked the classis of Amsterdam for his release, and his petition was presented to the council at Manhattan on Jan. 26, 1655. His resignation was recorded on March 24, when Harmen van Hoboockers was appointed his successor. He was back in Holland in June, when he applied for a place in the East Indies.—*N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 119, 121-24; Eccles. Rec, I: 315, 316, 318; letter of Megapolens, in Jameson's N. Neth., 391-92; Col. Hist. Miss., Dutch, 145, 147.

Gerrit Jansen van Oldenburgh conveys to Thomas Hall, by deed recorded June 18, 1653 (Liber III: 35-4, Albany), a piece of land containing 253 morgens and 125 roods, together with a valley lietherto occupied by the farm called the Pannebackers, or Bouwery No. 5. (This should be No. 4.) Hall subsequently—that is, on Oct. 19, 1662—conveyed this land, with additional property, to Cornelis Steenwyck and Oloff Stevensen von Cordtal, who were confirmed by Nicolls in its possession in March, 1666.—Liber Patents, IV: 17 (Albany). See Feb. 17, 1646, and The Manatus Maps, I: 188-99.

A deed is executed whereby Gerrit Jansen exchanges the land called the "Mallesmitsbergh" for a house and farming to Thomas Hall. Thomas Hall takes the land, dwelling-house, etc., near the bowling of Cornelis Claesenets Swits and Stille. The "Mallesmitsbergh" was the "Crazy Smith's Hill," formerly occupied by Thomas Sanders, and then the property of Thomas Hall.—Dutch Miss., III: 68—past nink agenten mal aeger dissist.

Scarcity of crops and a consequent scarcity of bread among the inhabitants during the past year induce Stuyvesant and the council to ordain that, "until further Order and a larger supply of grain," no beer will be permitted to "malt or brew any Wheat," on pain of forfeiture and "an arbitrary penalty." Exportation from New Netherland of wheat, rye, or baked bread is for the time interdicted. By another ordinance, of this date, the baking of white bread and cakes for sale to inhabitants or Indians is stopped for a time, but allowed for private consumption. An assize on bread, the first recorded for New Netherland, is established.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 111-13; Rec. N. Am., I: 13-15.

Frauds and smuggling having been carried on to defraud the excise, an ordinance is passed by Stuyvesant and the council forbidding all brewers to "tap, sell or give away by the small measure any beer, Wine or Liquor to any Man to take for the latter during meal times. Moreover, brewers are not to deliver their product unless they have first obtained a permit from the chief clerk of the provincial secretary.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 112-13; Rec. N. Am., I: 13.

— The appearance of New Amsterdam at this time is shown by a wash drawing dated 1650 and signed by Laurens Bloed. This drawing, which is owned by the N. Y. Hist. Soc, is reproduced as Fig. 19. See also Pl. 6, Vol. I.

— The prototype (drawing) of the Visscher series of views of New Amsterdam was made at a slightly later period, probably in 1651-3. It is reproduced and described as the Frontispiece of Vol. I. See also Figs. 7b, 7c, 8, Vol. I. Perhaps the earliest engraved view of this type is one probably engraved before 1664, having a wide foreground full of canoes and boats, one of three known copies of which is owned by Mr. Wm. G. Kelso, Jr.

An official list of the employees of the West India Company in New Netherland, in the handwriting of Hans Bentementel, one of the directors at Amsterdam (see reproduction on Pl. 8, Vol. IV), may be summarized as follows: Director Petrus Stuyvesant, salary 250 guilders monthly, and subsistence 900 guilders per annum; Lambert van Dineckelen, vice director, salary 120 guilders per month, and no allowance for subsistence; Fiscus Hendrick van Dyck, salary 60 guilders per month, and no allowance for subsistence; Johannes la Montagne, councilor, salary 50 guilders per month, and subsistence 200 guilders per annum; Secretary Cornelis van Tienhoven, salary 36 guilders per month, and subsistence 200 guilders per annum; Commissary Adriaen de Kyzer, salary 36 guilders per month, and subsistence 200 guilders per annum; Peter Visscher, engraver, 30 guilders per month, and subsistence 200 guilders per annum; Captain-Lieutenant Brian Nottson, 50 guilders, and 200 guilders subsistence per annum; the commies at Fort Hope, Gysbert van Dyck (see for op Dyck), 50 guilders, and 160 guilders board money; Bahrur Burgeois Jacob Hendrikse, 20 guilders, and 100 guilders board money per annum; an ensign, 42 guilders, and 200 guilders subsistence per annum; Sergeant Daniel Eitshoff, 18 guilders, and 100 guilders subsistence per annum; a corporal, 18 guilders, and 100 guilders subsistence per annum; a cadet [Adelheid], 10 guilders, and 200 guilders subsistence per annum; foreman of the laborers at the Heerenmoms, 50 guilders, and 80 guilders board money per annum; clerk, 20 guilders, and 100 guilders board money per annum; soldiers, 8 to 9 guilders, and 75 guilders subsistence per annum; court messenger, 250 guilders per annum; keeper of the negroes, 25 guilders, and 100 guilders board money per annum; a midwife, 100 guilders per annum; the commies at Fort Orange, Carel van Bougge [Charles Bridge], 50 guilders, and 200 guilders board money per annum; a precentor, no amounts given; a schoolmaster, 32 guilders, and 100 guilders board money for annum; two preachers, each 100 guilders per month, and 40 guilders per month board money.—N. Y. Hist. Papers, No. 1223, in N. Y. Pub. Library. In the same Collection, No. 1224, there is a similar, though shorter, list, undated, but about 1644 or 1655, which includes, among particular items the city court, three clergymen, and 250 soldiers. See also, Dec. 15, 1644, and Feb. 2, 1653.

— Paulus Leendertszon Vander Graff builds a warehouse upon the Strand (Liber Patents, III: 102, Albany), on the site of the present Nos. 31 Pearl St. It is shown on the Frontispiece, and on Pls. 8a and 9, Vol. I. See also Castello Plan, II: 265; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 963.

In a "Short Digest," exhibited at a meeting of deputies of the states-general, reference is made to wampum as money, thus: "Neither has any order been made relative ..., to the currency in wampum or coin, notwithstanding the people have petitioned and shown how it ought and could be effected."—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 336. See also April 18, 1641; Nov. 30, 1647; Jan. 27, 1648. July 27 and 28, 1649.

The following reference to wampum as money is made in the answer of the West India Co. to the Remonstrance from New Netherland: "Herefore there has been no currency but Wampum among the common people, in New Netherland; the Wampum which formerly passed at the rate of four for a silver, was reduced to six."—N. Y. Col. Docs., II: 144. See also Jan. 27, 1652.

— Certain that "no secret, clandestine abuses and frauds" have been going on in the sale and transfer of real estate, "such as Homes, Gardens, House lots and other lands, to the serious injury of Creditors," an ordinance is passed by Stuyvesant and the council for preventing these abuses. This edict charges the provincial secretary, or one in his absence the chief clerk, "not to give any sale or on any pretended Deed of Real Estate" until it has been "examined and approved by the Director and Council." A regular court day, and declares null and void "all Contracts and Conveyances" passed "without their approbation, ratification and signature."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 114; Rec. N. Am., I: 15.

The directors at Amsterdam complain in a letter to Stuyvesant against the land claims of Van Twiller and others in New Netherland. Among other things, they say that Van Twiller "took the whole of Nut [Governor's] Island and Hellgate without either planting or building on the former during the whole time, that he was bound to do so," and they intend, therefore, "to assert, that their rights have lapsed and that the said colonies" have "reverted to their Line of Division."—Rec. N. Am., I: 143; March 21, 1643, in ibid, XIII: 27. See also July 1, 1652.

Replying to a letter of Stuyvesant, the directors at Amsterdam write: "You say that the late Director [Kieft] has granted patents for four or five bowerys across the Fresh Water, and that you cannot find, that any advantage accrued thitherfrom for the Company; that further the settlers are heavily indebted to and great enemies of the Company; this matter must be examined into, but we do not intend to disturb any one in his rights because of our own troubles; we repeat only, that in a new country, with only a small population, minor matters must be overlooked."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 111.

In Secretary Van Tienhoven's document of information delivered to the states-general, he says that "the [Indians] mine of New Netherland" was wampum at the "point,"—that is Montauk Point, Long Island.—N. Y. Col. Docs., II: 17.

Wolphiert Webber receives a ground-brief for a lot which is described under date of Nov. 25, 1686 (p. i.), when the same was patented to William Merritt. On modern maps, this tract would lie generally between Park Row and Madison St., and Pearl and Oliver Sts.—See Pl. 174, Vol. III.

In a report made by a committee of the states-general, entitled "A Provisional Order respecting the Government, Preservation and Peopling of New Netherland," it is recommended, among other things, that there be granted "within the city of New Amsterdam a municipal government, consisting of one sheriff, two town magistrates, and three aldermen," and that the "Nine Men" should in the meantime "continue three years longer, and have jurisdiction over small causes arising between Man and Man, to adjudicate definitely on suits not exceeding the sum of fifty guilders and on higher amounts under privilege of appeal."—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 391. This was the foundation on which the municipal concessions of 1663 were built. It was the direct result of the Remonstrance of 1649 (see July 28).

An ordinance is passed amending the ordinance of Nov. 8, 1648, for regulating the baking and sale of bread.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 114; Rec. N. Am., I: 15.

In a record of the year 1653, there is a reference to a ground-brief for a lot west of what is now the junction of South William and Beaver Sts., running through the block from one street to the other.—See Castello Plan, C, Pls. 82, 82e, Vol. II, and II: 201; Map of Dutch Grants, C, Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 299.

Stuyvesant and the council pass an ordinance against the obstruction of streets, paths, and highways, by falling trees or placing stones in them, and requiring that the same be kept passable. The full text of the ordinance is lost, but the substance is given in Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 114, 345; and in Rec. N. Am., I: 162.

An unknown grantee, probably William Frederickse (Bos),—I: 175—receives a ground-brief for land at the present south-west corner of Morris St. and Broadway.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C, Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 361.

Owing to the circulation of fraudulent wampum, and because of the daily depreciation of the wampum, which has become so poor in quality that it is often rejected by traders, Stuyvesant and the council pass an ordinance which provides that no wampum except that strung on a cord shall be considered good pay. The rates are fixed at six white or three black beads to the stover, or, if the wampum is of poor quality, then eight white or four black beads to a stover. —Rec. N. Am., I: 145-176; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 115-16. See also Man. Com. Courn. (1655), 547. See, further, Sept. 14, 1650; April 4, 1672.

Fort New Amsterdam, "formerly in tolerable condition," June having been considerably "trodden down by Hogs, Goats and Swine," men are on the seventh of February in repairing and restoring the same.—I: 175.

In order to prevent a repetition of this damage, Stuyvesant and the council pass an ordinance, in which every inhabitant is warned that Stuyvesant is informed in a letter from the directors at Amsterdam that “many free people” have taken passage on two ships, the “Fortuny” and the “Jager,” destined for New Netherland, and he is advised to “allow to each according to his capacities and family circumstances” the quantity of land reserved by the Exemptions for the Company, as for instance at Pavonia, which the Company bought in for certain reasons.”

The directors add that it looks as though many people would go over by every ship, and they desire Stuyvesant to “accommodate all newcomers as well as possible and above all govern the people with the utmost caution and prudence.”

Augustine Heerman, citing the arbitrariness of Stuyvesant toward the commonalty, writes: “I had, indeed, brought a flag with me for the Burgurers of [New Amsterdam], but Stuyvesant would not allow me to carry it.”

The article also provides a summary of the term “herrin.”

In the minutes of the chief participants of the West India Co. at Amsterdam is a record, under date of Nov. 1, 1650, concerning communications from New Netherland, as follows: “Chairman reads letters from New Netherland arrived by the ship Vlackenier, signed by Director Peter Stuyvesant, dated Sept. 12, 1650, Manhattan in N. N. Wrote by two earlier vessels, Blijemand and Graec van Holland. Maas (Masons) have taken some Frenchmen prisoners and threaten to burn them at the stake unless they are ransomed, in which Stuyvesant foresees trouble, as he does not wish to encourage them in doing so. Asks for 30 soldiers, 20 sailors, 3 ship carpenters and some supplies. Ship Driel repaired; yacht Prins Willems gone to Boston for salt; De Lijsier not repaired owing to lack of supplies. Carpenters ask fl. 4 a day and do as they please. Hopes to put Fort Amsterdam soon in good condition (vaille satisfaction). Conscripted a small ship. Asks for money. Aug. Heerman, coming from Virginia, parted Manhattan with his cargo, going to New England, and returned with his empty ship, to the great damage of the Company. Van Twiller and Coehoorn have from 1600 to 2000 morgens of land on Long Island; Wollert Geritte and Henke also 1600 or 1800 morgens. They cannot clear them; land lies idle, to the damage of the Company. On Staten Island; Melyn has 400 families and 2500 morgens cultivated. Patroon should have 50 persons. Melyn has not 1/6 thereof. Many private traders who came over in the Vlackenier spoil the trade by giving fl. 11 for the beaver. Dated 1650, Aug. 15, from the Manhattan. Signed: P. Stuyvesant Jacob Kip.

The dates here involved, namely Aug. 15, and Sept. 12, 1650, represent those of two different letters from Stuyvesant, condensed in the minutes quoted; but the minutes do not differentiate the contents of the letters. The reply of the directors at Amsterdam, dated March 21, 1651 (p. 493), helps us to understand the subjects alluded to (see N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 111, ff.—Records of old West India Co., At the Hague, No. 17 (lettered “N° 5 Hoofdparticiapantsboeck”), fol. 26-26 verso, trans. by A. J. F. van Lier.

The ordinance of May 30 of this year, so far as it relates to poorly strung wampum, is not observed, as the traders refuse to accept it as currency. Stuyvesant and the council, therefore, issue another ordinance, in which they command the acceptance by everyone of “the poor strung Wampum . . . for small and daily necessary commodities required for housekeeping, as a current.” The law between these two ordinances is “at only,” and in proportionately increased amounts for mixed qualities.

Articles of agreement are concluded at Hartford, Conn., “between the Arbitrators of the Honble Commissioners of the United Coloyiies and Petrus Stuyvesant, Director of New Netherland.”

An extract from these articles, with respect to the boundary line "between the United English Provinces of New Jersey and Dutch Province of New Netherland," shows the following:

1. That on Long Island, a line drawn from the westernmost point of Oyster bay, and thence in a direct and straight course to the sea shore, shall be the boundary between the Dutch and English on Long Island; the Eastern part for the English, and the western part for the Dutch.

2. The boundary on the Mainland shall begin on the west side of Greenwich bay, being about four miles from Stamford, and thence run inland in a northerly course Twenty miles, provided it shall not come within ten miles of the North river; but that as it shall be agreed upon by the two Governors—i.e., of the Dutch and New Haven; and 'tis agreed that the Dutch shall not at any time hereafter build any houses within six miles of the said line; the inhabitants of Greenwich to remain until further order and consideration under the government of the Dutch.

3. The Dutch shall hold and occupy the land at Hartford which they now actually possess, known by divers marks and tokens, and all the remaining lands on both sides of the Fresh river to beseg and remain to the English there. And it is in like manner agreed that the aforesaid Boundary both on the Island and Mainland shall be observed and kept inviolate both by the United English Colonies and the Dutch Nation, without any further extension or trouble on either side, until there be a final conclusion determined upon in Europe, by the mutual consent of both the States of England and Holland.

Concerning the proposition of a closer union and friendship between the English and the Dutch Nation in these parts, especially against a common enemy: We judge it to be worthy of good consideration by the United Colonies, and in like manner, desire it may be communicated and recommended to them, that a resolution therein may be taken at the next annual meeting of the Commissioners. These articles of agreement, since known as the Treaty of Hartford, are signed by Symon Broodsreete and Thomas Prence for the English, and Thomas Wiltet and George Baxter for the Dutch.—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 611-12; N. Y. Col. Docs., XVI: 245; Bowen, The Boundary Disputes of Conn. (1882), 17, 69 et seq.; Broadshead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 218-21.

On Nov. 26 (p. 5), Stuyvesant sent to Amsterdam a report of this meeting. The treaty was ratified by the states-general on Feb. 22, 1656 (p. 5).

William II, stadthouder of The Netherlands, dies, "a victim to his own intemperance." Nov. 6

Stuyvesant sends to the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co. a report of the transactions of the commissioners of the English colonies, whom he joined at their appointed meeting "at Hartford [Hartford] on the Fresh river" (Connecticut River) to consider a provisional treaty at sea. They "considered also that there was a discussion respecting the formation of a neighborly union in form of a league or guarantee against the offensive insolence and arrogance of the Barbarians and Natives." Stuyvesant states that the English commissioners "appeared to us disposed in favour of the project; But as the English nation is so much stronger than ours in these parts, I propose that the Commissioners in such extremity, whether defensive or offensive, ought to bring a double number at least to our single quota. To which they replied, that they then ought to have a double vote in declaring the lawfulness of the defence, or offence, that their High Mightinesses and the Company might consider disputeable.

This document is endorsed: "Provisional Boundary between the English and our Nation agreed upon at the Meeting of the Colonies at Horsfort A° 1650 [see Sept. 10], respecting the lands situate in the North part of America, wherein our portion under the Director and Charter of the West India Company, is now named New Netherland, and that portion belonging to the English, namely, the Country at the South, is by them called Virginia; the other Countries taken up by them are named New England."—N. Y. Col. Docs., II: 248-49, and see also Nov. 15, 1651.

In a written statement, prepared at The Hague and bearing this date, Cornelia van Tienhoven, the secretary of the director and council of New Netherland, makes official answer to the Representation or Remonstrance of Van der Donck and his associates (see
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

1650—July 8, 1649. Among the noteworthy observations of this Nov. “Answer” are the following:

29 “... These persons complain because they considered the Company’s fort not worthy of a church. Before the church was built, the grist-mill could not grind with a south-east wind, because the wind was shut off by the walls of the fort.”

The new school is not yet built; but “a place has been selected for a school, where the school is kept by Jan Cornelissen,” while other schoolmasters keep school in hired houses. There is no Latin school or academy. (See also Kilpatrick, Dutch Schools of Neth. N. Y., pp. 35, 95.)

The deacons are responsible for the management of the poor fund. The taxes imposed in New Netherland are compared with those in New England.

“It will not appear, either now or in the future, that 30,000 guilders were collected from the commonalty in Stuyvesant’s time; for nothing is received besides the beer and wine excise, which amounts to about 4,000 guilders a year on the Manhattan. From the other villages situated around it there is little or nothing collected, because there are no tappers, except one at the Ferry [the hamlet opposite Manhattan on the East River], and one at Flushing.” (See also N. Y. Col. Doc., II: 245.)

Answering still another point in the Representation, Van Tienhoven writes: “Who are they who have complained about the haughtiness of Stuyvesant? I think they are such as seek to live without law or rule.” In this connection he adds later: “No body can prove that Director Stuyvesant has used for justice or to, or railed at as clowns, any persons of respectability who have treated him decently. It may be that some profligate has given the Director, if he has used any bad words to him, cause to do so.”

In regard to the use of wampum as money, he says: “Their complaint that no regulation was made in relation to wampum is untrue. During the time of Director Kieft [see April 18, 1641] good sewer passed at four for a stiver, and the loose bits were fixed at six pieces for the stiver. The reason why the loose sewer was not prohibited, was because there is no coin in circulation, and the laborers, farmers, and other common people having no other money, would be great losers; and had it been done, the remonstrants would, without doubt, have included it among their grievances.” (See also Nov. 30, 1647.)

He refers to the repairs of the fort as the foundation of the company, and not the concern of the inhabitants.

“When a house is erected, an annual ground-rent in beavers must be paid; and all the farmers must do the same, which they call obtaining the right to trade.”

He speaks of the ingratitude of settlers whom the company has helped, and who now refuse to pay “the tenth.” He quotes their provision should be made for ecclesiastical and municipal property, church services, an orphan asylum and an almshouse,” and comments: “... let them lead the way in generous contributions.”

In closing, he gives a brief account of each person who signed the “Remonstrance.” Ool Adriaen van der Douch, for example, he says: He “has been about eight years in New Netherland. He went there in the service of the proprietors of the colony of Renselaerswyck as an officer, but did not continue such, though he lived in that colony till 1646.” Regarding all the remonstrants, he sums up: “In brief, these people, to give their doings a gloss, say that they are bound by oath and compelled by conscience; but if that were the case they would not assail their benefactors, the Company and others, and endeavor to deprive them of this noble country, by advising their removal, now that it begins to be like something, or not that there is a prospect of the Company getting its own again. And now that many of the inhabitants are themselves in a better condition than ever, this is evidently the cause of the ambition of many, etc.”—Jameco, Nar. N. Neth., 357-77.

At some time prior to this year, Augustine Herrmans built a warehouse upon the Strand, and in this year, 1651, conveyed the same to the Estate of Pieter Gabry, deceased, of Amsterdam.—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), III: 89 (N. Y. State Library). It is recorded on the ground now the Lee and Pearl St. warehouse, because the property of an enemy subject in Holland, was confiscated by the British under the act of Oct. 10, 1665, quoted in Liber Patents, I: 99 (Albany). The building is shown on the Frontispiece, and Pls. 8a and 9, Vol. I. See also Castello Plan, II: 266; Landmark Map Rev. Key, III: 961.

In this year, Joost Harriger, an Amsterdam publisher, brought out a composite tract (see Bibliography, Vol. V, for particulars) entitled: Beschrijvinge van Fort Nieuw Amsterdam, which contained, among other pictures, a copperplate view entitled “Fort Nieuw Amsterdam op de Manhattans,” the earliest known representation of the little settlement, which it is supposed to depict about 1625-30. It is reproduced and described in Vol. I, Pl. 15. At some time during the years 1641 to 1655, inclusive, the N. Y. Vischer Map (Pls. 7-b, Vol. I) was issued, containing an inset view (Pls. 8-a, Vol. I) which depicts New Amsterdam at that period. This view appeared also on other maps of this series, for mention of which see 1647 and description of the Vischer View, p. 172, Vol. I.

Toussaint Briel receives a ground-lease for a lot on the north side of the present Beaver St., the Morris building to-day covering the site.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, and p. 371, Vol. II.

Manuel de Sangle, a free negro, receives a ground-lease (Liber Patents, II: 152, Albany) for a piece of land to the east of the land of Hans Kierrsted, probably later a part of the Bayard east farm, being bounded “east-and-by-south” by The Bowery.

At the provincial secretary’s office appear Paulo de Angola, a negro, and Clara Cricole, a negroess, both belonging to Capt. Johan de Vries, deceased, of the one part, and Symon Joosten, of the other part, who declare that they amicably agreed regarding a claim which has appeared, and for which Mr. Paulo de Duentes, for Six hundred guilders, loaned money, to the effect that he, Paulo d’Angola, for himself and his two children and Clara Cricole, also, for the child of said Vries, a minor, for the said aforesaid claim, transport and convey a certain parcel of land situated on the east side of the Elckel of the Fresh-water, to them belonging according to the ground lease thereof ... on this condition, however, that, if the aforesaid Six hundred guilders be paid for Capt de Vries in Patria (Holland) to Abraham Jansen, as attorney, he Symon Joosten shall be obliged to deliver to Paulo de Cunha or the child of Jan de Vries as large and a like quantity of land as is now received for the aforesaid claim. In the meanwhile he, S. Joosten may transfer the aforesaid land back to Mr. Augustyn Herrmans, with power to enter upon, and cultivate the same as he shall think proper.”

On March 31, Joosten conveyed the property to Herrmans “according to the ground lease dated 14th July A.D. 1645, granted by ... Kieft for the behoof of Paulo d’Angola, late the negro of Capt. Jan de Vries.”—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), III: 75 (N. Y. State Library). Capt. Jan de Vries (or Fries), father of the mulatto child, was commander of the ship “Blue Cock.” They had arrived there to trade to the Indians of the New Netherland, during Kieft’s Indian war, in which he also took part.—N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 205-7, 211.

Frederick Jansen receives a ground-lease for a house and garden at (present) Nos. 21-23 Broadway. The original grant is in the library of J. Pierpont Morgan, Esq.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and p. 361.

Stuyvesant purchases the company’s great bowery No. 1. The record of the transaction is as follows: “This day ... have the underwritten Directors, thereunto requested and authorized by Resolution of the Assembly, dated the second instant [March], sold to Jan Jansen Dumen, attorney and agent of Petrus Stuyvesant, director general of New Netherland and Curacao, who here above acknowledges to have purchased, the Company’s bowery in New Netherland, aforesaid, with the appendages thereof, consisting of a dwelling house, barn, barrick, linds, six cows, two horses and two young Negroes, all in such condition as the said bowery is at present cultivated and occupied by the aforesaid Stuyvesant, in order to be possessed in full ownership by him, his heirs and descendants, or their assigns, according to the deed and conveyance which the Council there is hereby ordered shall be authorized to grant and execute, to which aforesaid bowery the said Jan Jansen Dumen in quality and on the behalf aforesaid, hath promised, and doth hereby promise, to pay, or otherwise to make good to the Company, at the time of the conveyance aforesaid, a sum of six thousand, four hundred guilders once. In consideration of the two instruments of liberty and for are made hereof and signed by both sides in Amsterdam.”—Records N. Neth. (O’Callaghan’s trans.), III: 205 (N. Y. State Library).
CHRONOLOGY: THE DUTCH PERIOD: 1626–1664

They also state that they have engaged in Amsterdam "as bookkeeper in New Netherland Johannes Dyckman," their former clerk," at 50 fl. per month exclusive of subsistence money, and they commend him to Stuyvesant for promotion when occasion offers. Continuing they report: "In order to increase the population of New Netherland and to promote the trade in the West, we have resolved, therefore, to send to New Netherland from England Virginia or New England, a duty of 16 per cent. and that all goods sent there from New Netherland shall pass free duty, so that the practice of some people, who ship their goods to New England and then enter them in New Netherland under the lower duty, may be stopped, and no amerce be done to the merchants who ship their goods directly from here to New Netherland." It must have been immediately upon receipt of this order in New Amsterdam (not in 1652 as averred by O'Callaghan in Laws & Ord. N. Yeth., 126) that an ordinance was passed imposing a duty of 16 per cent on merchandise imported into New Netherland from New England (the text of the edict being now lost).—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 138-39.

Brian Newton receives a ground-brief for a lot at the present

Under this date, in the minutes of the chief participants of the West India Co. at Amsterdam, is the following record: "Decided that C. van Tienhoven, as secretary and receiver [of the company in New Netherland], shall be provided with quarters within [the fort] by Director PF van Stuyvesant. —N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 139-40. Of the "old West India Co. (the N. P. of participants boek)," fol. 13 verso, trans. by A. J. F. van Lier.

Complaints having been made against extortionate prices June charged by retailers of wine, brandy, and other strong drink, and by bakers of bread, "to the great damage and loss of the Commonwealth and many private inhabitants," the situation is brought to the attention of Stuyvesant and the council by the board of "Nine Men," or selectmen of the commonalty. This leads to the promulgation of an ordinance for regulating the assize on various kinds of bread, and the prices on wines, brandies, and other strong drink. The former ordinances against brewers retailing their brewed beer are rescinded.—Laws & Ord. N. Yeth., 119-22. This ordinance inaugurates a policy of fixing a maximum price. On Aug. 18, 1653, the retailing price on wines and brandy was fixed anew.—Ibid., 148. The general policy of fixing a maximum was disapproved by the directors at Amsterdam (in their letter to Stuyvesant and the council, of March 12, 1654), who said that their own experience should have taught them "the impossibility of carrying it out," as such an order could give only great dissatisfaction and bred trouble. Therefore, "to prevent this to future," the directors resolved to command them to "act strictly in accordance with the lawful customs and ordinances of the colony," as far as it was possible to do so.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 254.

Jan Jansen Damien having died on the 8th instant, his widow, "Adriaen Jacobs Cuvelee, and Thomas Hall, Egbert Woutersen, and Cornelis Aertsen, as curators of the large estate of the deceased, appoint Jan Vinge, the widow's son by a former marriage, "to command all the servants of Jan Damien, deceased, and to direct all agricultural affairs until the crop of this year 1654, is brought into the barn and barn."—Records N. Yeth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 86 (N. Y. State Library).

On the same day, the widow designated David Proost, Jacobus van Colen, and Barger Jorin, "as guardians and tutors to raise, educate, divide and for her to arrange the entire estate to the best advantage of her and her children and heirs." An inventory was filed in July.—Ibid., III: 86, 87.

Stuyvesant, in order to settle the claims of the Dutch to Lands on the South (Delaware) River, as against the Swedes and English,—demolishes Fort Nassau on the Jersey shore, which had been built in 27 or 28 years before, and begins the erection of a new fort, called Castrum, on the west side of the river, at "Sand Hook," near the present site of New Castle, and about four miles below the Swedish Fort Christina.—Brookfield, op. cit., I: 519 and authorities there cited. See also Oct. 30, 1655.

To prevent smuggling, ships departing from New Netherland Aug. to Holland, Virginia, the Delaware (South) River, or elsewhere, are "obliged to take in their full loading in front of" the city of New Amsterdam. The full text of this ordinance is not extant, but the substance is given in Laws & Ord. N. Yeth., 345.
Cornelis de Potter purchases land in Brooklyn from Henry Breier, which adjourns the property of Cornelis Dirckse Hoog-laert.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 143. On Jan. 4, of the next year, he received a deed from Dirckse, then ferry-man on Long Island, for a lot, house, and barn near the ferry, and the barn with its properties.—Ibid., XIV: 146. Cornelis de Potter in time became ferry-master.
After his death, the ferry was managed by Joannes Nevis, formerly secretary of New Amsterdam, who had married Potter's stepdaughter, and after Nevis died his widow continued the ferry from Brooklyn and obtained an extension and lease from Gov.
Lorelace.—See Honeymoon, Joannes Nevis and his Descendants;

The following interesting and detailed agreement of copartnership is made for the operation of the Zegendaal farm in Harlem, originally granted to Jochem Pietersen Kuyter in 1639, and soon thereafter subjected to Indian attack.

"This 15th day of September, of this current year 1641, Mr. Jochem Pietersen Kuyter, free merchant, of the one part, and the Honble Petrus Stuyvesant, Director General of New Netherland, Curacao and the dependencies thereof, Luycas Roodenburgh, Governor of Curacao, and Cornelis de Potter, also free merchant, of the other part, have in all amity and friendship agreed and contracted respecting a certain piece of land on the Island of Manhattan, called Zegendaal, in the Indian language Schorokryn, the property of the aforesaid Jochem Pietersen Kuyter, adjoining on the south Willem Beeckman, lieutenant of the Burgesses corps here, at the end of Mr. Johannes La Montagne's low land (terrehe), as far as the first rocks (steenkens) stretching near the Great Kill [Harlem River], having on the west side at the North River a bay valley about three or four morgens in extent; the aforesaid land being about two hundred morgens large, the correct measure whereof is yet to be determined; and that in the form and manner bearing hereunto.

"He, Jochem Pietersen Kuyter shall cede transport and convey, as well and truly sold, to the abovenamed Messrs Stuyvesant, Roodenburgh and Cornelis de Potter the precise fourth parts of his said land, being one fourth part to and for each, in such manner that he, Jochem Pietersen aforesaid, retains the remaining fourth part as his own property; provided that he, Jochem Pietersen, shall receive from the abovenamed gentlemen for the surrender and conveyance of said land the sum of 1,000 Carolds guilders at 20 stivers, and no more, each of the grantees to pay a third part, with this reservation, that the said thousand guilders shall first be foremost expended and employed in the cultivation of the aforesaid land, all which shall remain together without making therein, either directly or indirectly, any partition, division or severance, before and until such be resolved by a majority of votes.
During said time of non-partition, the abovenamed Jochem Pietersen Kuyter shall remain to be, and shall continue as manager and supernintendent of the farm, to cultivate, to the best of his ability, the undivided land for the profit and best advantage of the contracting parties respectively, and to distribute in equal shares and parts among said parties, whatsoever profits may result from the land, whether in grain, cattle, hay, and the like. Provided also, that the wife of said Jochem Pietersen shall be at liberty to keep hens and ducks on her own account, and he Jochem Pietersen shall receive for his services as superninipendent of the farm,

Sometime during this year, the provincial council abolished the export duty of eight per cent on New Netherland tobacco, in conformity with the directions of the directors of the company at Amsterdam, of April 4, 1652.—Law & Ord. N. Neth., 125; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 175. The original ordinance is not extant.

In this year, the burgomasters of Amsterdam ordered that all private freighters should carry indigent passengers to New Netherland at 50 guilders passage money or eight stivers per day for board. This resulted in many people coming over.—Directors to Stuyvesant, April 4, 1652, in N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 166.

In this year, a mint was established in Massachusetts.—Winsor, III: 172.

Abram de la Noy, upon his petition to the director-general and council, is granted permission to sell all sorts of wines by the small measure, and to employ the money in the purchase of a ship for the benefit of the Hoorn Company.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 149.

The inhabitants having complained of great inconvenience because of the difficulty of getting their grain ground, or, if ground, in a satisfactory manner, "for which reason" the people were received "with abuse, curses and threats;" Stuyvesant and the council ordain that a miller be appointed "at a yearly salary to superintend the Hoorn Company's Windmill," and provide regulations for grinding the mill and for fixing the duties and emoluments of the miller. Persons are forbidden to carry any grain to the mill "without first having obtained a permit at the Office of the Store" of the company. The order of service at the mill was set down as "first come, first served," except that the company reserved precedence over others, because it had to provide bread for soldiers and persons in its military service, and scales are ordered placed in the mill, "to prevent frauds, evil reflections and especially altercation."—Law & Ord. N. Neth., 125-27.

The board of "Nine Men" appear before Stuyvesant and the council in the council chamber in Fort Amsterdam, and request an order forbidding "the shooting of hogs on the walls of the Fort and that for this reason the Fort be enclosed with stakes or in some other convenient way." Stuyvesant consents, and promises "to have the necessary posts cut and hewed by his own servants or negroes, the community to bear the expenses of putting up the palisades and enclosing the Fort."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 155.

The council at Amsterdam and the council for exclusive privilege to shave, to which they are given answer "that shaving is properly not in the province of the surgeons, but is only an appendix to their calling, that nobody can be prevented to please himself in this matter or to serve anybody else for friendship's sake, out of courtesy and without receiving payment for it;" but "keeping a shop to do it in" is "expressly forbidden." Moreover, in the interest of the public health, ships' barbers are forbidden to "dress any wounds, bleed or prescribe for any one on land" without consent of the surgeons, or "at least Doctor La Montagne."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 155-56.

A school is mentioned as being kept at this date and place by David Provost at the place "where the Nine Men usually meet."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 156. It was situated at what is now 52 Broadway.—Landmark Map Rep. Key, III: 941.

Stuyvesant having urgently requested the directors at Amsterdam to send over a second minister to New Amsterdam to be associated with Domine Megapolensis, preferably one who could preach also in English, the directors, therefore, now apply to the church authorities at Old Amsterdam for such a person. At this time, as they learn, the Rev. Samuel Dristsir (lattined form of the Dutch name, Dries, Driesch, or van Driesen) is "at Leyden." He was born about 1600; matriculated the first time at the University of Leyden, on Sept. 23, 1620; had been for some years a preacher to an English congregation in England, and had lately returned to Holland and matriculated a second time at the University of Leyden, this time as a student in medicine. The Amsterdam church authorities interrogated him as to his willingness "to accept said appointment" for New Amsterdam.—Eccles. Rec., I: 305-306. On Feb. 26, he appeared before the classics of Amsterdam and declared his readiness to be employed as minister in New Netherland. He was soon examined as to his Dutch linguistic abilities, and "these were found not only sufficient, but also very agreeable and edifying, and to the great satisfaction of the brethren."—Eccles. Rec., I: 305-306.

The directors, on April 4, informed Stuyvesant of their success in securing Dristsir, "as if sent from the Lord." They said he was "a bachelor of about 40 years [an error for over 70 years], . . . who on account of the perturbances in England, where he had been preaching . . ., retreated from there; that he had "the reputation of being a very pious man and possessed of great gifts;" was "able to preach in both languages, English and Dutch and if necessary even in French;" and had "a very peaceable disposition and agreeable conversation." The company allowed him a salary of £100 ($400) per month and £250 ($1000) a year for subsistence, and, as he was unmarried, they suggested that he might board with Jan de la Montagne.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 175.

Dristsir sailed from Holland soon after April 4. By Aug. 12, he was reported by the symon of North Holland as having been sent to New Netherland (Eccles. Rec., I: 311), and on Oct. 15 (9 y. 9) he was referred to in New Amsterdam as one "recently arrived." In the last named case, Hendrick van Dyck, the deposed fiscal, was ordered to vacate the company's house in which he dwelt, by Nov. 1st, in order to make room for Dristsir.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 129. See, further, May 20, 1668.

Jacobus van Coehoorn conveys to Willem Breekman the "laud situate at the East River and called Coehoorns Hook, with his plantation and Hook called in the Indian language Nechttanck, lying contiguous to said plantation situate on the Island of Manhattan, with the quit rent thereon," for 4,000 guilders. The vendor signs "Jacobus van Colder." The conveyance was approved by Stuyvesant and the council on March 4.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 102 (N. Y. State Library). This appears to be the earliest recorded reference to Coehoorns Hook by this name. For later mentions see Rec. N. Am., VII: 26, 29 (1673); and M. C. C., I: 174 (1694).

Jochem Pietersen Kuyter sells to Pieter Wolpertse van Couwenhove his lot on Manhattan Island, situate at the present Pearl and Whitehall Sts., "together with the building stone (Clips- ten) thereon," for 475 guilders. At the provincial secretary's office, "this conveyance is sealed and signed in the presence of Mr La Montague and Brian Newton a committee of Council, and the seal of the Province in red wax affixed thereto."—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 102 (N. Y. State Library). See Dutch Grants, Block G, lot 9, I: 358; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 155.

Deputies of the chamber of Amsterdam write to Hendrick van der Capellen, a deputy from Zutphen, requesting the latter to cooperate in transporting some people to New Netherland, but making the condition that first a list of the deportees be sent to the Amsterdam body, in order that proper arrangements can be made with the skipper who is daily taking people aboard; also fixing the transportation charges.—N. Stuyvesant sends a deputation from the council to the board of “Nice Men” to examine in their presence persons “touching the culumious language, the defamation and slander uttered... at the house of Captain Fyn in our absence against our persons and dignity.”—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 165. On the 27th, Stuyvesant wrote to the council and recommended the suspension of Hendrick van Dyck from the office of fiscal for his “conceitiveness, negligence and general failing to do his duty,” and for calling Stuyvesant at the house of Fyn a “Scoundrel, Murderer, Tyrant, Hound, Babby and other like names.” On the 28th, the council acquiesced in the suspension, and Van Dyck was brought before the body and charged. He made a general denial; requested a copy of the proceedings, and protested against suspension. But he was suspended by Stuyvesant and charged “not to meddle any more in the Company’s affairs.” He received from the secretary a copy of Stuyvesant’s letter, which he dubbed a “passou” (Lampson or Lane).—Ord. XIV: 164. On Oct. 15, the council on motion by Nov. 1, to vacate the company’s house, in which he resided, as it was needed for Rev. Samuel Drissius, who had arrived recently in New Amsterdam.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 129. It is evident from the correspondence of the directors in Holland, dated Jan. 27, 1649, that they had a poor opinion of Van Dyck, and were prepared for his dismissal sooner or later.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 166–71; cf. 175 (April 4, 1652).

The deputies of the West India Co., in 1660, submitted to the state-general a provisional plan for the trade, colonization, and administration of New Netherland, in which they included among other things, that liberty be given to the inhabitants of New Netherland “to purchase negroes wherever” they deemed it necessary, “except the coast of Guinea,” and to “bring them into New Netherland to work on their houyers,” on payment of a head tax.—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 164. The commonality at Manhattan having made a request for the privilege to import slaves from Africa, the directors at Amsterdam, on April 4, 1652, wrote letters to Stuyvesant and the commonality, in which they granted to the inhabitants the right to fetch in their own ships from “the coast of Africa” as many negroes as they require for agricultural purposes, on condition that they pay such importation as they should have to pay the importer, in consequence of which the directors refer this matter to the city.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 169.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant: “We do not see by what means we can prevent the trade in lump wampum, as long as the fiscal will not discharge his duties faithfully, and we are afraid, that you too have not discovered the defects of the system in New Netherland. When the quantity of money increases, it is in order to bring some specie into the country, of which we believe a quantity will go over in these ships; you will thus soon learn the result of your resolution. General experience however has demonstrated, that the increase of the value of money has usually been the ruin of the country and its populations; we consider therefore this is a matter of dangerous import and find it very unadvisable to have passed this resolution without our knowledge.”—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 169. See May 30, 1650.

Prof. Kilpatrick argues convincingly that the first Latin school in New Amsterdam was provided for at this time by the directors in the same letter: “We also agree with your proposition to establish there a trivial school and believe a beginning might be made with one usher (kapsuladeln) who could be engaged at a yearly salary of 200 to 250 guilders [80 to 100]. We recommend for this position Jan de la Montagne, whom you have appointed to it; and you may use the building of the city tavern [Pearl St. and Counties Alley] if you find it suitable.”—Dutch Schools of New Netherland, 95. O’Callaghan (see ibid., footnote), translating the same passage (citing N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 169), interpreted triviale as “public”; this is a mistake, because there was already there a school, in charge of Willem Vestius (or Vesten) (see Oct. 1649), who continued as school-master until succeeded by Harmans van Holbooken (see Mar. 23, 1655). “Clearly,” says Kilpatrick, “the elementary school of which Vestius had charge was not a triviale school, else some such word as ‘other common’ would have been used in connection with the proposed school.” He shows, furthermore, that triviale was applied at that time in Holland to a school in which
July 1
Following upon the instructions of the directors at Amsterdam, of April 4 of this year, Stuyvesant and the council pass an ordinance for regulating the purchase of Indian lands, and vacating and annuling certain extravagant grants and purchases. It was found that "many inhabitants of New Netherland, who were "covetous and greedy of land," had, contrary to all rights and orders, purchased, bartered, or obtained by gift from the Indians, extensive tracts of land, holding the same as their property, and selling and conveying to others, all without the knowledge, order, or consent, of the directors or their deputies in New Netherland, and without record in the office of the provincial secretary at Manhattan, as required by law. This was declared to be injurious to the company and to the improvement of the province. It could not be done, therefore, after mature deliberation, by the directors at Amsterdam, Stuyvesant and the council interdict and forbid all persons, directly or indirectly, to buy or attempt to obtain any lands in the province from Indians, "much less by virtue of purchase or donation undertake to occupy, or sell or convey them to others, without the previous consent or approbation of the Company general." This edict also vacates the extravagant grants of Wouter van Twiller, Brant Aerten van Slichtenhorst, Lubbenaert van Dincklagen, Govert Loockerman, and others; but the pretended owners are to be reimbursed for the original purchase price of their claims, and in return to the public domain of the company, to be afterwards allotted in proper proportions to actual settlers. Persons who have purchased from the original claimants are to be protected in their possession of land under cultivation or actual occupancy, on condition of their taking out proper patents, signed by the director-general and the provincial secretary, and sealed with the public seal, in default of which these lands also are to be forfeited to the company. — Laws & Ord. N. Neth. 129-30.

22 At the request of the states-general, the Zeeland board of admiralty despatches a frigate with instructions to Stuyvesant to keep a careful watch, in the present condition of affairs with England, and to employ no person in the public service of whose loyalty and devotion to the Fatherland he is not assured. — Brodhead, op. cit., 545.

The first suggestion for postal regulations in New Netherland is now made to Stuyvesant by the directors at Amsterdam. "Private parties" often gave "their letters to this or that sailor or free merchant and the letters were often lost through neglect" or remained "forgotten in the boxes." On this account, the directors "had a box hung up at the New Warehouse" in Amsterdam, so that "everyone" might "place his letters at any 1652, 4.7 Aug. time to be dispatched by the first ship sailing." They deemed it advisable that a similar plan be followed at New Amsterdam, and that the letters "put into a bag" be sent over to the directors, at their place of meeting, for distribution.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 186. Nothing was done, and "great complaints" continued to pour in upon the directors concerning the delivery of "private letters" coming from New Netherland, which were "often kept undelivered two or three weeks or lost entirely to the great disadvantage of private traders and others." The directors, therefore, again directed Stuyvesant, on Nov. 23, 1644, "to have a box or chest made," in which letters could be collected and then given, "well secured in one package, to the supercargo," whenever a ship sailed, together with instructions to have the same delivered to the directors immediately upon his arrival at Amsterdam.—Ibid., XIV: 304. None the less, the wishes of the Directors were unheeded and the "great complaints" continued. Again, on Sept. 16, 1650, they urged compliance upon Stuyvesant and the council. They then suggested that a letter-box be "hung up at the Warehouse [on Pearl St.] or whatever place" was deemed fittest and advised that the bag be sent over "under seal."—Ibid., 314.

The first evidence of an attempt to give heed in the slightest manner to postal regulation in New Netherland was in an ordinance of Stuyvesant and the council, of June 13, 1657, which provided that nobody should be allowed to board arriving ships before visitation by a government officer and the delivery of the official mail, and that letters to be held "until a proper list of them could be made out," "to insure their delivery to the right man or owner," and the supercargo was allowed to collect a fee of three stuivers, or six cents, for each letter.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 313. The foregoing provisions related only to incoming mail.

On Oct. 10, 1659, the directors declared by resolution that it had "been discovered that private letters" were not being "placed into sealed bags in New Netherland and Curacao, as ordered by the government and long practiced in Brazil . . . but that masters of private vessels" returning to Holland usually took along letters which they delivered "hadly or with great delay." It was determined to prevent this, and ordered that "henceforth a clause should be inserted in the bailbond, given by skippers, sailing to New Netherland and Curacao, forbidding them to bring privately letters to this place [Amsterdam] under penalty of one hundred florins for each contravention."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 446; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 379. These regulations were communicated to Stuyvesant (N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 458), who, with his council, promulgated the same by an ordinance, enacted on June 2, 1660 (p. 9). A letter-box was placed "at the Office of the Secretary of the Director General and Council," for the deposit of registered mail. Each person desiring to have mail registered must "require a receipt for his Letter," for which a fee of three stuivers, or six cents, in wampum, was charged, whilst record of registration was made by "one of the clerks . . . on a list."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 380. On June 23, 1660, Stuyvesant informed the directors that their directions in regard to receiving and forwarding the mail had been published and posted in New Amsterdam.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 475. It was in 1660, therefore, that the first post-office in New Netherland was established at Manhattan.

On account of the breaks in diplomatic relations between the states-general and England, and impending war (see May 29, July 5), the directors at Amsterdam warn Stuyvesant and the council to "arm all freemen, soldiers and sailors and fit them for defense," to provide "proper orders," and to appoint "places of rendezvous" also to "put the fortifications at New Amsterdam, [Port] Orange and [Port] Casimir in a good state of defense," whilst keeping an eye upon their New England neighbours.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 186, 207.

Sept. 4 Hans Steen solicits permission to teach school, which is granted to him by the provincial government.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Counties) V: 981; N.Y. State Archives, Record of the delivery of private schoolmaster. See Kilpatrick, Dutch Schools of N. Neth., 112.

The states-general again warns the West India Co. to put their province in a proper state of defense.—Broolhead, op. cit., I: 547.

The duty allowed during Kieft's administration on each merchant vessel as well as on the domestic packet at New Amsterdam, was fifteen stuivers. This rate was continued under Stuyvesant, without objection from the local merchants. But the directors at Amsterdam contracted with "some Merchants of Amsterdam not to exact more than 8 per cent on Beavers and Otters," a favouritism fatal to the revenues of New Netherland and objectionable to the merchants there. However, the reduced rate was also in time extended to them. This made matters worse for the revenue and the delivery of "private letters," and the councils therefore now provide for an additional local duty on furs. Besides the eight per cent, four more stuivers are ordered to be paid "for each merchantable Otter, and Beaver skin and Bear and Elk hide, the thirds and halves reckoned in proportion."—N. Y. Col. Doc., IX: 189; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 40, 73, 152-56.

Michael Tadens at this time kept a tavern on the site of the present No. 11 Pearl St., where the Maritime building now stands. This tavern was not in existence after 1663, when Jan Gerritsen, a baker, occupied the house.—See Castello Plan, II: 272; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 691; PL 174, Vol. III.

David Provoost receives a certificate from Stuyvesant and council admitting him as a notary public.—Records N. Neth. (Dutch Council Minutes), V: 63 (N. Y. State Library).

The ordinances of Nov. 8, 1649, against the exportation of oranges, and the consumption thereof for brewing, distilling, etc., are regulating the baking and sale of bread, are renewed, also the account of the influx of immigrants from Holland.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 158-59.

As "many guns" are "daily discharged and fired at Partridges and other game" within the limits of the city of New Amsterdam, endangering life and property, the directors and the council issue an ordinance against the practice, subjecting violators to a forfeiture of their firearms "and a fine at the discretion of the Judge, to be applied one-third to the Poor, one-third to the Church and one-third to the Officer" (making the complaint).—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 158.

Hendrick van Dyck, former fiscal, is ordered by the director-general and council to vacate, by Nov. 1, the company's house which he has been occupying, as it is required for the Rev. Samuel Driasus, who has recently arrived (see Feb. 12, 1652).—Col. Hist. MSS., D. Van Dyck, f. 4.

Thomas Hall receives a ground-brief (received in Liber Patents, Nov. IV: 17, Albany) for a piece of land which extended, according to the modern streets, from Chatham Sq. to Pell St., along the Bowery. Shown on PL 173, Vol. III.

On the petition of Jan de la Montagne, teacher of the Latin school (see Apr. 4), the director-general and council order Van Tienhoven to pay the petitioner "three or four mouths wages."—Coun. Min. (MS.), V: 93 (Albany): Kilpatrick, op. cit., 99.

The directors at Amsterdam promise to send to Stuyvesant and the council by the next ship "the desired placats [edicts] concerning the walled; in case any additional placards should be inserted in the bailbond, given by skippers, sailing to New Netherland and Curacao, forbidding them to bring privately letters to this place [Amsterdam] under penalty of one hundred florins for each contravention."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 174. 193. This resulted in the draft of two placards or edicts by Stuyvesant and the council "in regard to the neglect in cultivating and redeeming land and in erecting houses on the lots granted within the limits of New Netherland." These instruments were sent to the directors at Amsterdam, who repeated their wishes, as expressed before in their letter of Dec. 15, 1652. The directors, "after much consideration," approved the two edicts, stating that "the said placats to be printed" at Amsterdam, and sent the printed copies "to be published and affixed" in New Amsterdam. The corrections made in one of the drafts stipulated that "the quitrent or annual payment of 12 stivers for each morgen" should be paid "for the land and the building, that shall have first been ploughed or otherwise put to use."—Ibid., XIV: 207. Neither the original drafts nor printed revisions of these two edicts are among the

The directors at Amsterdam, again write Stuyvesant to be on his guard to avoid broils with New England, and to cultivate the friendship of his English neighbours, as well as to promote commerce—chiefly with the Virginians. By these means, they say, "must the Manhattan prosper," her population increase, and her trade and navigation flourish. They add this significant prophecy: "For when these once become permanently established—when the ships of New Netherland ride on every part of the ocean—then numbers, now looking to that coast with eager eyes, will be allure..."—Brodhead, 2d ed., I: 537, and authorities there cited.

1652–In her chapter on "The City and Its People" (Chap. XIV), Mrs. Van Rensselaer (in Hist. City of N. Y., I: 454 et seq.) presents an excellent summary of observations, from contemporary sources, which reflect the life and appearance of the little town of New Amsterdam during the last years of the Dutch régime (1652–1664), beginning thus:

"Governor Stuyvesant's New Amsterdam is seldom pictured, like Governor Van Twiller's, as a setting for opera bouffe performances. But it is often depicted, with no greater degree of truth, as the counterpart of some insignificant seaport in the peaceful, prosperous, uncritical Holland of today. It is described as a sleepy, slothful village of apathetic boors and bargrubs stumped by beer and tobacco and living in a stagnant isolation from which they were fortunately aroused by the advent of the English as their rulers. Probably nowhere anywhere in the world by Dutchmen of the seventeenth century could not be a drowsy place, and the one that they planted on Manhattan was not an isolated place. It lived by traffic with the ever-dangerous people of the forest, with Englishmen up and down the coast, and with men of many nations eastward and southward across the sea; and it was a thoroughfare in a sense that was true of no other place on the American mainland, for those who voyaged between New England and Virginia preferred to pass through the safe waters of Long Island Sound, ships from England bound for New England often tarried in the harbor, and so at times did Dutch, French, and English privateers. Life was more varied and more agitated within the 'walls and gates' that enclosed New Amsterdam's heterogeneous population, excited by many controversies and threatened by many perils, than it was in any English-American community. Rarely indeed except in the depths of winter can New Amsterdam have known a quiet day, never a dull, monotonous season. Livelihood was one of the few things it never lacked, torpidity one of the moods of mind it could not encourage, peaceful sloth one of the cares for which it offered no chance.

"In its people were not conscious, like the New Englishers, of a high repute for prudential houses, fires, religious and political, in a land of promise. Yet they knew that they were living in such a land and they had, therefore, a sense of corporate pride not to be measured by counting their numbers; for a little colony that is opening up the resources of a rich new continent may well feel itself superior in importance to a city of many thousands on an older soil. The men of New Amsterdam understood as clearly as voracious Englishmen that they had possessed themselves of the very best part of that 'large northern empire' claimed by the Kings of England and France; and this fact would by itself have sufficed to differentiate them widely from the inhabitants of among the fifteen hundred souls in the Holland of their time of ours.

"Although their city was still a frontier post in a truer sense than Boston, for Boston contained many more people and was much more solidly flanked and protected by lesser settlements, it probably presented the more civilized appearance. Some observers praised Boston highly but Colonel Cartwright, one of the royal commissioners sent from England in 1664, wrote in the following year that its houses were 'generally wooden' and its streets 'crooked and unpaved with little decency and no uniformity.' In New Amsterdam also, Stuyvesant wrote when he arrived in 1664, there were chiefly of wood. By 1664 they were mostly of brick with tiled roofs while those on the outing farmsteads were often of stone. The annual rent of an ordinary house in the city seems to have been about fifteen beaver skins, or from 130 to 180 guilders.

"Near the fort the houses were compactly placed. Elsewhere within the wall there was room for great trees and shallow groves of aboriginal growth, and for open spaces brightened by the rich native flora, by crops of rye, barley, and tobacco, and by the fruit trees and garden flowers that the Hollander always carried with him from his fatherland. Indeed, there was an 'excess of large gardens' as the West India Company when it got Cortes the 1593 if more closely built upon, the place might be more easily defended.

"As standards of cleanliness and comfort were much higher among the Dutch than among the English at this period, New Amsterdam would undoubtedly have given less pain than Boston to the senses of a modern sanitarian. For a long period after it became New York all strangers noticed how spotless its Dutch traditions kept it within doors; and the outward dishevelment of its early years was greatly bettered after the city magistrates took it in charge. Then, with the aid of the provincial government, they gradually improved the streets, appointing official 'fence viewers,' refusing to let poor structures occupy good sites, ordering away pigsties, hen-houses, and other nuisances, and, to lessen the risk of fire, prohibiting hay stacks and wooden chimneys. Hogs had been at first the only scavengers, entering the yards from the street.

"Soon after Brower Streart was paved 'with cobble stones' in 1658 and given the name that it still retains as Stone Street streets were improved in the same way. Along each side of the Heere Gracht or Great Canal ran a street, and along the East River shore, from the mouth of the Heere Gracht to the Water Poort at the end of the city, a fine walk protected by the schooners or sea-wall of planks and therefore called De Huijel at Long de huijel. The path at a little distance from the inner side of the city wall, which afterwards developed into Wall Street, was called the Ginsel (the Circuit).

"Near the wharf at the mouth of the Heere Gracht a small market house was built in 1656, and on the Plain in front of the fort, now the Bowling Green, a meat market in 1659—a substantial structure with a tiled roof. There were no market places in all New England towns as there were in all Dutch towns, and not until 1710 was a public market house built in Boston. An annual cattle fair held at New Amsterdam for six weeks in the autumn was called a 'free market,' which meant that strangers as well asburghers then had liberty to trade at retail and were exempt from arrest. Proclamations put into English brought farmers with their herds and flocks from points as distant as Stannfor, on New Haven Colony and the eastern parts of Long Island; and for thirty years or more this Dutch institution survived in New York.

"... The present City Hall Park is a fragment of the common land, called De Vlakhe (the Flat) and afterwards the Commons, where, well outside the city wall, the citizens had free pasture for their cattle."

As we know from the so-called "Duke's Plan" (Pl. 10 Vol. I) and from the Castello Plan (Pl. 82, Vol. II), "Many of the houses in the city had crow-stepped gables turned toward the street and roofs of various colored tiles. Some had projecting beams in the gable for the hoisting of goods into the store-rooms beneath the roof, and the characteristic Dutch porch or 'stoop' raised several feet above the ground. Inside, there were no stoves but enormous stone fireplaces bordered with blue and white tile; there were great bedsteads built into the walls, solid pieces of furniture, stores of household linen and handsome clothes, and treasures of pewter and silver; also, though rarely, large looking-glasses, marble tables, clocks, 'alabaster images,' 'great china pots,' and, in Stuyvesant's house at least, cabinets of ebony which were probably receptacles for porcelain treasures. These were more likely of Japanese than of Chinese origin, for after 1631 Nagasaki was an important trading post for the Dutch. The burgurers of New Amsterdam had a great deal more silverware than the New Englishers who in other ways were much richer, but they did not regard it as an extravagance. It played the part now played by the savings-bank. 'Money and Plate' is a frequent conjunction of terms in inventories and wills."

"From the same lists it appears that chairs, always straight-backed, were sometimes covered with Russian leather or with velvet and lace. The 'carpets' often mentioned were small rugs or, more 1664—commonly, table-covers; sand was the universal floor covering.

The wonderful blooming of art in the Netherlands had so developed the popular love for pictures and the belief in them as good investments that they abounded everywhere, even in the cottages of peasants. In New Amsterdam also they were numerous, relatively more than books.

"Mosted in size and put to modest uses were these comfortable Dutch-American houses, trade and family life going on together beneath the same roof as was the contemporary custom in European towns. The kitchen was the family sitting-room. Like the smaller chambers the room for formal uses, which we should call the garden, held a bedstead; and here stood the Dutchwoman's most indispensable article of furniture, her big kas or clothes-chest. The plentiful wadded petticoats and suits of clothing that filled the kas were of sorts that many years' wear could not damage. Much household linen was needed when, according to the general European practice, it was allowed to accumulate for the great bleacheries that were undertaken only twice or four times in a year. Mighty smokers though they were, Dutchmen, say their own historians, rarely smoked indoors. But the extreme care that they bestowed upon the cleanliness of the house and its furnishings, and the same authorities, did not extend to their clothing when in use. If Sir William Temple made no such remarks when he spoke with wonder of the niceties of Dutch housekeeping it was because, low as was then the standard of personal cleanliness in Holland, it was still lower elsewhere.

"All New Amsterdam were general stores on a larger or smaller scale. The best one was kept by Cornelis Steenwyck who was one of the few Great Burgers and in later years was thought the richest man in the province. Taverns were of much more importance in the life of the community than they are to-day—the citizens' only substitutes for the modern hotel, restaurant, dance-house, club-house, exchange, and newspaper. Some of them were kept by prominent men like Martin Creiger and Salomon La Chair, a notary public who left his wine business in his wife's charge when, on his little yacht, he was making professional tours of the province. A record book in La Chair's handwriting, preserved in the office of the city clerk of New York, shows that he had a collection of law-books for reference . . .

"Entertainments under the domestic roof were limited to family festivals but these were many and joyous; even funerals were almost festivities, so plentiful was the proffered supply of food, drink, and tobacco. The men constantly met at their 'clubs' in the taverns; and here, indoors or on the garden turf, the young people danced. Public occasions in country places near by, like the founding of a new town or the dedication of a new church, were marked by ceremonial dinners and banquets given by the people of the locality to the governor or his representatives.

"At New Amsterdam the celebration of Christmas and other old church festivals was not thought, as in 1659 the general court of Massachusetts pronounced it, a 'great dishonor to God. Most characteristically Dutch were the St. Nicholas Day and New Year's Day observances, but Christmas, Easter, and Whit sillitude were also celebrated by the Dutch Calvinists as heartily as by any Catholic. Nor was New Amsterdam's Sunday by any means the Sabbath of New England. All avoidable kinds of labor, all amusements, and all sales of drinks were strictly forbidden before, during, and between the hours of services but when Stuyvesant tried to extend such prohibitions to cover the whole twenty-four hours the city magistrates refused to publish his ordinance, saying that it was too severe and 'contrary to the freedoms' of the fatherland. The many days of prayer and humiliation and the rarer thanksgiving days in the governor were observed in the same manner as the Sabbath. In 1655 when a merchant applied to the council for permission 'to make a lottery of a certain quantity of Bibles, Testaments, and other books,' asking also that persons be appointed to value the stock and 'to select something for the poor,' the matter was referred to the city court which resolved 'that the said betrothe should not be prohibited.' . . .

"Stuyvesant's Sunday ordinances show what sports his people enjoyed on week-days and on the Sabbath after their devotions had been performed: 'going on pleasure parties in boat, car, or wagon,' 'fishing, bowling, and roving in search of nuts and strawberries,' playing 'good tennis, croquet, cards, poolish, and darts, and at troc, a game with balls and hoops often played on the grass. Golf was also a Dutch game, described as played with a small ball, a crooked club, and a series of small holes in the turf. Turf dancing was a common pastime in New Netherland. With small success, apparently, the governor in council issued ordinances against firing guns, beating drums, and selling liquors on New Year's Day and May Day, against the direction of May-pole dancing, and against disorderly conduct, and against the rough sport called pulling or riding the goose . . .

"In New Amsterdam there were no vehicles built for purposes of pleasure or mere utility, and the most prominent of Stuyvesant's garden was a favorite tryaling and lotting place. More than one primeval tree appears to have been preserved within the city limits to shelter the pipe-smoking burgher who might not smoke in his own home. Nutten (Governor's Island) was some sort of a pleasure ground; and the bowery village, said Domessant, during the classis of Amsterdam, was 'a place of relaxation and pleasure whither people go from the Mannhattan for the evening service.' . . .

"The records of the burgomaster's court are complete enough to show, in connection with the council's correspondence and ordinances, a fair idea of the moral condition of his city. Plainly, it was much higher than that of Kief't scattered community had been. It could well stand comparison with the condition of the English colonies, and it might shame many of the settlements which in modern days have been planted far from the mother-country of their founders. To the sun of the flesh, indeed, New Amsterdam was prone; but the devil as the father of violence found few recruits among its people, and the world in the sense of material gain did not appeal to them more strongly than to their neighbors.

"Writing in 1664 Thomas Mun declared that the Dutch had 'wellear left the 'swinish vice' of drunkenness while the English, who were said to have learned it of them, had fallen into a 'general leprosy of . . . piping, potting, feasting, fashions, and mis-spending of our time in idleness and pleasure.' In New Amsterdam drunkenness was still common but was no longer a cause for complaint against high-placed personages. The records say that a Dutchman, bearing a 'false name' and who had been arrested there, explained that . . . at the Mannadies they were not punished for drunkenness but used after they had been drunk to say, God forgive us, or he merciful to us, and that was enough.' On the other hand, drink was declared by the court to be a 'frivolous excuse' for the transgressions to which it led; and the authorities did all they could to limit the sale of intoxicants to white men and to prevent it altogether in the case of red men.

"There was no regular prison in New Amsterdam—only a jail in the fort and detention rooms for temporary use in the Stadt Huin. The stocks, the pillory, and the wooden horse, working 'at the wheelbarrow' with the Company's slaves, whipping, branding, and the piercing of tongue or ear with hot irons (cruel punishments common in other colonies also), fines and temporary or permanent banishment—the sources of manumission. A negro filled the office of executioner and whirper. Arrested debtors were permitted to live at a tavern if they would pay the bill; otherwise they languished in the Stadt Huin. 'When a litigant ordered by the city court to pay a sum of money did not do so his goods were levied upon and, if not redeemed within a week, were sold in a customary way, a candle, bidding proceeded as long as it held out to burn, and as its light expired the highest bidder secured the goods.

"For all its democratic temper and its simple ways of life New Amsterdam, as it was invaded by the Dutch invaders found it, was not an illiterate or unmannish place . . .
"In short, it is not more justifiable to think of New Amsterdam as a slow-witted, illiterate place than as a drowsy, uneventful place. The more closely we read its chronicles in the words of its own inhabitants, the more clearly do we find how modern it was in its essential habits of mind. If an American of to-day could be transported back two hundred and fifty years and he would find himself more comfortably at home on Manhattan than anywhere else. In some of the English settlements he would have the chance to exercise more direct political power, but in none existing Rhode Island, for instance, would he have the freedom and in none at all a general mental attitude, a prevailing temper, as similar to the temper of the America of to-day."

Mrs. Van Rensselaer observes in Chap. XIII:

"In selecting the new members of the city corporation each existing member put a double number of names in nomination; and according to the pluralities thus determined the double list was drawn up which was submitted to the governor in council for a final choice. At once the corporation incurred Stuyvesant's displeasure by saying that no employee of the Company should be eligible; and at once he had to increase by far the scanty list of Great Burghers so that all the magistrates might belong to that class. In spite of his efforts, however, and in spite of the low price at which the Great Burgers-Right could be bought, the distinction between the two classes soon lapsed out of mind. Even in the elder Amsterdam the burgomasters had been selected from the citizens, but now they were appointed by the Court of Schepen, and the burgomasters thus elected were able to carry on their work without much difficulty, and thus to do their utmost to make good the defect, and in no sense at all a general mental attitude, a prevailing temper, as similar to the temper of the America of to-day."

"The business of the West India Company and of this province at large was carried on, under the governor, council, and schepen-fiscal, by a receiver-general and collector of customs (who after 1658 formed with the governor and two councillors a board of audit), and by a little regiment of commissaries, bookkeepers, clerks, inspectors, surveyors, and Indian interpreters. From time to time the governor appointed other petty officials for temporary service. Plural office-holding was lawful. One or two instances of malversation in office are recorded."

As regards internal affairs New Netherland's days of storm and stress were over. External dangers had drawn the governor and his burgurers together. He had learned that they could not be governed like a garrison of soldiers, and they had been pacified if not satisfied by their victory in the matter of municipal government. Nevertheless, all was not peace between them. Although the West India Company said in 1660 that its province, which thus far had cost it one million guilders, was now in a position to support itself, Stuyvesant constantly complained of the emptiness of his official chest, and his people of the methods that he employed to fill it. For example, when the Company changed the export charge upon furs from a specific duty to an ad valorem duty of eight per cent he added a charge of four stivers upon each skin; and in 1654 he changed the one per cent staple-right charge upon all imports, which, he said, had proved impossible to collect, to a much higher specific duty upon liquors, salt, and all articles imported for the Indian trade."

"The two burgomasters of New Amsterdam transacted all the executive and financial business of the city corporation. Each was on duty at the Stadt Huys every other day, and four times a year each made a report to his associate and their predecessors—the 'old burgomasters' who, with the 'old schepens' seem to have formed a little vroedwet or municipal council after a pattern set, of course, in the fatherland. One burgomaster retired from office each year, then becoming the city treasurer. Oliph Steenstra Van Cortlandt held this post from 1645 to 1680. Certain fees reverted to the senior burgomaster, and he was called the president of the corporation; but the schout presided over its sessions, moved all questions, and collected the votes. The specified duties of the five schepens were simply judicial as they were in Holland."

"The governors of the West India Company resided in the city and held court there. They had a complete civil and military jurisdiction. The labor of the lower tribunal were largely those of arbitration yet it elaborated a regular system of pleading by declaration, plea, and rejoinder, and a well-organized method of examining witnesses present and absent. If its members felt competent they acted as arbitrators—as when, say their minutes, they crossed the street to test Jacobus Van Huis; and the complaints that had been lodged against him. If the case was more complicated it required the whole citizens to pass upon it, and once in a while these were 'good women.' An appeal from the decisions of the city court was rarely taken although permitted in cases involving more than fifty guilders. Admiralty jurisdiction was also exercised by this court."

"Wills were made orally or in writing before two members of any local court or before a notary and two witnesses, the notary's notes being sworn to and signed by the testator. Proof was not necessary for probate. Marriages were strictly regulated. They could not be performed until the bans had been three times published, and in 1653 it was ordered that this must be done in the place where the contracting parties actually lived. An ordinance of 1658 says that... all marriages must be solemnized within one month of the last proclamation of the bans under penalty of ten guilders for the first week of delay and twenty guilders for each succeeding week unless good reason were shown. Nor, under much heavier penalties, should any man and woman 'keep house as married persons' until they were lawfully married."

According to Dutch custom all court officials took as much care for the interests of the defendants as of the plaintiffs. No lawyer practised in any court, but evidently the notaries of the New Amsterdams were active, for more than one of them was punished for drawing up papers carelessly or for abusing the magistrates to their faces."

"In 1661 the provincial revenue amounted to 50,000 guilders; in 1662 when the expenses of the government exceeded 55,000, to no more than 53,600. Although the city government often declared itself penniless it must at the last have gathered an annual revenue of some 25,600 guilders. For while nothing fell into its coffers regularly except the proceeds of the small or bargers' excise. As Holland taught England the utility of stamp taxes so, in 1654, the magistrates of New Amsterdam suggested the first of which America heard the name, asking from the Company permission to levy a new impost 'such as on stamped paper etc.'"

"If the records of the West India Company had been preserved some comprehensive account of the commercial life of New Amsterdam might be written. As it is, only isolated items can be gathered. For example, a paper in the Moore collection states that the West India Company received in 1654 54,601 guilders in "recognitions" and convey charges on goods sent to the province by individual

1662—exporters on six ships, duly specified, and in 1655, six ships again being named, 24,973 vessels. From the Van Rensselaer papers it appears that the merchants had a mutual system of insuring ships and cargoes against loss and damage, using the printed forms employed for the same purpose in Holland. The local records tell that some thirty 'trading banks' pined on River Mauritius but do not say how many sea-going vessels were owned or partly owned at Manhattan. It is evident that the merchants quickly grasped new chances to extend their ocean and their coastwise trade. In 1650 the governor of Canada permitted them to traffic with the white men on the St. Lawrence although not with the Indians, and in 1659 the West India Company allowed them, on petition, to try 'the experiment' of direct trading upon their own account with the Caribbees, France, Spain, Italy, and other foreign places exclusive of the African and Oriental regions reserved to the ships of the East India Company. Peltry, it was decreed, must still be sent to Amsterdam only, and all return cargoes must be discharged either there or on Manhattan; yet the concession opened wide markets for New Netherland's inestimable stores of timber and its growing wealth in foodstuffs.

"The Dutchman's position at the great gateway to the West had begun to tell in their favor. The New Englders no longer competed with them in the fur trade; the Canadians were their only rivals. Peltry was still their chief article of export. In 1655 Fort Orange and its vicinity sent down about thirty-five thousand beaver skins to Manhattan, and in October, 1660, Stuyvesant wrote that since the beginning of the year twenty-five or thirty thousand had been handled at Manhattan, yielding some 16,000 guilders in export duties. Tobacco stood next to furs as an article of export. Most of it came, in spite of the English Navigation Acts, from Maryland and Virginia; yet so much was grown in the province that in 1647, when food was scarce, the government ordered every farmer to plant as many hills of com as of tobacco.

"European goods were costly in New Netherland but profits can hardly have been greater than in New England, for heavy customs duties were added to the cost of transportation, and transportation averaged high in times when it took as long for cargoes to cross the Atlantic as it does now to reach the Philippines and when maritime disasters, including piracies, were much more frequent than they are to-day.

"More and more from year to year New Netherland showed a desire to educate its children and a willingness to do so at its own expense despite the pledges given by the Company. 'Nothing is of greater importance than the early instruction of youth,' said Governor Stuyvesant; a lack of schoolmasters, said Domine M.C. de G. Domnung, would mean 'a ruined youth and a bewildering of men's minds'; and repeatedly the people said the same. In reply to the complaints upon this subject that they embodied in the Remonstrance of 1649 Cornelis van Tienhoven declared that the free school was always maintained and that various teachers 'kept school in their house, being in the revenue of the Company.' In the same period one or two public schools were also established. The Company's regulations provided for a number of inspectors, signalled by a red hat and a letter of office, and the Company's officers were to inspect the schools at least once a year. The children received spelling books, instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and occasional lessons in the catechism. In 1652 the Company sent six students to the University of Leiden and in 1656 it asked the Provincial Council for a college in New Netherland. The plan was finally carried out in 1677, when a college was built at New York and the Company paid the salaries of the professors. The students of the college were required to take the same courses as the students of the University of Leiden, and the professors were to be chosen by the Company from among the best Dutch clergymen and the best Dutch secular scholars. The Company also paid the salaries of the instructors of the schools and the salaries of the schoolmasters were fixed by the Provincial Council.

Jacob Kip is engaged and appointed by the director-general and council "to serve as Secretary or Clerk to the Burgomasters and Scheeps of New Amsterdam," his term "to begin on the next first of February."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 196. This appoint-Resolution
On the 2d point:
The position of schout shall henceforth be separated from the fiscal's office, but the appointment to the said position shall be made by the Director General and Council, in accordance with the orders given them.

The Director General and Council, taking into consideration the last preceding orders, advice and communication from the Hon. Directors, dated the 26th of April of last year, 1655, whereby the Hon. Patrons advise to have the duties of schout of this city provisionally performed by the fiscal, therefore, the Director General and Council, without counter order, or at least without further advice and notice from the aforesaid Hon. Directors, can not make any separation therein. Done at Fort Amsterdam, in New Netherland, the 7th of June anno 1656. Was signed: P. Stuyvesant. Below was written: By order of the Hon. Director General and Council of New Netherland. Signed: C.v: Ruyven, Secretary

To the Right Honorable Gentlemen, the Hon. Director General and the Hon. Council of New Netherland

Shew with due reverence and respect, the burgomasters and schepens of the city of Amsterdam in New Netherland,

That they are reliably informed that the Hon. Cornelis van Tienhoven has by the Hon. Patrons of this province been discharged from the positions which he has occupied here in this country, and consequently also from the office of schout of this city, which he has also held until this time.

And whereas the Right Hon. Directors of the West India Company, Chamber at Amsterdam, the lords and patroons of this province (upon the request to that effect made both by the commonalty and by the petitioners' predecessors) have in their Honors' communication, dated the 18th of May 1654, been pleased to order that the position of schout of this city should be separated from the fiscal's office, as appears from the copy thereof hereto annexed;

Therefore, they, the petitioners, hereby respectfully pray your Honors (since the Hon. Cornelis van Tienhoven has been discharged from all his offices) that your Honors, in pursuance of said communication, may be pleased to appoint a reasonable, intelligent and competent person from among the burgurers or inhabitants here as Schout of this city, whereby justice will be maintained and the flourishing condition of this just or newly commencing city may be more and more promoted.

Awaiting hereupon your Honors' favorable disposition, we remain,

Your Honors' obedient servants, the burgomasters and schepens of the city of Amsterdam in New Netherland. Below was written: By order of the same. Signed: Jacob Kip, Secretary.

Agrees with the original,

Jacob Kip, Secretary

[Form of Government in New Netherland A.D 1653]

The Director General and Council of New Netherland hereby make known that the Hon. Directors of the Chartered West India Company, Chamber at Amsterdam, lords and patroons of this province, have thought fit, under the high authority of their Director General and Council of New Netherland, to favor this new and growing city of New Amsterdam and the inhabitants thereof with a court of justice, to be constituted as far as possible and as the circumstances of this country permit according to the usual custom of the city of Amsterdam, name-givers to this newly developing city, however, in such a way that all judgments shall remain subject to reversal by and appeal to the Director General and Council, to be by them finally disposed of.

As to the appointment of the judges requisite thereto, the aforesaid honorable patroons order that qualified, honorable, reasonable, intelligent and the most well-to-do persons be chosen and selected, who are neither corrupt nor opponents of the aforesaid lords patroons or their government here established, but peace loving and well affected subjects, being native born or real estate owning inhabitants, who according to the laudable custom of Amsterdam have been for at least seven years burgurers here in this city, or else were born and brought up within the provinces of the United Netherlands, promoters and professors of the Reformed religion, as in conformity to the word of God and the regulations of the synod of Dordrecht it is at present taught in the churches of the United Netherlands and here in this country. Which court of justice, for the present time, until it shall be otherwise ordained or enlarged by the aforesaid Hon. Directors or their agents, shall at first consist of two burgomasters and five schepens, who from now on shall be chosen and sworn by the Director General and Council on the 2d of February (not being a Sunday), and shall be served by a secretary or clerk and an ordinary sworn messenger, of whom yearly a certain number shall be changed and some continue in office in order to inform the newly appointed members as to the preceding business.
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

As to the burgomasters, whose particular duty and function it is to see to the proper administration, order and welfare of this city, extending between the two rivers to the Fresh Water, they are also to take care that proper quiet, peace and harmony prevail among the commonalty.

However, in such a way that by the aforesaid burgomasters no offices or ordinances shall be made, much less bestowed or published, without the previous knowledge, approval and confirmation of the Director General and Council, as representatives of the province and supreme government, but the burgomasters shall have the right (what concerns them particularly and is especially recommended to them), to propose and report to the Director General and Council what they consider necessary for the good order, peace, quiet, welfare and government of the burghers, wherein then, in the presence of the burgomasters, by laws and ordinances such provision shall be made as the circumstances shall demand.

And furthermore, from this time forth there is reserved to the burgomasters the care and supervision of the alignment of houses, streets and fences, in order that within this city the same may be built and laid out in orderly fashion. Likewise, they are to see to it that at a convenient time this city be properly accommodated and provided with the necessary public buildings, such as churches, schools, a court house, weigh house, charitable institutions, docks, piers, bridges and other similar works, for which buildings, as in course of time and with the increase of population they become necessary, there will necessarily be required subsidies and funds, which must of necessity be procured from the burghers and inhabitants according to circumstances. Therefore, the burgomasters, but with the advice of the schepens and the approval of the Director General and Council, shall have power and authority to lay a reasonable tax on the burghers and inhabitants to meet the needs of this city and also to impose fines and penalties on the unwilling contraveners and to levy them by execution.

In case any orphan masters, church masters, surveyors, fire wardens, or other similar officers should be found necessary, the burgomasters shall report this to the Director General and Council and the need thereof being understood and acknowledged, the burgomasters shall have the absolute nomination of the persons thereto needed and qualified, but the appointment and confirmation shall depend on the Director General.

As to the court of schepens, although the burgomasters of Amsterdam, the name-giver to this city, properly speaking have no judicial authority in conjunction with the schepens, whether over inhabitants or burghers, or in criminal or civil matters, nevertheless, since the schepens for the present are still weak and the honorable lords patrons have thought fit to compose the court of justice of two burgomasters and five schepens, the burgomasters will until further order in the sessions of the court of schepens have an advisory and a casting vote and when present alternately preside, the vice presidency being annually occupied by the oldest schepen, and all this until it shall be otherwise ordained or decided by the aforesaid patrons or their agents here.

Which burgomasters and schepens, according to circumstances, shall meet at least once or twice a week at a regular time and place to be decided upon and made known by them, to hear, examine and determine, whether by judgment or arbitration, according to the circumstances of the case, all civil questions which are moved or brought before them, also criminal offenses of a minor degree, hereinafter more fully specified.

However, if they find the case fit to be arbitrated and the parties disposed thereto, the arbitration shall be conducted completely out of court by both the burgomasters and those whom they according to the circumstances of the case may wish to adjourn to themselves from among the schepens or other honest burghers, yes, even, if the burgomasters should find the matter of sufficient importance, from among the council, from which arbitration there shall be no bill of review or appeal.

And before the said court of burgomasters and schepens must needs be brought in the first instance all matters amounting to one hundred guilders or less (the arrest made by the fiscal excepted); also all actions of slander, or differences of words between lord and vassal, master and servant, mistress and maid, neighbour and neighbour, buyer and seller, tenant and landlord, gentleman and workman and other such like questions.

Likewise, all criminal actions consisting of acts, threats, fights, or wounding, whether they be brought or instituted before the aforesaid court by the parties, or by the fiscal (representing until further order the schout of the city).

Likewise, before the said court, until further order and increase of population, shall be subject to be cited, be compelled to appear and be amenable not only the burghers and inhabitants of this city of New Amsterdam, for the present extending to the Fresh Water, together with the arriving passengers, merchants, traders, skippers, masters of sloops and their sailors, so long as they remain on the roadstead or in the harbour of this city, but also all other inhabitants of Manhattan island, as well as the inhabitants of Amersfoort, Breuckelen and Midwout and all those residing in the adjacent territory across the East and North rivers, who thus far enjoy no court of justice either by patent from the aforesaid lords patrons or their agents, and all until such time as it may be otherwise ordained or decided by the aforesaid lords patrons or their agents, who refer to them the duty of ordering, installing and appointing such officers and judges and in and outside of this city as they according to the population and increase of colonies, cities, villages, hamlets and inhabitants shall deem suitable for the more convenient administration of justice.

All those who desire to have some one summoned before the aforesaid court of justice shall do so through the ordinary court messenger, to be qualified for this purpose by the Director General and Council, at least twelve hours before the case is called, when the contending parties shall be bound to appear in their own person, without either of them, be he plaintiff or defendant, being allowed to be assisted by advocates, attorneys, or any one else, except women, imbeciles and minors, who may appear with their guardians, and those who are either sick or who have traveled out of the jurisdiction shall in such case be allowed to appoint some one in their stead, who is neither an advocate nor an attorney, nor occupies himself with any legal business, nor receives compensation therefor.

The aforesaid burgomasters and schepens may in the suits between parties appearing before them decree the providing of a deposit, definite condemnation, or discharge, as they according to the circumstances of the case shall deem proper.

In cases of injury, whether by words or deeds, they shall as above stated use diligence as arbitrators to make the parties agree and pacify them if possible. If not, they shall refer the complete account of the proceedings and the documents to the Director General and Council and upon the decision thereof impose a penalty to keep the peace.

In case the defendant, being duly cited, does not appear in person as hereinbefore stated, default shall be decreed against him, and upon the second default the schepens may order a deposit to be made and authorize the plaintiff, especially if he be a stranger, to take out the sum demanded, upon security or guaranty of restitution, if such should afterwards be deemed proper.

And if thereafter the case against the defendant, upon a third citation, be called to purge himself of his second default, or hear judgment pronounced, the burgomasters and schepens shall, if the defendant even then fails to appear, change the aforesaid deposit, by a judgment by default, to a definite condemnation, if the case lends itself thereto.

In cases and questions of slander, the burgomasters and schepens may by the court messenger summon the parties to appear in person, under penalty of forfeiture of one ducat [one and a half guilders] for the first default, of forfeiture of three guilders for the second time and of forfeiture of one pound Flemish [six guilders] for the third time. The parties even then failing to appear, the aforesaid burgomasters and schepens may refer them to the Director General and Council, provided that they shall first levy the aforesaid fines by execution, one half to be for the benefit of the said gentleman and the other half to be employed at their discretion.

The fines for default which the parties shall incur before the aforesaid court shall be, for the defendant, the first time eight stuivers, the second time twelve stuivers, and the third time sixteen stuivers, and for the plaintiff as much again, to be applied as above. Of which defaults a record shall be kept as well by the court messenger on the ordinary roll, as by the secretary or clerk in the minutes.

From all definite judgments rendered by the aforesaid burgomasters and schepens in civil as well as in criminal matters and above one hundred guilders (with the exception of judgments by default), the parties who find themselves aggrieved may appeal to the Director General and Council of New Netherland, provided that the appellant first of all deposit the moneys or goods mentioned in the definite judgment and pay the costs of the suit, if he has been condemned to do so.

Furthermore, the appellant shall be bound to have the appeal entered by the clerk or secretary within the space of ten days after the pronouncement of the judgment and to prosecute the same at the first meeting of the Director General and Council, or by petition, within the space of twenty days, to give notice thereof to the Director General and Council. The appeal being granted, he shall deposit in the hands of the Supreme Council twelve guilders, which shall be returned to him in case the judgment from which he appeals is modified.

It being the proper function of the burgomasters and schepens to render law and justice between the contending parties, they shall practice the same according to the written laws of our fatherland, especially, as far as is possible and the nature of the case will permit, according to the laudable customs and ordinances of the city of Amsterdam and the ordinances issued by the Director General and Council, which shall be duly observed. But if parties litigating before them either in the court room or out of it insult them in their official capacity or in person, by word or gesture, or insult each other, the court may by peremptory execution fine or punish them according to the nature of the offense, the penalty not to exceed the sum of twelve guilders.

Finally, the burgomasters and schepens shall cause this and all other privileges, orders and instructions which from time to time may be issued by the aforesaid Hon. Directors or their agents in this city to be registered and kept in a register, to which the burgomasters and schepens who are in office may either jointly or individually have recourse as often as they please, without it, however, being necessary or permissible for them privately to make extracts therefrom.

Thus, until further amplification, provisionally done at the meeting of the Hon. Director General and Council of New Netherland, this 3d day of February anno 1653, in New Netherland. Was signed: P. Stuyvesant, La Mottragne, Brin Newton and Cor. van Tienhoven.

We, the burgomasters and schepens, qualified thereto by the Director General and Council promise and swear in the presence of Almighty God, saving our former oath of allegiance to the High and Mighty Lords the States General of the United Netherlands as sovereigns, the Hon. Directors of the Chartered West India Company as lords and patroons of this New Netherland province, and their Director General and Council already appointed or hereafter to be appointed, that we, in our aforesaid capacity, to the best of our knowledge shall administer true law and justice between parties in cases brought before us, without any passion of favor or disfavor; that we shall promote and help promote the welfare of this city and the inhabitants thereof; that we shall uphold the honer of God and his pure religion as in conformity to the word of God and the regulations of the synod of Dortdrecht it is taught in the churches of the Netherlands and here, and no other; that we shall maintain and help maintain the high jurisdiction of the aforesaid lords patroons and their supreme government already established or hereafter to be established; and that we shall bar and help bar whatever in any way shall conflict therewith. So help us God Almighty.

And by virtue of the foregoing there have been chosen and appointed:

As burgomasters

Joncker Aren Q Hattom, formerly schepen of the city of Culemburch, steward of the county domain and member of the ponder board of the said county, and at present captain of the burghe guard here.
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

Marten Cregier, old inhabitant of this city, formerly a representative of the commonality and at present also a captain of the burgher guard.

As schepens
Paulus Leendersen van der Grit, from Amsterdam
Willem Beeckman, from Sutphen, both former representatives of the commonality and lieutenants of the burgher guard
Pieter Wollersen van Couwenhoven, one of our inhabitants of this province and a former deacon
Maximilian van Gheel
Allard Antony, both from Amsterdam, sworn burgheers and merchants here

Instructions for the secretary or clerk of the Inferior Court of Justice
In the first place, he shall be bound to attend the ordinary as well as the extraordinary sessions and court days of the burgomasters and schepens, in order to serve the court with his pen and make a perfect record according to the true intent and meaning of all that the presiding officer shall order him to write.

He shall take care to enter in the minutes the complaint of the plaintiff as well as the answer of the defendant, according to their true intent and meaning, without any favor or ill will, or regard of persons, and, after the members have expressed their opinions, on the order of the presiding officer note the final conclusion underneath.

3
In case there should on any point be any difference of opinion among the burgomasters and schepens, the vote of the majority shall be followed according to the rules of procedure, but he shall not be at liberty to divulge outside the court the opinion of the minority, but if requested to do so by the minority he may enter their opinion underneath the order or decision of the majority.

4
After the adjournment of the court he shall carefully copy into a register the complaint and the answer of the parties and all the orders of the burgomasters and schepens, and once or twice a year deliver an authentic copy thereof to the secretary’s office of the Director General and Council.

5
For each order issued by the burgomasters and schepens, or entered on the margin of a petition, he shall be entitled to receive a fee of twelve stuivers for writing, and for entering the same in the minutes six stuivers.

6
In order to accommodate residents as well as strangers, he shall be at liberty to draw up petitions for whoever asks for it, provided that he causes the same to be signed by the petitioner, for which he shall receive a fee of sixteen stuivers if the petition has to do with civil matters, and otherwise twenty stuivers if the petition relates to questions of slander of minor offenses, and for drawing up an affidavit he shall receive twenty-four stuivers.

7
But petitions and remonstrances which by order of the burgomasters and schepens are to be presented or exhibited in their official capacity to the Director General and Council, together with all other writings and instruments drawn up by order of the aforesaid burgomasters and schepens, he shall write gratis on the yearly salary promised him by the Director General and Council.

Finally, he shall promise and swear to practice and perform all that is hereinbefore mentioned to the best of his ability and knowledge and furthermore, for so far as his capacity is concerned, to promote and help promote the honor of God and his pure religion, the sovereignty of the High and Mighty Lords the States General, together with the high jurisdiction and authority of the Hon. Directors and their supreme government, already established, or hereafter to be established, without planning, much less practising, anything contrary thereto. So truly may God Almighty help me.

And to the aforesaid office was chosen and appointed Jacob Hendricksen Kip, formerly chief clerk in the secretary’s office of the Director General and Council of New Netherland.

The first bench of burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam comprised: Burgomasters, Arrent van Hattem and Willem Bossuyt, and schepens, Paulus de Lannoy, Hendrick van Gheen, Allert van den Broeck and Pieter Wolffertsen van Couwenhoven.—Rec. N. Am., I: 49. Cornelis van Tielenhoven, the provincial fiscal, served this court as schout or prosecutor. The separation of this function did not occur in the city before 1660 (q.v.). Jacob Kip was appointed secretary to the municipal government.—Ibid., I: 548.

The first court session of the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam is opened with prayer, the text of which (imperfect at the beginning) is preserved in Rec. N. Am., I: 48–49: It reads: "... In addition it has pleased Thee to make us the rulers of the people in this place. Oh, Lord, our God, we cannot and will not be puffed up with pride, but we are not worthy of this honor, we are also too weak and unqualified to discharge this trust, unless Thou, oh God, givest us assistance. We pray Thee, the Fountain of all good Gifts, make us fit through Thy grace, that we may do the duties, imposed upon us, faithfully and honestly. Enlighten for this purpose the darkness of our minds, that we may distinguish right from wrong, truth from lies and give correct and just decisions, having our eyes on Thy Word, which is a sure guide to simple wisdom. Let Thy law be the light upon our paths and a lantern for our footsteps, that they may never leave the path of justice. Let us receive it with thankfulness, and not only hear, but also observe and hear everything. Let respect of person be far from us, so that we may judge the poor and the rich, friends and enemies, inhabitants and strangers, according to the same rules of truth and never deviate from them as a favor to anybody, and whereas gifts blind the eyes of men and cloud the mind of them, we will never accept, neither will we give. We will not be influenced by our love and prayers, but our decisions must be lighted. Thou knowest also, oh Lord, that bad and ungodly men usually vilify and speak against Thy holy ordinances, therefore arm us with strength, courage, wisdom and confidence, that we may oppose all sins and bad things earnestly and zealously and fight for truth and justice, until we are dead. Please also, oh Lord, to bless the resolutions, to be taken by us, that they may be carried out and have effect to the honor of Thy holy Name, for the best of this place, entrusted to us, and for our salvation." This prayer was followed by the Lord's prayer, no doubt said in unison.

The burgomasters and schepens of the city of New Amsterdam, at this their first court session, give notice that they will hold their regular meetings in "the house hither called the City tavern, henceforth the City Hall ["Stadt Huys"], on Monday mornings."—Rec. N. Am., I: 49. For reproduction of the page of the record book containing the entry of this transaction, see Pl. 10-b. They continued to meet, however, at Fort Amsterdam on the 10th and 17th, but began their proceedings at the city hall on the 24th of this month.—Ibid., I: 51, 52, 54. On Dec. 24 (q.v.), they asked the directors of the West India Co. for the ownership of the city hall, "either as a free gift" to the city, or "free of a reasonable valuation." The company, in May, 1654, granted the building to the city.—Ibid., I: 146, 219, 291. For the erection of the city tavern (modern Nos. 71-73 Pearl St.), see 1642. The building was sold to John Rodman in 1699 and later demolished.—See Aug. 15, 1669.

With the establishment of municipal government, the settlement,—"for the present extending to the Fresh Water" which is the "Form of Government"), formally became the city of New Amsterdam.

The burgomasters and schepens recommend to Stuyvesant and the council the necessity of having a court of ordinary sessions and schepens, and they nominate from their board Paulus Leendertsen van Groot and Willem Beckman and from the commonalty Oloff Stevensen van Coetland and Cornelis Steenwyck, out of which number the director-general and council are asked to commission two. The resolution was renewed on the 24th.—Rec. N. Am., I: 52. To this general Stuyvesant adhered and the council concurred, on the ground that the intention was praiseworthy and that they were "pleased with it;" but that it needed "appendages.... before such an Orphans Court could be established, for which the weak state of this just beginning City" was not prepared. They suggested that the court be limited to the two witnesses of the church and, in particular cases, to "special curators," to "prefer that widow and orphans over their estates."—Ibid., I: 56. See Oct. 18, 1657.

The burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam resolve to propose to Stuyvesant and the council that "at the first opportunity a weighhouse be opened, for the convenience of everybody, to weigh all wares, none excepted," which are delivered in the city, and "to appoint somebody to weigh everything above 50 lbs," for which he shall have "a fee of one penny per pound, payable by both purchaser and seller, each one half or as they agree," also, that "all weights and measures, such as ells, schepens, tubs, barrels, quarters and cans" shall be stamped, "according to the custom of Old Amsterdam." The proposal to "put up public scales" was before the council on the 18th, but, as nothing was settled at this meeting, the burgomasters and schepens renewed their request on the 24th.—Rec. N. Am., I: 52; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 196. Stuyvesant and the council replied, on the 26th, "that, when proper, a weighhouse and scales" should be built and made, and that an ordinance concerning the same should be passed as soon as the weigh-house was ready, and weights and measures which conformed to the Amsterdam standard were furnished.—Rec. N. Am., I: 76. The burgomasters and schepen were requested to be regulated by the standards of Amsterdam. The burgomasters and schepens were, in the meantime, to direct the schout "to regulate, weigh or measure all weights, yard and other measures accordingly and stamp them with a mark," as they should desire.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 196. The weigh-house and scales were established in the spring, before May 4, 1654 (q.v.)—Rec. N. Am., I: 195, 246. Regulations are made by ordinance for the inspection of tobacco by the tobacco inspectors, Isaac de Forest and George Holmes, New Netherland tobacco is not to be inspected in the months of December, January, and February, and at other seasons only on certain days of the week. The tobacco, if unmerchantable, is to be burned by them at once. They are empowered "to unhook all the Tubs or Hogheads coming here [New Amsterdam] from Virginia and offered to them for inspection," so that they can "see into the middle of the Tobacco, where usually fraud occurs." Fixed inspection fees are to be paid, and the inhabitants of the city are warned not to hinder or molest the inspectors, "but if need be, to lead them all reasonable assistance."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 139-40. The two newly-created burgomasters of the city took part with Stuyvesant and the council in the enactment of this ordinance. It was renewed, on March 10, 1655.—Ibid., I: 189.

The council resolves "that the ordinances concerning farm-servants, and the brewing and melting of hard grain be published and posted."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 196; another translation in Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 140. The full texts are not among the records; the ordinances may have been simply renewals of former ones.

The grant in Liber GG bears date March 15, 1646. According to modern maps, this land was in the block bounded by Cherry, Roosevelt, and Oak Sts., and the Bowery.

The burgomasters and schepens begin to hold their proceedings at the Stadt Huys (city hall).—See Feb. 6.

Stuyvesant and his council meet with the burgomasters and Mar. schepens of New Amsterdam in general session. Letters from the directors at Amsterdam and the last received current from New England, concerning warlike preparations having been read, the joint meeting resolves to prepare for the defense of the city by establishing a burgher night watch "to stand guard in full squads over night" at designated places, but beginning at
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

1633 once "at the City Tavern, now the City Hall" (Pearl St. and Mar. Coenties Alley); secondly, it was voted "that Fort New Amsterdam be repaired and strengthened," and, thirdly, as the fort can not contain all of the inhabitants in the City, it is considered desirable "to surround the greater part of the City with a high stockade and a small breastwork," behind which in time of peril the inhabitants can be sheltered from attack and defend themselves and their possessions. It being deemed impossible at this time to protect the outlying villages, with their scattered inhabitants, by stockades, or defend them by other means, a concentration at New Amsterdam is planned, "for the better protection of one place." The joint meeting considers ways and means for defense, and, among other things, provides that Skipper Jan Jansen Visscher be secretly instructed to make "ready with his ships, loaded with pieces of artillery, in case of emergency."—Rec. N. Am., I: 65-66. On the afternoon of the same day, a provisional list of contributions, amounting to over 5,000 florins, was fixed upon by the burgomasters and scheepen for the expenses of defense.—Ibid., I: 66-67. This list of names is the earliest assessment list of the kind for the city. At the same time, the city authorities made record that the burgler guard was ready, but asked the provincial government to furnish them fuel and light. The city agreed that Manhattan should be fortified with palisades and a breastwork; that the fort should be strengthened for defense; and that the city treasurer should set in it from four to five thousand florins, with which "to carry out the needed works," the money to be refunded later "by all interested in New Netherland after taxation of their estates."—Ibid., I: 66-67. See March 15.

14 The burgomasters and scheepen resolve to ask the provincial authorities if it is not wise to first set off the city of New Amsterdam "in the most convenient way with a stockade," and, when this has been done, to put the fort "in a proper condition of defense as a place of retreat." They offer to furnish from four to six thousand florins for this purpose on the credit of the "community interested." They inquire whether it be expedient that the letters which have already been sent, "some delegates" be despatched "to the respective Colonies of New England," so as to expedite the relations between New Netherland and New England and continue "former intercourse and commerce," besides learning how far the New Englanders are "affected by the differences and the war" between the mother countries in Europe.—Rec. N. Am., I: 67-68. Stuyvesant and the council answered at once that they were "pleased with these propositions," and agreed that the city's fortifications should be first made properly. Though delegates were to be sent to the different New England colonies with credentials and instructions from the provincial body, that body, on the 17th, voted to delay awhile the sending of agents "till time and circumstances should require" their immediate departure.—Ibid., I: 68; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 201. The delegates chosen by the city, on the 17th, were Paulus Leendertsen Vander Grint and—Rec. N. Am., I: 68-69.

By a plurality vote, the burgomasters and scheepen choose Pieter Wolheftnotsen Van Convenhowen and Willem Beeckman to represent the city on a joint committee to have charge of fortifying the city. On the previous day, the provincial council had chosen its first councilor, Johannes La Montagne, to act for them. This joint committee now advertises its readiness to "receive proposals for a certain piece of work to set off the City with palisades, 12 to 15 feet long, by the rod," and announces that prospective bidders can "hear the conditions and look over the work" on the afternoon of Tuesday, the 18th, at the city hall.—Rec. N. Am., I: 69. The specifications were recorded in the city court's minutes, as follows: "The palisades must be 12 feet long, 18 inches in circumference, sharpened at the upper end and be set in line. At each rod a post 21 inches in circumference is to be set, to which rails, split for this use shall be nailed one foot below the top. The height of the pole shall be 4 feet high, 4 feet at the bottom and 3 feet at top, covered with rods, with a ditch 3 feet wide and a 2 feet deep, 2 feet within the breastwork. The length of the ground to be lined with palisades is 180 rods, the end of the rods being the last of the money. Payments will be made weekly in good wampum."—Ibid., I: 74, where a sketch is shown of a detail of the proposal. This plan was offered by difference of prices, at 50, 60, 70, 80, 90, 95, 97, 100 florins per rod. The committee in charge, however, offered to let the work only at 25 florins per rod. No bidders were found at so low a figure, hence the committee suspended the bidding March provisionally and declared the higher bidders to be prohibitive.

After conferring on the matter, the committee agreed to an alteration of plans, all the houses and ditches in the City, excluding the Courtyard, are to be surrounded with a high stockade and a small breastwork, behind which in time of peril the inhabitants can be sheltered from attack and defend themselves and their possessions. This lumen was to be delivered "on the Strand [Pearl St. near [Governer] Loockermans house or at the Beavers Path [i.e., perhaps meaning Burgers Path] and that within 14 days." Payment was promised "in good wampum, when the number has been delivered," and thegetState, 200 instead of 100 florins, agreed "to deliver all said posts and rails for 20 stivers for each post and rail together."—Ibid., I: 73-74. See March 31, April 20, July 28 and Sept. 1.

The population of the province of New Netherland has been increased by births, and "by the arrival of many passengers who have come from Holland "within two or three years." Many more, both freemen and servants of the company, are now expected in returning ships. A scarcity of breads is imminent, because much of the cultivation is limited to tobacco planting. Stuyvesant and the council, wishing to avert a scarcity of bread, issued an ordinance to the tobacco planters, to plant now as many hills with Maize, or as much land with Pease or other hard grain for Bread" as they plant with tobacco, on pain of a fine of fifty guilders for dereliction.—Laws & Ord. N.Neth., 141-42.

The director-general and council resolved that the first Wednesday of each month shall be a day of fasting and prayer.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 131.

An additional excise is imposed on all wines and spirituous liquors consumed in or exported from the city of New Amsterdam, to provide funds for the treasury of the provincial government of the company.—Laws & Ord. N.Neth., 142-43. See also Aug. 2.

Stuyvesant writes to the burgomasters and scheepen that, notwithstanding the order made in the previous year "at the request of the Select Men, who promised properly to fence in the fort and to keep the hogs meanwhile from the walls," "nothing or at least only little" has been done, and the executed work has been again "destroyed by the hogs, acting with this dilitiosity. The selectmen have been, meanwhile, superseded by the new city fathers, upon whom the duty now devolves. Stuyvesant urges them to action. They decided "provisionally to engage a handsmen in and in the meantime to make the fence as quickly as possible," as Stuyvesant had promised to furnish the posts.—Rec. N. Am., I: 78-79. This correspondence evidently grew out of the report made by Stuyvesant to the council, on the 21st, in which he revealed the negligence of the "Board of Nine Men" with respect to "enclosing the Fort with Palissades or stakes, to which work the community had voluntarily contributed a considerable sum."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 201.

A general day of fasting and prayer was proclaimed for this Apr. day "everywhere in this Province of New Netherland." The proclamation was read publicly by the secretary of the city of New Amsterdam to the inhabitants of "the subordinate villages of Bruckelen, Moonstruit and Amsteltown."—Rec. N. Am., I: 79. The immediate cause was the war between England and the states-general, together with the fear of an invasion from New England.

At a meeting of the council of New Netherland, it is resolved that "the citizens without exception" shall "begin immediately digging a ditch from the East river to the Nieuw Amstel at 20 feet and 11 to 12 fathoms, and at the top sloping in a little towards the bottom," that the carpenters shall "be urged to prepare jointly the stakes and rails," that "the soldiers and other servants of the

Company with the free degrees, no one excepted," shall "complete the work on the Fort by making a parapet and the farmers 20 . . . be summoned to haul pieces of turf;" that the sawyers shall "immediately begin to saw planks of four inches' thickness for gun carriages and platforms."—N. T. Col. Doc., XIV: 201. This added another modifying idea to those of March 13-15 (q.v.).

The Reformed Tuesday service held at the Church of St. Mary, on May 12, when Stuyvesant and the council met with the burgomasters and schepens and cojointly enacted an ordinance for carrying out the scheme of fortifying the city of New Amsterdam with palisades.
The edit provided for apportioning the physical labour on the works among the inhabitants by rotation in four divisions of three-day shifts, until completed, which it was believed would take two or three weeks. Persons in opposition or in default were to be fined for their first offense, to forfeit their burgher-right for the second, and to be subjected to arbitrary punishment and banishment for the third offense. By inhabitants was meant "Burghers, Merch-chants, Mechanics or the crews of ships, sloops in harbor or to come there." Those who could not work themselves might provide a fit substitute.—Laws Of Ord. N. Neth., 144-45; another translation, is in N. T. Col. Doc., XIV: 202-3. On July 18 (q.v.), the Reformed Tuesday service held at the Church of St. Mary, enacted that, for "now already three weeks," the city had "been surrounded with palisades on the land side [at present Wall St.] and along the Strand on the East River [present Pearl St.] and thus satisfactorily . . . strengthened."—Rev. N. Am., I: 313.

Stuyvesant and the council resolve that commissioners be sent on an embassy to Virginia; they appoint Fiscal Van Tienhoven on behalf of the company, and ask the burgomasters and schepens to nominate another from their board to accompany him. On account of the war between the mother countries in Europe, this embassy was designed to promote a continuation of correspondence, peace, and commerce with the Virginians. Arent van Hattem, president of the board, was commissioned with Van Tienhoven by Stuyvesant.
Their mission to Virginia had no evident results, because Gov.
Richard Bennett and his council felt themselves unauthorized to enter into negotiations without advice from their home government, but promised to submit the proposals of the New Nether-landers to their superiors in England. On Dec. 16, Stuyvesant, judging that an answer had now been received by the Virginia government from England, commissioned Rev. Samuel Drinius diplomatic agent "to remind the said Honorable Governor and Council of Virginia of our former good intentions, which we still have and our propositions and to learn their reply." Stuyvesant's acts in this matter were highly approved by the directors in Amsterdam and the results were beneficial to New Netherland.—N. T.

with the appraisal on both sides.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's held on May 12, appraised "the stone house and lot with the out-buildings thereof" at 8,900 guilders.—Ibid., III: 111.

New England agents come to New Amsterdam in regard to inter-provincial relations, and are lodged at "the Basse's house in Manhatoes."—Brodhead, op. cit., I: 552, and authorities there cited.

24 The New England agents negotiate with Stuyvesant concerning their differences; they left abruptly the next day, warning the Dutch and the Indians of New Netherland not to offer offence to the Engish of the United Colonies.—Brodhead, op. cit., I: 553-54.

24 Noah Webster, writing to Rev. Dr. Samuel Miller from New Haven, April 9, 1820, said: "The following facts are stated
3 from the Records of the Town of Hartford, & from personal view.

During the war between the English & Dutch in 1653. Capt.
May Underhill received a Commission to seize [sic] the lands on the Connecticut belonging to the Dutch. The Commission bears date May 24, 1653. The lands were seized & confiscated. They consisted of a few acres only near the confluence of Mill River & the Connecticut. The fort or blockhouse of the Dutch [Fort Good Hope] stood near the bank of the Connecticut, on the South side of the stream called Mill River. I have seen some of the pieces of bricks belonging to that house, lying on the banks of the Connecticut. They were of a light color, like the bricks of some old houses which I have seen in New York or Albany."—Miller Papers, in N. Y. Hist. Society.

Notice is sent to Stuyvesant and the council by the directors at New Amsterdam that their body has been increased by the appointment of Nicolas de Sille as first counselor.—N. T. Col.

The directors of the West India Co. at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant that Adriaen van der Donck, upon his petition, has been granted the right to practice as an advocate in New Netherland, he "having received his degree at law from the University of Leyden and been admitted to the bar by the Court of Holland." He is under a duty to the Company "to have and cause examined the documents and papers in the secretary's office at Amsterdam to complete his already begun Description of New Netherland," the directors advise Stuyvesant that he may "let him have such documents and papers, as may be thought of service to him in completing his history," but warn Stuyvesant "to be herein more jealous of the Company's own papers and not to reveal any against us and we be drawn into new troubles and quarrels."— N. T. Col. Doc., XIV: 211-12. This documentary investigation, apparently, was never made by van der Donck, and certainly was not employed in his little booklet first published in 1655, entitled:
Beschrijving van Nieuw-Nederlant.

The directors at Amsterdam inform Stuyvesant that they have appointed Cornelis van Ruyckevo, "coming over with this ship" (Koninkx Salomon), as secretary to the council of New

The directors at Amsterdam have an official letter to Nicolas de Sille, about to go to New Netherland as a member of the provincial council there.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 278. Sometime after his arrival at New Amsterdam (the document is undated), he adressed the following petition to the directors at Amsterdam:
"Niclaus de Sille humbly makes known, that to him, on 24 July 1653, an open letter had been given to take along addressed to Director P: Stuyvesant and the council, to acknowledge the petition as first political and military councillor of the Director there [New Netherland], to reside in said capacity in the fort, to deliberate with and in conjunction with his Honor concerning all matters that may concern, etc. Further, in all such occurrences and affairs as here shall happen or transpire; which letter the petitioner, on his arrival here, has personally delivered into the hands of the General, in the presence of all the councillors; but found that the same was little respected, because on a certain occasion the petitioner, finding that something improper took place in the council, opposed what had been passed along by the director and the fiscal [Cornelis van Tienhoven], for reasons that similar resolutions could not be adopted unless the petitioner were present.
Then the General derisively answered, "Well, you sit beside me, where is the written authority for it? I haven't got it. Or, have you a commission?" Thus the petitioner not having anything from your Honors was scornfully laughed at by the fiscal, and they continued; whereas the petitioner has always been expecting some commission or instruction, and still awaits them, because he the petitioner can do nothing against the two aforesaid, and the General has first departed for Curacao, then to Fort Orange, then to the South River, and elsewhere. The petitioner with his Honor having authority here, it left this place without either one, the petitioner not knowing the reason, meanwhile greatly incon-veniencing this province. The petitioner looked after everything as far as he was able, but the extent of the General to him, fearing nothing.

In between all, so many things happen, that the petitioner has fears, concerning how these things shall be accounted for to your Honors, whereas he sees that it is tending to the great injury of this province, [caused] talk among the inhabitants, damage to the people, brings into contempt (independe) the petitioner, therefore the petitioner finds himself obliged to address your Honours in a prayer, in a commission or instruction, as your Honours shall find proper, in order to prevent all improperities, so that the petitioner may know how to regulate himself, and that besides, the director and the council shall be obliged to acknowledge the petitioner. —Trans. from unpublished original Dutch petition in N. Y. Pub. Lib. for Aug. 2

For three weeks the city has now been strengthened and secured by palisades. Stuyvesant now calls upon the burgomasters and scheepen to fulfil the rest of their agreement of March 13 (p. 53), "to put the fort into a proper state of defense as a safe place of retreat." He tells them that, relying upon their previous resolution, he had ordered the hogs forward not only the Company's, but also our own necessary works and have assisted with our own as well as the Company's negroes, traipersonal [trained personnel] and property. He wants them to aid "both in furnishing money and in completing the newly ready fort," and particularly to see that measures are adopted to keep the hogs "from the newly made walls and works of the fort."

—Rec. N. Am., I: 90.

The city authorities on the following day replied that the people were unable to do more, since they were already "exhausted and pressed by previous public works," but that "all mercantile business and trades" were "at a standstill," and that the "promised monies" for public works had been "already used up." They asked to be relieved "from further taxing the citizens;" yet they requested authority to raise, as occasion offered itself, "money amounting to the most civil manner."

Ibid., I: 91. Their idea soon revealed itself in a demand for the revenues on wines and beer (see Aug. 2). But Stuyvesant came back at them, on Aug. 12. He said that, "in violation of their solemn promises made both in writing and orally," they had failed to "lend a hand to repairing and strengthening" the fort, and he protested against the running at large of hogs in the city, to the damage of the "newly finished works of the fort." Two days later, therefore, the burgomasters and scheepen sent their messenger "to notify the Burgheers that every one of them should" take care of his hogs or keep them in the sty until the fort and recently constructed works were "fenced in with palisades." —Ibid., I: 97-98.

Because "some however uncertain rumors" have come to hand concerning the "gathering of the English in the North, especially in Rhode Island," Stuyvesant warns the burgomasters and scheepen "not to allow any citizen or inhabitant" of the city "to remove," and the fiscal is charged "not to grant passes to yachts, until the crews and the yachts" have, as previously ordered, come down or until further orders according to the course of events and new reports. —Rec. N. Am., I: 91.

The burgomasters and scheepen call together an assembly of "the principal citizens and inhabitants," at the city hall, and call upon them to meet "a specified account, and make improvements made so far for the entertainments of the City and similar works," which amount to 7,500 florins. The assembly is asked "what measures should be taken, to pay for the expenditures already made and yet to come," and votes unanimously "that nothing more" shall be contributed unless Stuyvesant and the council surrender "the whole excise on wines and beer" to the city treasury. Moreover, the assembly votes that the board shall inform Stuyvesant of its determination, and agrees to meet again in case the proposal is rejected. On the same day, Stuyvesant gives his oral answer that he can not "think of surrendering the excise on wines and beer, now payable at the Company's office," for else he would "be obliged to discharge immediately all the soldiers, now expected from the Fatherland; also that the citizens only paid the tapsters' excite." Therefore, the assembly resolves to "obligate" contributions towards funds to fill the entire revenues from the excise are granted to the city. With this failure of further contributions, it was adjudged "impossible to keep the work, already begun, going without paying for it."

The burgomasters and scheepen said they lacked the power to provide the means, and protested that, "if later some unexpected measures" were undertaken, "they should not be blamed for not having done their duty." —Rec. N. Am., I: 92-93.

On Nov. 11, another assembly of the commonalty met with the board at the city hall, and was notified of Stuyvesant's consent "that from this time forth all the excise of beer and wines" should be paid into the treasury of the city and be "employed for the public good." But, as there were no funds then available from this source, "though very much needed at this perilous time," it was urged that "some general taxes and means must be provided."

The board asked the commonalty if they would submit "to such ordinances and measures" as the board would enact and adopt for the support of the city. An affirmative answer was given unanimously and the commonalty resolved to obey the Burgomasters and Scheepen in all things as good subjects are bound to do," attending their resolution with their signatures. —Ibid., I: 126-27.

On Nov. 19, the burgomasters and scheepen resolved, because of Stuyvesant's consent that the city be granted the excise "from the first of November," to "apply verbally to the Director General for a council grant," which would be returned to them to about thirty-two hundred guilders annually. Comparing this sum with the usual excise, the board declared the excise would "scarcely produce so much."

They resolved unanimously, therefore, "to go in a body to the Director General, and demand in conformity with the grants and councils made together, the excises received at the Company's Counting house," and, in case of refusal, to request their dismissal, since it would be impossible for them "to continue thus any longer." —Ibid., I: 128.

On Nov. 20, as Stuyvesant had informed them that he had no power to dismiss them, and would not consent to any alterations in the terms of the excise, the burgomasters and scheepen resolved "not to abandon their offices as yet, without further reasons." —Ibid., I: 128. The board again resolved, on Nov. 25, to petition Stuyvesant and the council for a grant of the excise without reservation, "except what is sent to Fort Orange," and said that because they had been promised it and had so declared to an assembly of the commonalty, who had thereupon agreed to be taxed additionally for the support of the city, and the grant having been curtailed, they, the burgomasters and scheepen, were likely to be regarded by every one with contempt and censure. They protested that they would not be responsible if mischief arose from the negligence, and that they could not go on without money, and should therefore be compelled "to their sorrow to see before their eyes all the constructed works go to ruin and everything run to waste." Stuyvesant and the council, adhering to their former resolution, would not budge, but renewed the limited grant to the city, and declared that the excise was to be paid to the highest bidder. Hereupon, the burgomasters and scheepen issued an order "to all Tapsters, Innkeepers and Inhabitants" that thereafter "they must apply to Jacob Kip as Receiver . . . for their necessary permit," for which the usual excise was to be paid on obtaining it. —Ibid., I: 129-30. Dissatisfied with the limited grant of excise revenues, the burgomasters and scheepen drew up a memorial to the directors at Amsterdam, on Dec. 21, in which they declared that this revenue amounted to only one third of the sum required for the salaries and wages of the ecclesiastical and civil officers of the city, and that the "maintenance of the City works and other wants" amounted to as much more. They bought the directors, therefore, to grant them the excise, "without any limitation;" also authority "to levy some new imposts and other small fees such as a small seal, etc.," and the "farming of the Ferry" from public works. —Ibid., I: 145.

The directors of the Amsterdam chamber replied, on May 18, 1642, that it appeared strange to them that the burgomasters and scheepen should go so far "as not only to assist in organizing an independent Assembly without authority, but moreover to send in remonstrances." They denied them their request to be freed from excise payments, and warned them that the oligarchy of the commonalty had already secured the right of a "new small excise or import," and obtained the consent of Stuyvesant and the council to the exemption, but they gave the board additional authority for providing a revenue and made other concessions to the city. —Ibid., I: 217-19. Yet, on May 26, 1655, the directors at Amsterdam

Withdraw the excise revenues from the city and ordered them to be paid again "in [to] the general treasury of the Company," claiming that the city had misapplied the proceeds, and for other causes.—Ibid., I: 341.

7 Notice is given that two slopes will leave New Amsterdam for Fort Orange (Albany) every Monday, and that passes are to be obtained from Arent van Hattem, presiding burgomaster, and Willem Beeckman, one of the scheepmen, every Saturday morning at eight o'clock.—Cal. Hist. MSS, Dutch, 204.

In a naval battle off the Texel, Admiral Tromp is killed and the Dutch fleet yields to the English, making the latter masters of the channel.

11 Daniel Litschoe, in a suit against Gillis Pietersen vander Gow, in the court of burgomasters and scheepmen, demands payment of the second of three instalments for a house and lot he had sold to the defendant's deceased mother-in-law, Tyntie Schererenburg (or Scherenburgh), by deed of Jan. 22 of this year. This property lay between the house of Litschoe and the outside of the Palaisse of the city (now Wall St.), on the shore road of the East River (now Pearl St.), next to the ditch and adjoining the water gate. The lot had been diminished by a guard-house erected on a part of it by the city.—Rec. N. Am., I: 95; II: 162. On Sept. 11, the court decreed that the guard-house should be removed, so that it might be determined if the lot had been curtailed beyond the original survey and bill of sale.—Ibid., I: 113.

On Dec. 8, Litschoe petitioned the court for the removal of this guard-house, in order that he might be enabled to collect his pay. The court replied that the removal had been contracted for and would be executed "as soon as possible."—Ibid., I: 139.

On March 2, 1654, Litschoe again demanded in court the second payment ($216 florins). The defendant renewed his request for delivery of ground according to the bill of sale, and also asked delay of payment until May 1, to afford him opportunity to sell the house and lot, "being now a vacant estate," and promised then to pay the second and last payments together. The court acquiesced in this request.—Ibid., 170. Apparently this transaction was concluded on Oct. 29, 1654.—Ibid., I: 179, note. Gillis Pietersen vander Gow was co-heir to the property with his brother-in-law, Isaac Kip. Another guard-house had been erected near the same site before 1660.—See Castello Plan, C. Pl. 8a, Vol. III. See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 945.

On Oct. 7, 1656, the owners were ordered by the burgomasters and scheepmen to set back the fence of their "garden near the City gate, by the East river," because it was "standing too near the City wall, to the obstruction of the public and was formerly cut off by the general survey of the City," made in 1656. This was deemed necessary "so that wagons and horses" might "could conveniently be driven as was necessary and convenient for the city, they were promised satisfaction on the valuation of arbitrators."—Ibid., II: 179. The city's arbitrators, on June 16, 1657, reported an agreement that the city pay to the owners 550 guilders in merchantable wampum, within a month. The city court, therefore, ordered the city "to pay the obligation to Gillis Pietersen and Isaac Kip [for this sum], and then "mortgage the said house and lot," whereupon the owners "delivered up the deed and conveyance to the city."—Ibid., VII: 162, 163. See also Innes, New Am. and Its People, 277–78, for disagreements.

The burgomasters and scheepmen resolve unanimously "to propose orally" to Stuyvesant that he agree with them as to the necessity of sending a personal embassy to those of New England, where the General Assembly will be convened, according to report, on the 25th of August, in order to see how much can be effected with them respecting the state, on which point they would consider it necessary first at all previously to send a messenger, etc. —Rec. N. Am., I: 102.

Nicolaas de Sille sails from Holland with his five motherless children and a maid. He arrived at New Amsterdam on Nov. 3 (q.v.). He describes his voyage and arrival in New Netherland, therefrom in New Netherland, losing his wife, and how his wife was widowed. He was always ready to give battle, for we had a ship with seventeen pieces and had over eighty persons on board. . . . The third of November, on Saturday afternoon, we anchored before Fort New Amsterdam, adjacent to which lies the city of New Amsterdam, on the island of Manhattan, in New Netherland. We fired five shots with cannon, and three of the three shot were heard. The citizens were gathered in the streets and the soldiers were under arms, for they knew of my coming, as the ship De Geldersche Bloem, which ran out of the Vlye [the channel between the islands of Vlieland and Terschelling] on the north coast of Holland] with us on the 23d of August and lost us near Hitloudt [Sleteland Island] in a storm, had arrived twenty-four hours ahead of us. The fiscal, Tinsehoven, thereupon told us on board of our ship to go on shore, where I and my son [his eldest son, Laurens] were very cordially welcomed by the council, the burgomasters and the scheepmen (for General Stuyvesant had gone to Fort Orange) and the entire community, and were conducted to the fort, to the house of the general. When we came to the bridge all the cannon were discharged and the soldiers charged in proper form. In the house we were well entertained by the council and the magistrates, and the next day all my children were likewise welcomed and entertained until my lodgings were ready. The evening the Honorable General [Stuyvesant] and his wife came home, who entertained me also. In the afternoon he convened the council, wherein I was made to occupy the first seat, next to his honor. This, in brief, is the account of my arrival here.—Quarterly Journal of N. Y. State Hist. Ass'n, I: 100, ff., where De Sille's letter is printed for the first time, by A. J. F. van Loer. In 1656, De Sille succeeded Cornelis II: 351. He was also appointed schout of New Amsterdam. See also May 23 and Sept. 23, 1654, for his account of the country.

Michael Paulussen's wife requests of the burgomasters and scheepmen "payment of what her husband earned with his ship for fetching Palissades for the City works" a few months since. They allow Paulussen ten florins "for each load of palisades," or a total of 140 florins for fourteen loads.—Rec. N. Am., I: 112.

As "some friends" have "applied to the Director General and Council for a commission of marque and reprisal against the English," Stuyvesant requests that the burgomasters and scheepmen will "please jointly to repair at once to the Hon. Director General. This they do, and he reports that, "pursuant to the resolution," he has "issued the order to Skipper Willem Tommasen."—Rec. N. Am., I: 117.

A general assembly of the country was called by Stuyvesant and the council, "with the knowledge of the Burgomasters and Scheepmen," to be held on this day, being Thursday, in Fort Amsterdam. The city is represented by Burgomaster Marten Cregier or Kirger and Scheep Paulus Leenderten vander Grit, who had been chosen, on Sept. 9, by majority vote of the board, and "commissioned and authorized to assist in deciding all occurring subjects relating to public good," and to report back to the board "after the conclusion of the Assembly."—Rec. N. Am., I: 117.

At an assembly of deputes and delegates of the respective Colonies and Courts of New Netherland, there are "exacted, published, and posted ordinances and regulations touching the great and excessive dearness of all sorts of Merchandises, Provisions, Grain and Laborers' wages." The minutes of the assembly and the texts of the ordinances promulgated are not among the records, but their purport can be divined from a letter of the directors at Amsterdam to Stuyvesant and the council, of March 12, 1654, in which the directors expressed surprise that these resolutions had been published without their knowledge or consent, and in which they ordered alterations or abrogation.—N. J. Col. Doc., XIV: 211–212; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 149–50.

Auko Jassen sues Augustus Heemans on a contract for building the latter's house. This, the "great house" of Heemans, was at what is now the north-west corner of Pearl and Broome Sts. The house was built in 1653, although the deed for the property was not recorded until 1656.—Liber Patents, III: 84 (Albany). By order of Gov. Colve, the house was demolished in 1675.—N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 609–77.

The brewery of Govert Loopkermans is mentioned in a suit against Claes Pietersen Koos, in which he seeks to compel Koos "to make the roof of the brewhouse" as contracted for by him.—Rec. N. Am., I: 121. It stood on his granted lot at the corner of Runt & Water. Rooms of the old brewery (now South St. & Howgh St.) were still standing in 1887. This lot, originally granted to Anthony Jansen, but neglected by him "as an offensive pool," was given to Loopkermans by a ground-brief of Sept. 15, 1656, "to build upon."—Book GC, 158, in office of sec. of state, Albany. The brewery and land, a little later, came into the possession of Jacob Wolphertsen van Couvenhoven, his brother-in-law.

The Lutherans of New Amsterdam petition Stuyvesant for Or. 4.

The privilege of sending to Holland for a minister, "and also to organize separately and publicly a congregation and church," was granted on Oct. 6 by the Dutch clergy, Megapolensis and Driius, in a letter to the classis of Amsterdam, on the ground that it "would tend to the injury" of their church, "the diminution of hearers of the Word of God, and the increase of dissensions," of which they said there had been a sufficiency for years. They feared that such a concession "would pave the way for others, so that in time" the province "would become a receptacle for all sorts of heretics and fanatics." The Lutherans, they said, had made similar requests twice before to Stuyvesant, besides writing to the states-general and the directors of the West India Co. at Amsterdam. The Dutch clergy requested the Amsterdam directors to use its "influence" with the directors to have "the project of our Lutheran friends" rejected. Stuyvesant trusted as one "zealous for the Reformed Religion," who "would rather relinquish his office than grant permission in this matter," since he considered it "contrary to the first article of his commission," by which he had promised, "with an oath, not to permit any other than the Reformed doctrine."—Rec. N. Am., I: 317. See Addenda.

The classis considered a complaint against the Lutherans of New Netherland, on Jan. 1, 1654, which had been presented by the "Deputaci ad eos insolentia adnotationes et intimandis" in an inclination to oppose the plan of the Lutherans because "the Mennonites, as well as the other English Independents, who are numerous there, might seek to introduce like public assemblies."—Eccles. Rec., I: 320–21. On Feb. 27, 1654 (q.v.), a formal resolution was passed by the directors at Amsterdam prohibiting the directors of a Lutheran ministry and public worship in New Netherland, or any other than that of the Reformed Church.

—Ibid., I: 322. This action the directors communicated to Stuyvesant and his council in a letter of March 12, advising that no similar petitions ought to be received, but "rather to turn them off in the most civil and least offensive means in order to induce them to listen and finally join the Reformed church and thus live in greater love and harmony among themselves."—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 552. As soon as the formal resolution had been passed, the classis of Amsterdam wrote to tell Megapolensis and Driius of its success in securing a refusal of "the Lutherans in every particular," and rejoiced that now the established church would "be maintained without being hindered" by either Lutherans "or other erring spirits."—Eccles. Rec., I: 322–23 cf. I: 348–49. This letter Megapolensis and Driius acknowledged with thanks on July 15.—Ibid., I: 346.

That settled the matter during the Dutch régime in New Netherland, so far as granting any right of ministry or public worship to the Lutherans was concerned. However, it did not deter the Lutherans from holding meetings surreptitiously in private houses. These and other "conventicles and gatherings" caused to come over in large numbers, on Sept. 15, 1656 (q.v.), appealed to the provincial authorities for suppression of them, and, on Feb. 1 (q.v.), an ordinance was issued against all assembly, "whether public or private," differing from the Dutch Reformed Church, under penalty of a fine of one hundred pounds Flemish to be paid by unqualified preachers. This law was aimed against the Independents at Middelburg (Newtown), L.I., and the Lutherans of New Netherland.—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 356; Laws & Ord. N. Nath., 211–12; Rec. N. Am., I: 20–21. When the Directors at Amsterdam received a copy of this "placat against the Lutherans," as well as information from Stuyvesant that recalcitrants had been committed to prison, they ordered him not to "publish such or similar placats" without their authority, but to pass over such matters "and let them have free religious exercises in their houses." "For it has always been our intention," said the directors, "to treat them quietly and leniently."—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 354. See June 11, 1656.

This was a concession to the Lutherans, who had again appealed to the directors at Amsterdam for the privilege of public worship, in like manner as was allowed their sect in Holland. But it "grieved" the members of the classis, who met in the succeeding summer and autumn, finally resolviug on Oct. 5, 1656, to direct its deputies to protest against "this general permission of all sorts of persuasions."—Eccles. Rec., I: 354–55, 357. The deputies reported on Nov. 7 concerning their conference with the directors of the company, as well as with a committee appointed on behalf of the city of Amsterdam; but all they could learn was that the affair was "still unsettled, and the settlement a good way off." Oct.

The classis then advised the deputies to practice vigilance by keeping their eyes and ears open.—Ibid., I: 360.

Meanwhile, in New Amsterdam, the Lutherans had petitioned Stuyvesant and the council (Oct. 24, 1656, q.v.) for permission to enjoy the privileges granted to them, so that they might "not be hindered" in their services. Their excuses, the said, would list of "prayer, reading and singing, until...a qualified person" should "come next spring [1657] from the Fatherland" to be their "minister and teacher." On the same day, Stuyvesant and the council directed that the ordinance prohibiting conventicles should remain in effect, but should not prevent "each in his family, from holding meetings and singing according to their faith," in the meantime further orders from Amsterdam to be sought.—Ibid., I: 356–60.

When the Lutherans were endeavoring to secure a preacher in 1657, the opposition in the classis and in New Netherland became very active. The directors, on April 7, 1657 (q.v.), reassured Stuyvesant and the council that they would stand by their letter of the preceding June 14, and would by no means "grant to the Lutherans any more liberty regarding the exercise of their religion" than therein stated. The interpretation of this letter, understood by the Lutherans as a "right of private services," was that they might have only private family worship.—Ibid., I: 374, 376, 380–81; N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 388.

The Lutherans in old Amsterdam, in the meantime, had taken the bull by the horns and induced Johannes Ernestus Gutwater (or a substitute), a Lutheran minister from New Netherland (see July 1657). Knowledge of this in classis raised a storm of opposition. It also stirred up Megapolensis and Driius, who petitioned the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam, on July 6, against permitting the Lutherans to "obtain a foothold" and then "extend themselves" in other parts of the province, which would be injurious "to the policy of the government, as well as of the Reformed Religion," unless nipped in the bud. Herein, they thought, lay a source of great contention and discord, for already during the past year "some husbands" had "forced their wives to leave their own church, and attend their conventicles." Moreover, there were so "many" persons "of that persuasion" that the Dutch Church would be depleted, its deacons or general poor fund would be diminished, and the poor orphans, widows, and others of all persuasions, would suffer. So also, if Lutherans were permitted to have public worship, "the Papists, Mennonites and others would soon make similar claims," resulting in a "Babel of confusion," and would "prove a plan of Satan to smother this infant, rising congregation, almost in its birth, or at least to obstruct the march of truth in its progress."—Eccles. Rec., I: 377, 380–81, 386–88.

In the burgomasters and schepens, for whose consideration these woful forebodings had been drawn up and presented by the Dutch clergy in person on July 13, informed Stuyvesant and the council a day later that Gutwater had just arrived in the ship "Goosje Meulen" (see July, 1657), had been summoned before them and, when interrogated as to his purposes, had "frankly answered," that he came on behalf of the Lutheran consistory, "to occupy the position of a preacher here, as far as it would be allowed." The city fathers considered this an invasion of their oaths, so they ordered Gutwater not to officiate in public or private, nor to present his credentials to the Lutheran "congregation, as he called it." Stuyvesant and the council answered that they were "pleased with the zeal and desire" of the city council "for supporting the Reformed doctrine and excluding schismatics," and ordered the strict enforcement of the edicts already several times promulgated. On August 13, the city court thanked the two Dutch ministers "for their care in this matter."—Ibid., I: 388. On July 16, Chief-Deputy Calvin informed the classis at Amsterdam (cf. Aug. 14, and Sept. 8, 1657) that the "worst" had "come to pass," that Gutwater had arrived in July, "to the great joy of the Lutherans, but to the special displeasure and uneasiness" of the Dutch congregation; "yes, even the whole country including the English were displeased," but they added that Gutwater be sent out of the country.—Ibid., I: 393–94.

Stuyvesant and his council ordered his deportation by resolution on Sept. 4 (see Sept. 8, 1657). On Oct. 10 (q.v.), the Lutherans of New Amsterdam petitioned to have the order set aside which required Gutwater to "depart in the ship, the 'Wag,'" now ready.
Instead of granting the leniency sought, the order was confirmed.—Ibid., I: 405-9. Subscriptions had been taken up at Fort Orange and New Amsterdam on behalf of Gutwasser by his adherents. The first deportation sent him hiding for the winter.—Ibid., I: 409, 410, 412, 429, 432-33.

In April, 1658, the controversy again raised its head in the classis of Amsterdam as a result of letters sent from New Netherlands inveighing against Lutherans and Quakers.—Ibid., I: 420-21. On April 16, another order of banishment was put out by Stuyvesant and the council.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 109.

The directors at Amsterdam, on May 20, while approving the deportation of Gutwasser as "not contrary to, but rather in accordance with," their "good intentions," thought it might have been carried out with less severity. They had learned from Lutherans in Amsterdam that the separation in New Amsterdam had occurred "because in the Sacrament of Baptism some words were used which were "offensive... and not contained in the new formulary," particularly with respect to admonitions to parents and witnesses, and compulsion of the presence of parents at the baptism of their children. They thought the word "compulsion" might be added, and that "people of other persuasions" might be won over or held if less offensive words "and most tolerant means" were employed.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 418; cf. Eccles. Rec., I: 425-26.

On May 7, reverting to their letter of May 20, the directors instructed Stuyvesant to see that the less offensive formulary was used at baptisms and that compulsory presence was not demanded.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 421. An extract of this correspondence was sent by Stuyvesant to Megapolensis and Drissius in Amsterdam, accompanied by a request for a written answer on the "points presented," and "to adduce" whatever might "tend to furnish a full and correct view of the case."—Eccles. Rec., I: 427; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 2001; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 418. This answer came four days later (see Aug. 24, 1658). They characterized the Lutherans' complaints as an "untruth and a misrepresentation to the directors at Amsterdam." They argued that the Lutherans were raising objections as "blind men," among whom there was "hardly one who had a proper acquaintance with the teachings of Dr. Luther."—Eccles. Rec., I: 428-31.

Gutwasser became ill while in hiding, and his friends besought Stuyvesant to permit him to be brought to town for treatment, which was granted, ad interim, under surveillance of the fiscal, he, when well again, to be deported. The Dutch clergymen looked upon the situation as "a stratagem to hold the matter in suspense, and gain more time."—Ibid., I: 432-33; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 2001; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 420.

The controversy continued to claim the attention of the classis of Amsterdam and of the directors of the company until the spring of 1659, when word was received that Gutwasser had been arrested and sent back to Holland, in the ship "Bruynviersch," so that "now again quietness" reigned among the people of New Amsterdam, and "the threatened split" had been averted.—Eccles. Rec., I: 449-452, 454, 470-71; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 430.

The directors informed Stuyvesant and his council that they adjudged Megapolensis and Drissius to be lacking in moderation and infected with scruples that caused divisions more than edification. If further complaints reached Holland, the result might be a concession to the Lutherans "to conduct a separate divine service" in New Amsterdam, and it would be impossible to prevent it.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 451. The Dutch clergy took the hint, and by moderation with respect to the poignant difficulties ended the suspension [on law of remainder] at the Dutch régime. The Lutherans were granted freedom of worship, without molestation, by the English governor, Richard Nicollis, Dec. 6, 1664 (q.v.);—General Entries, I: 71 (printed in N. Y. State Library Bulletin, History No. 2, 156). For the origin of the first regular Lutheran church in wost, see May 26, 1657. Zwierle, in his Religion New Amsterdam, has an excellent chapter on Lutherans in the Dutch province.

Agréeably to the original bill of sale, dated March 26, 1642, Govert Lockeemans conveys to Egbert van Bornum "a house and lot at Wolphert's valley, now called the ferry."—Liber HH: 495 (see note cited in a former chapter on Cherry St. and The Bowery, at Franklin Square, running far into the block between Cherry St. and The Bowery. The ferry mentioned in the deed was the earliest ferry to Long Island, Van Bornum being at that time (1655) the ferry-man; it ran from the present corner of Pearl and Dover Sts. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 942. The confirmation of the above transaction by Gov. Nicolls to Van Bornum, dated March 12, 1666, is recorded in Liber Patron, IV: 19 (Albany).

Niclaus de Sille, appointed by the West India Co. as first councillor of New Netherlands, arrives at New Amsterdam. For particulars of his reception, see Aug. 23, 1653; and, for his estimate of the country, see May 23 and Sept. 23, 1654.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant and the council that they are sorry to learn of the "irrational and false charges that the people of New England" have brought against them. They write: "Upon hearing the rumors from New England they [the English] have magnified those false reports, apparently started at their own instigation and have forged and published in London the most shameless and lying libel, which the devil in hell could not have produced, under the title "The second Ambrosian Tragedy or truthful Account, etc." [See Bibliography.] We have caused a translation to be made of it and send you a copy of it herewith, not of the original, as they believed, which we can bring to you at a later date. They have allayed, and by way of precaution, carried on a smaller scale than at first; but the company's Fiscal may no longer trouble himself as Schout about Citizens' cases."—Rec. N. Am., I: 727. See April 9, 1666, regarding the separation of the office of schout of New Amsterdam from that of the company's fiscal.

At a provincial assembly in September, various edicts were promulgated in an endeavor to regulate prices by which merchants in New Netherlands should be governed in disposing of their imported goods. A selling price at one hundred percent above invoice was established. Now, however, on account of the new arrival of "Passengers, Merchants and Traders" who have not been "prevailed upon in the matter of the entry of their Goods and Wares," a change is made by an ordinance in council, which fixes an apprais al price on certain enumerated items and directs that, in the case of all non-enumerated articles, the purchaser may demand to see "the true Invoice of the actual first cost," and the seller may receive from the buyer a fixed price of one hundred and twenty per cent. "over the first and actual cost, and no more."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 145-51.

This ordinance was published the next day (29th), when "some of the principal merchants and traders" of New Amsterdam had been called together by the council to have communication thereof made to them. These merchants "deemed it then advisable to deliberate with others and to submit their opinion on this matter in writing" to the council, which they did in a remonstrance on the 22d, in which they declared the ordinance to be virtually confiscatory of all their profits, since no allowance was made for "heavy export and import duties" paid, respectively, in Holland and New Netherlands, for "charges for convey and direction, the heavy freight bills and premiums for assurance, interest on capital invested," and "damages of leakage and decay"—all of which "made the first cost of goods... more than 70 or 80 p. c. higher than abroad." They declared they had no intention of exacting unfair prices from the people, but would treat them "like honest traders and good fellow-citizens;" yet, they requested a suspension of the ordinance to allow the importers and others without great loss to themselves or their principals, and asked to be allowed "to sell according to the usages of the Fatherland and other countries," where commerce had a free hand and prices were governed by circumstances and "the first cost and expenses." They had resolved, in case of refusal, they would keep their goods in storage, if they could not sell at a loss without more than suffer loss or sell at a small profit.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 211-22.

On the 25th, Stuyvesant and the council replied, and demanded a bill of particulars, showing injury, losses, and leakages.—Ibid., XIV: 223. A committee of the merchants answered this demand, on the 28th, by another remonstrance, in which they pleaded against fixed rates for losses, derived in a few specific cases, as...

1653: Tending to injustice and great confusion.—Ibid., XIV: 225-26.

Nov. 19: For nearly a mouth this remonstrance was unanswered, but on Dec. 24 Stuyvesant and the council said the ordinance could not be suspended, as it was ordered to be in effect, and ought not to be countermanded or annulled, unless by direction of the deputies of the province, by whom they had been issued in September. However, the fiscal of the company was ordered "to use all possible moderation" until the directors at Amsterdam had considered the matter. A similar resolution had been given by them to this ordinance, or until altered by the deputies in provincial assembly. —Ibid., XIV: 242.

On March 12, 1654, the directors, in a letter to Stuyvesant and the council, expressed their surprise and displeasure on account of the publication of resolutions without their knowledge. They said the order for fixing prices was "impracticable," "highly injurious to the State," "a sure means to banish all trade and at the same time deprive the Company to a large extent of their revenues" in Holland and New Netherland, and would "prevent an increase of population and cultivation" in the province. —Ibid., XIV: 251. See Sept. 11, 1653.

Complaints having been made to Stuyvesant and the council concerning the incursions and robberies of a certain Thomas Baxter, a fugitive from this province, and his companions, they resolved: "to send letters to and summon from each of the nearest subjects of the colony and immediate dependencies, to meet at the city hall in this City and to whom we think advisable to join two respected members of our High Council, to wit . . . Johan la Montagne and . . . Cornelis van Werckhoven, authorized . . . to deliberate with the other delegates for . . . Security of the colony and the same effective means to prevent and stop these incursions, of which deliberations they will give us a report with all speed." —N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 218-19.

On the following day, the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam chose by vote from their board Marten Cregier and Paulus Leendertzen Vander Grift, to act with the other delegates.—Rec. N. Am., I: 171. The delegates met in general assembly on the 26th. The English delegates, however, sent in a written protest against the provincial government, and asked the burgomasters and schepen "to enter into a firm alliance with them;" but, on the 27th, the delegates of the city said they were willing to be at peace with their English neighbours on Long Island, yet could not enter into the proposed alliance without the general consent of the director-general, the council, and the adjacent districts and villages. To this the English delegates replied that, if the city would not join them, "they would form a union on Long Island among each other." The city's delegates suggested that "it would be better to write about it" to the directors at Amsterdam, and, meanwhile, "they would keep them well-informed of and assist them against, robbers and other disasters of that kind to the best of their abilities and live with them as their friends." After they had agreed "to come together again from the respective places on Dec. 28" in order to write to Holland, the meeting adjourned. —N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 223-25.

On Nov. 29, Cregier and Vander Grift reported verbally and in writing to the burgomasters and schepens what had been done in general assembly; whereupon, the city board by resolution petitioned Stuyvesant and the council that the assembly, proposed for Dec. 10, be granted as a necessity, and in order to "remonstrate" to the directors at Amsterdam in such manner as was pertinent "for the general peace and welfare of the Country." —Rec. N. Am., I: 171-72. N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 226-27. Stuyvesant and the council replied, on Dec. 3, that the objections and conduct of the English delegates bordered on revolt against the government; viliified the supreme authority, and contained calamities. They disapproved the principle "that subjects, bound to the authority of the Government by their oath and duty to allegiance and obedience, should never enter into a defensive and offensive alliance without the knowledge or order of their Government and their Council . . . and above all pass any resolutions without their knowledge," which, as was clearly evident, they had done.

This answer to the burgomasters and schepens, on Dec. 5, to vote unanimously to "go in a body" to Stuyvesant, "and with all respect" request him to allow the meeting of the proposed general assembly on Dec. 10.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 227-29. Rec. N. Am., I: 137-36. They were rewarded for their importunity, for Stuyvesant and the council assented to a properly constituted assembly of delegates, in view of "the country's present dangerous situation," to "draw up a remonstrance" to the Directors at Amsterdam, "for the consideration of the country's needs and circumstances."

On the 8th, the burgomasters and schepens addressed separate letters to the inhabitants of Breuckelen, Amersfoort, and Midwout, in which they said that, "with the knowledge of the Director General," they had refused to sign the resolutions of the 4th of each of the towns, "to decide by a general vote on a letter" to Holland "on the condition of the country." These delegates were to appear, "with full powers from their constituents," on the 9th at "the City Hall" in New Amsterdam. —Rec. N. Am., I: 140; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 230.

A general assembly or landdag meets at the city hall of New Amsterdam. It consisted of ten Dutchmen and nine Englishmen, representing New Amsterdam, Breuckelen, Vliissingen (Flushing), Middelburgh (Newtown), Heemstede, Amersfoort (Flatlands), Midwout (Flatbush), and Gravesend. As a popular assembly it was transcended any that had ever met in New Netherlands. On the 12th, the delegates signed a "Humble Remonstrance and Petition of the Colonies and Villages," which, having been drawn up in English by George Baxter, of Gravesend, was translated into Dutch and presented to Stuyvesant and the council, who protested and declared illegal and illegal to meet at the City hall in this City and to whom we think advisable to join two respected members of our High Council, to wit . . . Johan la Montagne and . . . Cornelis van Werckhoven, authorized . . . to deliberate with the other delegates for . . . Security of the colony and the same effective means to prevent and stop these incursions, of which deliberations they will give us a report with all speed."

On Dec. 10, the delegates again asked for a remonstrance and means to prevent "their" grievances, among them that "Officers and Magistrates" were "appointed, contrary to the laws of Netherland, to divers offices without the consent or nomination of the people whom the matter most affects or concerns," meaning, as they said, that the nomination ought "to belong to the people," instead of the selection being vested in the director-general and council, and that a common council (Vroetschap) ought to be organized for the city of New Amsterdam, "to represent the body of the Commonality." —N. Y. Col. Docs., I: 552-555. On this particular part of the remonstrance Stuyvesant and his council made the following deduction, viz.: the magistrates of New Amsterdam, who were not yet to office a full year, had "for the present not the right of nomination, the same having been withheld by the Director-General and Council for good and sufficient reasons, until the Lords-Directors at Amsterdam, "longer time ago," in a letter entitled "Remonstrance," the delegates complained against the "arbitrary government" and cited many grievances, among them that "Officers and Magistrates" were "appointed, contrary to the laws of Netherland, to divers offices without the consent or nomination of the people whom the matter most affects or concerns," meaning, as they said, that the nomination ought "to belong to the people," instead of the selection being vested in the director-general and council, and that a common council (Vroetschap) ought to be organized for the city of New Amsterdam, "to represent the body of the Commonality." —Ibid., XIV: 237.

In their "Remonstrance," the delegates complained against the "arbitrary government" and cited many grievances, among them that "Officers and Magistrates" were "appointed, contrary to the laws of Netherland, to divers offices without the consent or nomination of the people whom the matter most affects or concerns," meaning, as they said, that the nomination ought "to belong to the people," instead of the selection being vested in the director-general and council, and that a common council (Vroetschap) ought to be organized for the city of New Amsterdam, "to represent the body of the Commonality." —Ibid., XIV: 235. See also Dec. 24. Stuyvesant and the council appoint Johannes de la Montagne, one of their number, as head of an expedition "to pursue, attack and capture" certain English pirates, led by Thomas Baxter, who are supposed to be hoovering about Flushing, L.I., and its vicinity, and who have committed depredations in New Netherland. —N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 237. It was this Baxter who, earlier in the year (March 20), had contracted to furnish the palisades for building the fort of New Netherland.—Rec. N. Am., I: 77-78. His capture and subsequent fate are recounted by Brodhead. sp. cit., I: 765.

The burgomasters and schepens sign a note to court for 835 florins, in favour of Cornelius Steenwyck, payable a year from date, for materials delivered to the city. —Rec. N. Am., I: 143. As a memorial to the directors and council of New Amsterdam, the burgomasters and schepens complained that their authority, derived from the original instructions of Stuyvesant, of Feb. 2, is too limited for the proper government of the burgomasters. They ask that they may be permitted to adopt a form of city government, "as far as possible," similar to that of Amsterdam, and be empowered to fill the office.

of schout of the city, separating this office entirely from that of Dec. the company's fiscal, so as to make the office of schout an independ- 24 ent office, and the appointee a member of the city court. They apply also for a change in the excise revenues; for the right to levy some new imports, and to have the farming out of the ferry to Brooklyn for authority. "To verify the erection of docks and conveyances of houses and lots within this City, the fee simple of which is sold, as well as mortgages according to the custom of the City of Amsterdam," and that, for this purpose, they may be allowed "a City seal different from the seal of the province." On account of the constant dread of invasion "by the hostile English," they request a supply of firearms, and they petition for the house (Stadt Huys or city hall, formerly the city tavern) belonging to the West India Co., in which they hold their meetings.—Rec. N. Am., I: 144-46.

The directors at Amsterdam answered this memorial, on May 18, 1654 (p. v.), and reprimanded the burgomasters and schepens for having organized a popular assembly and for sending over remon- strances to Holland. They warned them "in no wise to hold private coeveticles with the English or others," whether for "deliberation over matters of State," which they declared was none of their business, or, were they considered worse, "to attempt an alteration in the State and Government thereof." So far as the reply to the memorial was concerned, the directors granted the city the separation of the office of schout from that of the company's fiscal, but provided that the schout should be appointed by the director-general and council, instead of by the city court; they denied them exemption from payment of the salaries of civil and ecclesiastical servants, and suggested the levying of some "new small excise and import," with the commonality's consent and confirmation by Stuyvesant; they ceased to them the execution of transports and deeds of conveyance of houses and lots, but not only within the city itself, and without depriving the director-general and council "of the power heretofore conferred on them to dispose of the lots already granted" and which remained vacant. By these concessions the board was required to furnish to Stuyves- ant and the council, when demanded, a "return of the transports, deeds and incumbrances executed before them." An order was given in Holland "for making a City Seal." The distribution of munitions of war was denied the board and reserved to the director-general and council; but the city tavern was granted to the city as a city hall, on condition that no one should claim "any right to it individually, or to alienate or mortgage it collectively."—Ibid., 217-19; also "Directors to Stuyvesant," in N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 260, fl. These despatches from Holland were sent over by the ship "Gorée Beer," and were communicated to the board at a special meeting, on July 21, 1654 (p. v.). At the same time, Stuy- vesant informed the council and the burgomasters that the Schout was as schout, but he, being "agreed by the instructions given him," declined.—Rec. N. Am., I: 216-17; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 280. This caused a delay in the filling of this post "until another experienced person" could be found; hence, on Aug. 31 of that year, the board reappointed Stuyvesant and the council to appoint a schout "in conformity with the order of the Lords Patroons" in Holland.—Rec. N. Am., I: 253.

— Recognitions of six ships, sent over with goods to New Nether- land in this year by the West India Co., Amsterdam chamber, netted fees of 32,662: 7 florins.—N. Neth. Papers, No. 1221 (s.), in N. Y. Pub. Library.

— In this year, we are told by Valentine, the country seat of Jacobus Kip was built on his bouwery in the neighbourhood of Second Ave. and 35th St. (see Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 950). Stone's "History," Vol. IV, App. 12th ed. (1857), contains note by Bishop Kip in which he states (p. 89) that it was built "in 1655, of bricks brought from Holland. . . ." No definite authority is quoted by either of these writers. The only positive information that we have is that the house was erected before 1668, as it is shown on the Nichols Map (Pl. 168). It was demolished in 1843.—Land- mark Map Ref. Key, III: 950, and Stone, "History," Vol. IV, App. 12th ed. (1857).

Jacob Kip, secretary to the city, is confirmed as "Receiver and Bookkeeper of the Revenues" of the city by the burgomasters and schepens, his salary to commence on Nov. 25, 1653.—Rec. N. Am., I: 150. He was the first person to hold the new position. Tennis Kraeye or Cray, "an old burgher," requests of the burgom- masters and schepens a commission for the office of city crier, "as he has long filled the office."—Rec. N. Am., I: 151.

Clas van Eldaunt, Jr., requests a salary as court messenger of the city, and a proper commission for the office, as well as "a liberal allowance for his services rendered for about a year."—Rec. N. Am., I: 152.

Simon Joosten, having asked of the burgomasters and schepens permission "to keep a Tavern over at the [Brooklyn] Ferry (to place of Cornelis Dircsen Hoochant) for the convenience of Travelers," is granted his request for one year, upon conditions for payment of the excise as prescribed by the board.—Rec. N. Am., I: 152. See 1658, for earliest recorded mention of the ferry. See also June 2, 1654.

The first annual term of the first board of burgomasters and schepens being about to expire, the board resolves to call, in a body, on Stuyvesant, to make inquiry whether he desires them to nominate a double number of candidates for a new board, also how many of the old board should retire and how many should remain in office. The following day they presented the matter by formal petition, to which Stuyvesant and the council replied, on the 15th, that no changes should be made, except the filling of two vacancies in the board, as now constituted. The others were desired to continue in office "for the sake of peace and harmony." Salaries were also granted them—to burgomasters 350 florins, and to schepens 150 florins per annum, out of the city revenues.—Rec. N. Am., I: 156-57.

Specified duties are proclaimed on imported Indian goods. 28 brandy, wines, beer, and salt, which are to be paid hereafter, "as the staple right," at New Amsterdam, in lieu of the standard one per cent, duty imposed, but "not hitherto collected," from merchants "from their cargoes and Merchandizes." The export duties are unchanged.—Laws & Ord. of N. Neth., 153-55. As certain mer- chants of the city had petitioned for exemption from the payment of the new duties, a concession was made by way of a reduction of tariff on most of the articles enumerated, and salt, on account of its scarcity, was put upon the free list, on July 22.—Ibid., 171-73.

Stuyvesant and the council summon the burgomasters and schepens to a joint meeting at the fort, at which they debate "in what manner the piracy of certain English pirates should be stopped." The board recommended as the "best means" "to station a vessel with 20 to 30 men for a certain time at and about Minnewit [Munising] Island in order thus to be able to keep a watch on everything." The next day, Stuyvesant, at the city hall, signed the council's consent to the plan. The council also re- posed the apportionment of a tax levy for the support of forty men, amounting to 1,000 florins per month, which was referred to the council for advice and approval. No action had been taken by the 19th, when the board urged a speedy decision. This brought a favourable response, on the 23rd, from Stuyvesant and the council, who agreed to the levy among the towns.—Rec. N. Am., I: 158-59, 165-66, 168-69; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 248-49.

At the instance of President Arent van Hattem, an order is passed that Jacob Steedam, the poet of New Netherlands, deliver to the court messenger twelve cushions, made for the burgomasters and schepens, and the messenger brings them into court (at the city hall).—Rec. N. Am., I: 168.

In a petition to Stuyvesant and the council, the burgomasters and schepens ask for "a grant of authority provisionally to impose" certain duties on imported and exported goods, on ship tonnage, and on beer and wine, etc., and to be permitted "to appoint two sworn Beer Carriers." They plead that this grant is necessary to pay the debts incurred for the construction of public works. The council, on the 23rd, consented to the burghe excise, but denied them the duty on imported goods or exported merchandise, etc., as being not applicable to any one particular city or place, but reserved for the province in general.—Rec. N. Am., I: 166, 169.

The directors of the West India Co. at Amsterdam resolve not to permit any Lutheran pastors to New Netherland, nor any other public worship except that of the Reformed Church.—Rec. Rec., I: 522; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 255. See full record under Oct. 4, 1653.
The two burgomasters and a majority of the schepens appear before Stuyvesant and lodge a grievance with him, because he and the council, without their knowledge, have "interdicted and forbidden certain farmers' servants to ride the goose on the feast of Bacchus at Shrove-tide." This interdict was served by the court messenger, Chas. van Elblandt, Sr., "on the farmers' servants during the last week," who, notwithstanding such service, nevertheless, in contempt of the supreme authority, violated the same."—

Rec. N. Am., I: 172. The sport of pulling, pulling, or "riding" the goose consisted of smearing the neck and head of a goose with oil and soap and fastening it by a rope between two poles. The contestants, seated in a wheelbarrow, race at full stop and attention must seize the price. He who bore off the goose was declared to be king of the festival.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 332.

On this day (Feb. 25) also, when the burgomasters and schepens protested against the decree, certain interrogatories were addressed to Harmen Smeeman by Stuyvesant and the council, during his examination by this supreme court on a charge of having, with others, violated the interdict. Several of these persons, including Smeeman, the ringleader of the party, were fined; two or three others, for behaving in an insolent manner, such as laughing at the court and threatening Stuyvesant were committed to prison. The burgomasters and schepens felt aggrieved, because they were upon the decree and sentences as an invasion of their judicial authority; but Stuyvesant and the council declared that the board was only an inferior court of justice and could "in no wise infringe on or diminish the power and authority of the Director General and Council and the City Ordinances on all the parts in other ways, especially those which tend to the glory of God . . . prevent more sins, scandals, debaucheries and crimes, and properly correct, fine and punish obstinate transgressors." At the request of the city court, the imprisoned persons were released by an order in council, on the 24th—Rec. N. Am., I: 172-77; another translation in N. Y. Col. Doct., XIV: 249-50. Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 135.

A year later, on Feb. 8, 1655, Fiscal Van Tienhoven told the burgomasters and schepens "that he had been informed that the country people intended riding the goose this last year," and asked if the court intended to do anything to suppress it, as it was interdicted by the resolution of the council. Thereupon, the city court decided that the fiscal, ex-officio, should "declare the same to be illegal."—Rec. N. Am., I: 246. Nothing is recorded again about this festivity until Feb. 26, 1656, when Stuyvesant and the council refused permission to the farmers and their men, in the vicinity of New Amsterdam, to indulge therein.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 191.

Cromwell, the "Protector," writes to the governors of the New England colonies: "We are assured you have been long since afforded a hostile attempt of dubious proceedings in reference to this Nation; whereby the long continued animity betwixt us and them hath not only been disturbed, but an open and fierce war raised and prosecuted, to the shedding of much blood. . . . It hath often been presented to the state here, that all (or at least some) of your colonies have met with unneighbourly and unchristian dealing from that people; in which respect, as also in compliance to your native country (according to the declaration of the late council of state, dated the 19th of July, 1642), which we doubt not was sent you) it was expected you would have improved the present opportunity to ease yourselves of that burthen, and vindicate the English rights in those parts." He continues: "We have added to the number and strength of ships design'd for those parts upon another service, and in them sent such proportion of ammunition, powder &c. as may be helpful to your stores in that kind, for furnishing a competent number of land soldiers; as also given commission to [Maj. Robert Sedgwick and Capt. John Leveret], that if there be a concurrence in your colonies to the work . . . their utmost assistance may be given for gaining the Manhattoes or other places under the power of the Dutch. We have refer'd to such, as are to be trusted by us, to consider with you, and shall commit the managing of that affair; and to determine what number of men may rationally be sufficient to carry on the design; that being fittest to be concluded upon the place, where the numbers and strength of the enemy, with his condition in other respects, may be best understood."—Tories, State Papers, I: 742. All these time instructions are given to the commanders of the expedition.—Ibid., I: 741. Among other things, the instructions say: "If the Lord give his blessing to your undertaking, that the forts and places be gained, you shall not use cruelty to the inhabitants, but encourage those that are willing to remain under the English government, and give liberty to others to transport themselves for Europe." On the 5th of this month, the design against the Dutch, and the diversion of the expeditionary forces sent for the dishonour of the French from the coast of Maine, see Brodhead's Hist. State of N. Y., I: 328-86.

Nicholas Tenhaer, a man of Stuyvesant and the council, is forbidden by Stuyvesant, Feb. 25, 1656, to sell liquor any more.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 176. On June 8, he was prosecuted by the schout in the court of burgomasters and schepens for tapping to the Indians on Sundays during sermon, as well as at other times; for making a great uproar, striking a hurter, and threatening another with a knife. He denied the charges and said his wife had exchanged only a mug of beer with Indians for fish, together with half a gill of brandy, in which she had put water. The city court condemned him "for this time forth not to tap or to retail any wine or beer," and to be "absolutely excluded from said business," as well as fined.—Rec. N. Am., I: 228, 229, Sept. 5, he petitioned unsuccessfully for a restoration of his tavern.—Ibid., I: 228, 231, 240. He renewed his petition to the court on Oct. 5, which granted him, provisionally, on the 12th, permission to tap, "he meanwhile paying attention to his behavior, on condition that he, first and foremost, pay the proper excise on whatever he shall sell."—Ibid., I: 250, 252.

Laxness in the business relations between the government of New Netherland and its superiors, the directors of the West India Co., chamber of Amsterdam, is brought out forcibly in a letter of the latter to Stuyvesant and the council, which states that they are "frequently embarrassed by not having the general and special account books," "no books of account" having been "sent over for several years," and they command that "the missing books and accounts" be sent to Amsterdam "speedily by the first ship," and a regular "detailed statement of the expenses and revenues" every quarter thereafter.—Ibid., I: 263. Singularity enough, no treasurer's or receiver's account books of the Dutch period are now known to be extant, either in Holland or America.

The burgomasters and schepens declare that they witness "with sorrow the dilapidated state of the works erected last year [see March 15, 1651], consisting of wall of earth, and palisades along the river, which were commenced not only with great trouble, labor, loss of time and cost of the commonality, but as far as exigency of the time and case required and demanded, were finished with the aid of the good Commonality in the completest manner." They appeal, therefore, and that the Burgomasters, Councilmen, neighbors and Courts of Broeckelen, Midwout and Amersfoort," to aid "the prosperity and preservation of the public interests" by lending "a helping hand in the construction and repairing of the palisades required along the river." They add: "It is our request, then, that your Honors may please each in his jurisdiction to procure and order, that every farmer or body shall cut and deliver at the Ferry twenty five round palisades as straight as possible, twelve feet in length and at the least 18 @ 20 inches in thickness." They say the welfare and "preservation of the Country in general" will be served thereby.—Rec. N. Am., I: 177-78. The magistrates of these three villages replied, on the 28th, that, "as members of the same body," they would do all in their power for the common defense, and invoked like cooperation for their own localities.—Ibid., I: 181-82. On the 30th, the burgomasters and schepens resolved to send a deputy to Stuyvesant and the council, to ask whether they concurred "that the decayed fortifications of the city 'should be again repaired and the North River shut off also with palisades and thus brought into a state of defense'; also if they would "take measures, so that the people out of the City" might "lead a helping hand therein," and give the city their utmost assistance therein, in the carrying on of the works." The deputy reported, on April 13, that he had interviewed Stuyvesant, who found the proposal "entirely agreeable," and expressed his purpose of aiding the plan by going "in person around," and speaking "to the outside people on this subject." But "nothing of this had been done,"—Ibid., I: 185-86. Here the matter rested until resumed in the following June. See June 8, 1654.
Stuyvesant visits Fort Orange (Albany) on May 10 (p. 4), Stuyvesant and the council passed an ordinance for regulating the business of the weigh-house, in which they referred to "the Compliments of some evill-minded persons," who had charged "they were taken out of bounds," said to be "Runaways and Transports from New England," are guilty of "frequenting Long Island and the Mainland" between the Dutch and New England, spying out even the city of New Amsterdam, "under the color and guise of Travellers." They have committed depredations "at the Flatland," and, it is alleged, have received in their nefarious acts protection and covert from some of the inhabitants in the English towns of the Dutch province. These practices induce Stuyvesant and the council to issue an ordinance, which enjoins everybody from communicating with, aiding, or abetting the freebooters in any manner. Prompt publication of the presence of pirates is to be made to the nearest magistrate, and whoever fails to do so is to suffer confiscation of property and banishment. The magistrates of the different villages are required to establish and maintain a watch for apprehending the outlaws. Inhabitants are "not to lodge any unknown Strangers at their houses without giving their names to the proper officers of the place. Guns are not allowed to be discharged between sunset and sunrise, except when a raid is manifest, and then three discharges are to be made in quick succession, as a signal to the nearest watch, and so in succession by watches, to call together "each under his competent Officer, at the appointed place of Rendezvous." This ordinance was published and posted throughout the province of New Netherland.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 155-58. On the 29th, this was published and affixed at the city hall "after ringing of the bell."—Rec. N. Am., I: 188-89.

Complaints are made to the directors at Amsterdam that there is no proper regard, or at least observance, regarding weights and measures at New Amsterdam. They wrote, therefore, to Stuyvesant and the council, on May 18, declaring that they had directed that some Amsterdam standards of weights, yard, and other measures be sent over to New Amsterdam, "to be kept there in the City Hall" (vast huis).—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 265. However, even before this letter had been written in Holland, Stuyvesant himself had ordered the erection of the scales, in the spring of this year, and the weigh-house was in existence before May 4—May Rec. N. Am., I: 195, 246.

On Aug. 16 (p. s), Stuyvesant and the council passed an ordinance for regulating the business of the weigh-house, in which they referred to "the Compliments of some evill-minded persons," who had charged "they were taken out of bounds," said to be "Runaways and Transports from New England," are guilty of "frequenting Long Island and the Mainland" between the Dutch and New England, spying out even the city of New Amsterdam, "under the color and guise of Travellers." In a letter of this date, the directors at Amsterdam inform Stuyvesant and the council that they have made a resolution and promoting the cultivation of the soil in New Netherland, they are sending over in the ships "Pereboom" and "Gelderse Bloem" some boys and girls from the orphan asylum of Amsterdam, "making first a trial with 50 persons."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 264. On July 8, they characterized the sending over of these orphans as "an experiment," and it, therefore, "seriously" recommended that good care be taken of them, and that they be placed "with good mas-

1852, this first party of orphans arrived in the autumn, in charge of a matron (Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 147), and, on Sept. 5, Stuyvesant and the burgomasters of the city, Mr. [Isaac] Allert, lodged there the children sent over by the Poormasters."—Ibid., XIV: 296. The "written conditions" or "rules" made for their care in New Netherland met with the approval of the directors, who, on May 26, 1653, wrote they were about to send another party of boys and girls in the ship "de Waage," a man-of-war. This ship arrived at New Amsterdam on Aug. 15—ibid., XIV: 322. Seventeen orphans, boys and girls, ranging in ages from 12 to 23 years, came in this ship. The burgomasters of old Amsterdam recommended them to Stuyvesant's care, and besought him "to receive these children and youths kindly."—Ibid., XIV: 325-36. Another party of "six children from the Almshouse" was sent over in 1653, in the ship "Trouw," to be "apprenticed to farmers."—Ibid., XIV: 434.

This plan of sending over orphans had been considered by the directors at Amsterdam as early as the year 1650, when it was proposed to transport "500 to 400 boys and girls," but it then came to naught, "being found to offer too many inconveniences."—Ibid., XIV: 136. It was taken up anew in 1652, when all arrangements were made to send over 150 orphans, at the charge of the city of Amsterdam; yet, when they thought they "were quite sure of it, it happened that the ship of the English Parliament, commissioned with letters of reprisal" against the Dutch, captured about 60 Dutch merchantmen, among them one from New Netherland, and put a stay upon the proposed plan.—Ibid., XIV: 166-67. These orphans were to be bound to their masters as apprentices "for four years, during which time they were to receive clothing and board or if they chose 11. 60 [84] annually for clothing themselves." If a girl married, with the consent of the director-general, before the expiration of her time, she was to be granted her freedom. Those who served their full time could remain with their masters upon such conditions of Mr. Isaac Allert, whilst those who wished to remain free of service were to be granted twenty-five morgens (50 acres) of land each, or as much thereof as they were willing to cultivate.—Ibid., XIV: 166-67, 175-76.

By the same letter the directors in Holland accede to the request of the burgomasters and schepens that the office of schout be hereafter separated from that of the company's fiscal, but that the appointment of the new officer shall be made by the director-general and council.—Re N. Am., II: 218; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 262. The change did not, however, become operative at this time. See May 26, 1652.

They propose, further, the appointment of Jochem Pietersen Kuyter as the first incumbent of the separate office of schout of New Amsterdam.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 262. Stuyvesant and the council did not heed this request, no doubt because Kuyter had shown himself as one of the new schepens of that body.—Ibid., XIV: 244. When the directors wrote, on Nov. 23, they were already aware of the recent murder of Kuyter; yet, in that letter, they said they demanded a reason from Stuyvesant and the council why Kuyter "was not appointed as proposed," a respect they considered due to them, instead of the appointment of someone unknown to the directors. This was a reference to the choice of Jacques Cortelyou, who, as they seemed not to have known, had refused to serve.—Ibid., XIV: 280, 302. See July 21, 1654.

In compliance with a petition made by the burgomasters and schepens on Dec. 29, 1651, the directors now empower them to execute transports and deeds of conveyance for houses and lots within the limits of the city of New Amsterdam, but with certain reservations. For this purpose, they also agree to have made in Holland a city seal, differing from the provincial seal of New Netherland, which they promise to send over when finished.—Ibid., XIV: 249, 251. N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 246. Impressions of this seal are very rare. There are several in the New York Hist. Soc., were formerly offered to be conveyed to a convent in the south side of the Markvelt Stegh, east of the Markvelt (present Whitehall St.), to Jan Evertsen Bont. See Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82, Vol. II, and II: 255 (No. 21); Frontispiece, Vol. V; Wilde, Civic Ancestry; Fine, Seal & Flag of the City of N. Y. See also Dec. 24, 1653.

Finally, the directors state: "... we have granted and assured, that the house [atad bauy] in which the Burgomasters and Schepens meet, shall be given to the city to be appropriated to its use. ..."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 262-65.

The directors at Amsterdam say, in a letter to the burgomasters and schepens, that they cannot understand why they should allow themselves "to be stirred up by the disaffected so far as not only to assist in organizing an independent Assembly without authority but moreover to send in remonstrances," which the directors consider, "in the present circumstances, to be very inexpedient," however advantageous they may otherwise be. —Rec. N. Am., I: 217; there is another translation, in N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 266. To this the burgomasters and schepens replied, on July 27, that they were not guilty of fomenting disaffection, and they knew of none; that they had not meditated "holding private conventicles with the English, or others," or deliberated "on matters of State, or, what is still worse," attempted "to make a change in the State and in the Government thereof." They said their only object was to present to the directors in Holland an account of the state of the country, because they believed "necessity most imperatively demanded it."—Rec. N. Am., II: 211, 222.

In a patent to Carel van Brugge, the Sheep Pasture is mentioned (Liber HH-21: 6, Albany), but not for the first time, as stated in Landmark Map Rep. Key, III: 967. An earlier mention occurred in a patent of July 1, 1672 (q.v.).

Nicasius de Sille writes from New Amsterdam to Maximilian van Breckel of The Hague, and describes New Netherland, thus: "This country suits me exceedingly well. I shall not try to leave it as long as I live. We are longing very much for tidings from Europe, as to how it may go with the English [in the war with the Dutch]. We have here such neighbors also, but they do not attack us as yet. We receive no news from Patriot, which at times causes us to hedge a sigh. We are waiting for good news [in the papers].

This country does a large trade in furs, especially beavers, which are sold to us by the savages by the thousand for Dutch merchandise. All the people here are traders. Big cattle and oen and horses are still scarce. They are not slaughtered much, for the main object is to get the increase. It goes here after the manner of the Old Testament; wealth consists in oxen and horses to plow with, and income, sheep and goats. The country can supply us with grain; children and pigs multiply here rapidly and more than anything else, but there is a lack of women; we need people to cultivate the soil and to increase the population. There is plenty of land and forest, and the soil is good. He who comes from Patriot with farm laborers can in one year cultivate enough land to support himself on what he gains. Horses and oxen they must buy here. The rivers are full of fish, good edible fish, which is very cheap, three large sea crabs for a stiver; also fruit. The Indians offer these for sale. Likewise venison, which I bought this year at 18 ducats per hundred. The price for mutton, Oysters we pick up here before our fort; among them there are some so large that one must cut them in two or three pieces. The weeds consist mostly of strawberries, cranberry and blackberries. There is a good increase of poultry. The Indians bring us wild geese, turkeys, partridges, wild pigeons, ducks, and various kinds of other birds and animals; in fine, choose any here and forget Patriot. Beer is brewed here as good as in Holland, of barley and wheat. Wheaten bread is more common here than rice or buckwheat. Oats, peas and corn are fair. In the way of fish we have perch, sturgeon, bass, herring, mackerel, weakfish, stone bream, eel, eleven, twelve and thirteen, and various other kinds of which I do not yet know the names. My children already begin to speak the language of the savages and can trade with them. No gold or silver circulates here, but beads, blanket, clothes, muskets and all other things of value, which are worth one stiver, and three black beads one stiver. We can buy everything with it and gladly take it in payment. In short, once more, it is good here, but last winter the Spaniards left us and the Frenchman ran away, but the Duke of Brandenburg stands by us faithfully [fan allusion to kinds of wine]. We must keep company with a little smoke. We are looking again for aid from the friends [i.e., winos] who deserted us, for their absence makes us melancholy; they all drink here, from the moment they are able to lick a spoon. The women of the neighborhood entertain each other with a pipe and a brass; wine is very old, and old, they all smoke. Tobacco costs here but a shilling a pound of the best quality. Very good tobacco is grown here, and the trade in Virginia tobacco is very large, so that for a very fancy people here give away the tobacco by the pound for nothing. I intend one of these days to start a large tobacco plantation myself." In a postscript of July 17th, he states that "Owing to the bad weather, the ship was held up. We had to keep it both on account of the ammunition and the crew, but we frightened them so that as yet they have not made war against us. We have bravely fortified ourselves for defense. Furthermore, I know nothing more to write than that there are no sparrowhawks here as thick as the sparrows in Holland this time of the year and eat strawberries and cherries. They are shot here by the thousand in our squares, streets and gardens. They taste like partridge. We wish only for peace." In another postscript, on July 17th, he writes: "A ship just arrived here from Amsterdam with tidings of peace, to the joy of us all."—Quarterly Journal of N. Y. State Hist. Ass'n, i: 101–3, from De Sille's letter, here first printed by A. J. F. van Laer. See also Aug. 23, 1653, and Sept. 23, 1654.

Stuyvesant submits proposals to the council, saying: "For a few of our men or women have been current, which were confirmed last evening in detail by Mr. Isaac Allerton, that 30 or 12 days ago six ships arrived at Boston from Old England, namely, two merchant and four of war of the Parliament or the present Government of England, having on board Colonel Sussens, Captain Leverett and a number of soldiers. Each vessel, as well as ammunition and engineers' implements. Mr. Allerton declared not to know, whether they were intended to be used against us or against the French, for the instructions had not yet been opened and were not to be opened until ten days after their arrival at Boston. According to our calculations this must have been done yesterday or the day before, but we cannot and shall not know their tenor and correct meaning, until the blow is struck and then it will be too late. The continuation of Captain Leverett the losses suffered at the hands of and the deeds committed by Captain Hull last year and the repeatedly received information, that they had both gone to Old England last fall with the view of soliciting and obtaining ample authority to proceed against this Province and its inhabitants, prognosticate no good, but warn us to be on our guard and while trusting in God to consider all possible means of defense." Stuyvesant called the meeting, among other things, to consider how to provide for maintaining "the Nation's honor and the most effective protection of this place and its inhabitants."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 167–68. The council's resolutions, of June 24, are in ibid., XIV: 269–71.

The Earl of Sligo, who arrived from the Dutch on Trinity Sunday, and named it "Treafallaghurst," also from Fort Trinity, placing Swen Schuten in command.—Broodhead, opr. cit., i: 577, 592–94. Stuyvesant found opportunity to retaliate on Sept. 22 (p. 67). An agreement (only a fragment of which survives) is signed by Egbert van Borsam and the provincial secretary, in regard to the ferry from New Amsterdam to Breuckelen, which reads: "And in order that the Ferryman may the better pursue his business, it is granted him on the part of the Honorable Company, that he shall have the use for a time of the Ferryhouse standing on Long Island, providing he keeps it in necessary repair at his own expense; the committee on the part of the Honorable Director General and Council promising to give the Ferryman all proper support in regard to his business."—Records N. Y. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 113 (N. Y. State Library); N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 269. See July 1, 1654. On Aug. 30, Van Cortlandt said a messenger had arrived from the ferry on that side of the river.—Cal. Hist. MSS, Dutch, 531. On April 26, 1655 (p. 47), he made a contract with three carpenters for the construction of a new ferry-house, which was to be 18 by 18 feet in dimensions.
At a meeting of Stuyvesant and the council, it is adjudged that the people of the English villages in New Netherland are inclined rather to assist than for the government, and for that reason it is resolved unanimously "to pass them in silence and not to call upon them either for the repairs or for the defense" (of New Amsterdam), so as not to "drag the Trojan horse" within the city's walls.—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 270.

Albert Livingston is ordered by Stuyvesant and the council not to infringe the rights of Egbright van Bornum, who has rented the ferry, by passing people over the East River—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 138. See 1658; Jan. 20 and June 1, 1654.

Among other things, Stuyvesant writes the burgomasters and scheepens that he has not been able "to discover up to this time" that they have "undertaken anything towards the defense" of the city or "the repairing of its works;" that it appears to them to be "lulled to sleep by an idle rumor of peace." He upbraids them for their unfurnished prospects, and warns them of his apprehension in case of an invasion, "that, for want of repairs and defense of the outer constructed work, our own arms and cannon, planted last year [1653] on the outer works [along the present Wall St.] contrary to our wish and advice," will be turned against the city. If they can not, as they declare, repair and defend the outer works, they ought to see to it, he says, that the cannon are "removed and brought here," where they are on a hill and a menace, and restored to the fort.—Rec. N. Am., I: 209.

The city court called a special meeting for the following day (9th).—Ibid., I: 208. On the 13th, they replied to Stuyvesant and the council that they would willingly assist, "according to their ability," in fortifying and defending the city. The provincial authorities considered it reasonable "that the Outside people should do their share of constructing, repairing, and defending, and said they were "well disposed to command the same by proclamation," since it was only a fair return for the help "rendered and got up three or four times last year [1653] by the Burgomasters and Scheepens for the Outside people," and that "obstinate and refractory persons" should be punished as they deserved. The city fathers concurred in the necessity of such an order, and they promised to "employ all diligence and means, to commence the work most speedily," on condition that "proper Regulations" were "first adopted as to the manner the works are to be constructed and made."—Ibid., I: 210-11. The result of this was the provincial ordinance of June 14 (q.v.).

Rumors of an invasion by New Englanders having reached Stuyvesant and the council, they propose to the burgomasters and scheepens for the defense of New Amsterdam and New York. These suggestions are that besides the repair and security of the fort, the old ditch (Gracht) be dug up and gabions be set up there, which being done, to fortify the City Tavern [city hall] with a small earthwork and breastworks, and to plant on the same 2 or 3 light pieces." The proposals provide also for changes in the outer works or palisades, built in the previous year—by which "cannon be removed from thence, lest they be turned upon the city by an enemy, especially as the angles are completely destroyed.—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 272-73, but with revisions made from the original Dutch text in the N. Y. State Library. The above suggestions seem to mean—(1) the repair and securing of the fort; (2) the deepening and reinforcing of the ditch that ran along the present Broad St.; and (3) the fortifying of the city tavern, which, on May 18 (q.v.), had been granted by the West India Co. to the city as a city hall, for which purpose it had been used since back in 1652 (see Feb. 6 of that year). Regarding repairs of the ditch, see Aug. 24. It is not certain just when the city hall defences were completed, but they are shown on the Castello Plan of 1660 (Frontispiece, and Pl. 82, Vol. II), and were soon thereafter superseded by a "rondel" or stone half-moon, which appears on that map and the "half-moon before the Stadthuys," as well.—See Map Ref. Key, III: 645.

On account of rumors unfavourable to the security of New Amsterdam and its fortress, Stuyvesant and the council consider it "highly necessary not only to repair the works constructed last year, but also, first and foremost, in addition to the repair and strengthening of the Fort, likewise other new Trenches and interior Works, in order the better to defend the one from the other, and in case of need to be able to retire from the one or the other." This old and new work is declared to be imperative, and all officials "of the Subaltern Courts" of the province are commanded, by ordinance, to do all in their power to forward the hiring of "some able Diggers and Diggers from each Village, the government, and for that reason it is resolved unanimously "to pass them in silence and not to call upon them either for the repairs or for the defense" (of New Amsterdam), so as not to "drag the Trojan horse" within the city's walls.—N. Ferryboats or Scows to carry or convey over strange Passengers or Inhabitants of this Province, or Cattle, Goods or any thing else, his own property excepted," on pain of being penalized. The lessee is also "bound to keep continually his Ferry provided with proper Boats and experienced Men, and maintain on both sides of the River" for public use "a covered Shed or Lodge" as a shelter from inclemency of weather. The lessee is to "build for his convenience a flat bottomed Boat to convey across Wagons, Carts, Pows, Cattle, [etc.] and receive" for the service such rates of ferriage as are now established. The adult fare is six stuivers (12 cents) for single persons, or half that when two or more persons are ferried over, but only "half fare" is charged "for a child under ten years" of age. The lessee may refuse service to anybody who does not pay the ferriage in advance of transportation. The hours for running the ferry are "on Summer days, only from 5 o'clock in the morning till 8 o'clock in the evening, provided the Windmill [west of Fort Amsterdam] hath not taken in its sail" and in the winter months from seven in the morning until five in the afternoon, but "in a tempest, or when the Windmill hath lowered [reefed or furled?] its sail in consequence of storm or otherwise." The ferriage rates are not collectable from the director-general, members of his council, marshals, or bailiffs "across the river," but go directly "to the governor." The lessee thereby has the "exclusive right of ferriage for a certain price" from the commencement of the agreement. To prevent anybody from pleading "ignorance" with regard to this ordinance, the lessee of the ferry is commanded "to affix a copy of this Ordinance publicly in the Ferry houses on both sides of the Ferry."—*Laws & Ord. On June 2 and Sept. 22, 1654, Domine Samuel Driscoll received a grant of land, on the east side of the present Trinity Pl., including the site of the west end of the Columbia building, and also a part of the bed of Morris St., near Trinity Pl.—See Castello Plan, C. Anneke Jans Bogardus receives a ground-brief for land constituting the "Predicant's Bouwery," which is described in the confirmation by Gov. Nicolls, March 24, 1667 (q. v.).

Several secret meetings were held on June 28 and 29 at Gravesend, L. I., by about 50 Englishmen, among whom were some privateersmen from the North, the rest being English subjects ... from the villages of Gravesend, Heemstede and Middleburg." It was rumored that they were bent upon mischief against the Dutch.—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 275-79. These rumors reached New Amsterdam and caused some of the recalcitrant English residents to "immediately remove and carry away their Moveables, Furniture, Beavers and other Valuables to the English Villages," thereby causing increase of uneasiness and spreading dissatisfaction among "the good and well disposed Citizens" of the city and "in the Rural districts also," whilst exposing the weakened state of the city "to the plunder of other pirate enemies." The following resolution was passed by the Stuyvesant and the council therefore issue an edict, which forbids any more removals of goods, on account of "any evil report," to the outlying settlements, under a penalty of the forfeiture of such goods; and those who have repeatedly committed such acts are to lose also their citizenship and be banished from the city within twenty-four hours.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 166-67; cf. Brodhead, Hist. State of N. T., II: 58-85.

The "works of the Fort" of New Amsterdam have been repaired and restored 2 or 3 times at considerable expense and labor, and every time torn under foot and thrown to the ground by the Hogs, from which the work repaired and newly constructed Works are said to be "exposed apparently to the same danger." This state of affairs is responsible for an ordinance passed by Stuyvesant and the council, which requires the inhabitants to so secure their goats, sheep, and especially hogs, that they cannot run at large and, if any are found within 24 hours after the ordinance has been published "on the walls or constructed works of the Fort, either on the outer or interior works," they are to be impounded.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 170.

Stuyvesant and the council are informed that reports are being spread again by "some of the Magistrates of Gravesend" charging a Dutch boatman with plowing the land lying west of the town. A resolution is presented to Stuyvesant and the council for the aid of some Frenchmen and Indians hired for the purpose. Similar reports had precipitated a meeting of all the inhabitants in June, at middelburg, where resolutions had been proposed against the French and Dutch.—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 279. The allegation is declared to be false and propagated largely by English refugees from New England, with the design of exciting commotions and disaffection. An ordinance is issued for the arrest of the disseminators, and a large reward is offered to anyone who brings about an arrest and conviction.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 166-69.

Johannes Megapolis and Samuel Driscoll, the two Dutch clergymen residing in New Amsterdam, were invited to the classis of Amsterdam in regard to the propagation of Christianity among the Indians. They say: "It is indeed true that a sachen of the Indians has sojourned for a length of time among us at the Manhattans, who was diligent in learning to read and write, which he learned to do tolerably well. He was also instructed in the principal grounds of the christian faith, and generally joined in recitations on the catechism by christian children. We gave him a Bible that he might peruse it and teach his own countrymen from it. We hoped that in due time he might be the instrument of accomplishing considerable good among the Indians. But we acknowledge that he has only the bare knowledge of the truth, without the practice of godliness. He is greatly inclined to drunkenness, and indeed, is not better than other Indians. We do not expect much fruit of religion among these barbarous nations, until they are brought under the government of Europeans, as these latter increase in numbers."—Bierle, 1657-67.

On the 17th, Stuyvesant and the council informed the burgomasters and schepens that a treaty of peace had been concluded between England and the states-general at Westmstaster, on April 5/15 last past, and that, therefore, they should duly publish the same by proclamation. They do so on this day, "according to the printed copy" sent from Holland, "at a place of public meeting, where the usual preliminary ringing of the Bell."—Rec. N. Am., I: 215-16. Aug. 12 was later appointed as a day of general thanksgiving in New Netherland.—Ibid., I: 222-23; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 339; N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 264.

Stuyvesant calls a meeting of the burgomasters and schepens and delivers to them the despatch of May 18 (q. v.) from the directors at Amsterdam, permitting the appointment of a schout distinct from the office of fiscal.—See summary under Dec. 24, 1655.

Jacques Cortelyou is appointed by Stuyvesant and the council schout of the city of New Amsterdam. He feels himself "agrieved by the instructions given him," and refuses to serve; wherefore the appointment of a schout, the first one who is "independent of the Fiscal's office," is postponed until another person can be chosen.—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 280. See also May 18. For an account of Cortelyou, see Castello Plan, II: 211-13.

It is "provisionally resolved that extraordinary sessions of the court of burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam are henceforth to be paid for by the person at whose request the session is convened."—Rec. N. Am., II: 220.

The ordinance of July 1, 1652 (q. v.), relative to regulating the purchase of lands from the Indians is renewed.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 173.

The necessity of devising and considering ways and means for the support of "Civil Government, Divine Service and the Militia," has been urged repeatedly upon the burgomasters and schepens by Stuyvesant and the council, who now again remind them that it must be done "without any further dilatory exceptions," and that an answer must be given by the following Monday, "together with an account of the receipt and expenditure of the Tappers' Excise" collected by the city.—Rec. N. Am., I: 235-24. The board appoints Paulus Leendertson vander Grift and Olof Stuwenman van Cortlandt, together with Secretary Jacob Kip, "to prepare the account of the expenditures incurred last year on the public works," and orders the receiver to "briefly make out the balance of the Excise and then communicate the same to the Hon'ble General together with the Resolution adopted on the letter, and likewise verbally to propose some points."—Ibid., I: 244.

On Aug. 10, they made an estimate of the expenses for "the outer and inner works constructed this last year and for the defence of the country," which amounted to "about sixteen thousand guilders," and offered their quota, which they claimed to be "about three thousand guilders." This disproportionate share they engaged to pay if they were given authority by the council"to lay a tax on real estate" under their jurisdiction, wherever they might find it.—Ibid., I: 244-245.

On Aug. 31, they offered "to support henceforth at the expense of this City of New Amsterdam" the following: One minister, a preacher, who should be at the same time schoolmaster, one dogwhipper or beadle, a schout, two burgomasters, five schepens, Aug., a secretary, a court messenger, and such others as they deemed necessary. They also offered to devise “some small subsidies,” in case the revenue proved insufficient.—Ibid., I: 232-233. They opposed supporting the military, as a concern not of the city alone, but of the country in general.—Ibid., I: 233.

On Aug. 20, Vander Grift and Van Cortlandt met Stuyvesant and the council on invitation, and were informed that the council were intending for the benefit of the city, “to levy the one per cent on all real estate.” This was along the lines submitted by the city fathers on the 10th, and, therefore, the burgomasters and schepens resolved, on the 31st, “to levy the one per cent on all real estate” within their jurisdiction. They said they hoped no objection would be made by Stuyvesant and the council to their action.—Ibid., I: 233-234. A full reply was made by Stuyvesant and the council, on Sept. 16, which contained a reasonable concession in connection with the real estate tax levy, but in which the city fathers were severely castigated for “decisively and perversely” misleading the director-general and council in not filling their promises and agreements, and for misapplication of the excise revenues. They were told that the excise revenue would be taken away from the city and be let to the highest bidder, so that the salaries of the clergymen could be paid, and that their memorial and the council’s answer were brought to the directors in Holland under the direction of—N.Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 295-6.

Secretary Van Tienhoven delivers to the burgomasters and schepens a “printed Placard about building on the lots” in New Amsterdam, and another “Placard about buying and taking possession of lands without the knowledge of the Director-General and Council, requesting, that they may be published by the Burgomasters and Schepens,” which they do this same day, “in front of the City Hall after the ringing of the Bell.”—Rec. N. Am., I: 232-233.

An elaborate ordinance is passed by Stuyvesant and the council for the regulation of the newly-established neigh-house at New Amsterdam.—Laws & Ord. N. Neh., 174-77. See May 4.

Adriaen Vincent, having petitioned the burgomasters and schepens, is granted “permission to retail brandy and other strong liquors out of doors by the large and small measure . . . on condition that he pay the proper Tasters’ Excise.”—Rec. N. Am., I: 235. At the time of the invasion of the present Broadway and South William streets, then, however, respectively the Heere Gracht and the Slijck Steegh. See Castello Plan, II: 297-94, and Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 98-1.

This is the day appointed for general thanksgiving for the peace between England and Holland.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 174-77. The proclamation thereof was published by the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam, on the 4th, “in front of the City Hall after ringing of the Bell.”—Rec. N. Am., I: 233.

Stuyvesant and the council resolve to resume the tavern excise of the city for the company, because the proceeds have been misapplied by the burgomasters and schepens during their control thereof.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 284.

An ordinance for regulating the duties of the provost-marshal or jailer is passed by Stuyvesant and the council. This official is declared to be a subordinate of the director-general and council and under the immediate control of the fiscal. The ordinance provides that for arrests he is to receive specified fees and for minor offences certain fines, whether the prisoners are from the military or the commonalty. His residence is “in Fort New Amsterdam,” where he is provided with the keys, locks, and chains of the prison. He is obliged to take the prisoners “to lock up and feed the Prisoners in the manner . . . ordered by the Fiscal.” He is required to visit the prisoners in the morning and evening, “and take particular care that no file, rope, ironwork or anything sharp” is left with any of them. Other duties also are prescribed for him.—Laws & Ord. of N. Neh., 177-79. On Aug. 23, Arent Janse, of Vlieingen, was appointed and qualified for the post.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 174-77. See also Jan 25, 1656.

The Jacob Barrens, who sailed from Amsterdam at the “Pareboom” (Peartree) on July 8, bearing a lieuten brief (passport) from the W. I. Co., arrives at New Amsterdam, being the first Jew of record to settle in New Netherland.—Oppenheim, Early History of Jews in New York, 1, 5; Cal. MSS., VIII: 239-41.

The supporters of the first charter granted at the graft or canal (present Broadway Street) by Aukens Janzen and Christiaen Baretsen, carpenters having “again fallen down,” due to “the heavy rain and water,” the burgomasters and schepens contract with them “for re-construing it and bringing it again into good condition” for the sum of 52 guilders, and it is termed “Two good diggers.”—Rec. N. Am., I: 231. This is the earliest reference to the formalizing of the Graft.

Jan Valentyn is granted by the burgomasters and schepens permission to tap, provided he pays the proper excise and no objection is made by Stuyvesant, “one of whose servants he is.”—Rec. N. Am., I: 231.

On June 2, Stuyvesant and the council proposed an additional provincial revenue for the support of government, by a tax upon real estate and cattle.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 270. This proposal is now taken up again and enacted by the council. The collection of the “291st” being found impracticable, coming almost as much to gather as the receipts therefrom, it is decided “not to demand and collect the tenth for some years to come, until the population shall have increased, leaving instead a tax on cattle and land.”—Ibid., XIV: 287-88. Every morgen of land owned by anyone by a patent is to be taxed to stouters once a year; or, every head of horned cattle, if above three years old—goats and sheep excepted—a tax of 20 stuivers is fixed; and on houses and lots granted for building purposes in New Amsterdam, Beverwyck, “the neighborhood of The Ferry and elsewhere,” a tax of “the hundredth part of the real value” is to be “paid at the General office” of the company in New Amsterdam. Two tax appraisers are to be chosen from the respective courts of the city and villages, to act with a commissioner from the supreme council, to fix upon the valuation and attend to the disposal of vacant lots upon which the present owners have neglected to build.—Laws & Ord. of N. Neh., 180-81.

Another ordinance is passed by the director-general and council against selling strong drink to Indians.—Laws & Ord. of New Neh., 182. For summary of such laws, see June 16, 1643.

Jan Montfoort receives a ground-brief for a lot now at the north-east corner of Broad and Beaver Sts.—See Map of Dutch Gram, C. P. 8, 9, 10, 11.

The burgomasters and schepens vote that each member of their board shall draw upon the receipts from the excise for 100 florins, in part payment of their several salaries, and order the secretary to make such payments.—Rec. N. Am., I: 236. They draw upon purses of the company for any expenses they incur.

Early this month, 21 Jews, adults and children, arrive at New Amsterdam on the ship “St. Charles,” of which Jacques de la Motte is master. This is the first party of Jews to arrive here. The master of the ship brought an action to the city court, on Sept. 7, for “payment of the freight and board of the Jews whom he brought here from Cape St. Antony according to agreement and contract,” for which each was held bound in solidum. This case resulted in the sale of their goods and chattels until the debt was paid.—Rec. N. Am., I: 240, 241, 244, 240, 252. Whether the St. Anthony from whence they came was at Recife (Pernambuco) or near Bahia, Brazil, it is not possible to determine; but the probabilities strongly favour the former. Recife capitulated to the Portuguese in January of this year. The Jews in several ships departed for Holland soon thereafter. One of these ships was attacked by a Spanish pirate and the Jews were rescued and conveyed to “New Holland” by a French privateer. The records show that the “St. Charles” was a frigate, mounting five iron guns. It was owned by Capt. Simou Felle, a native of France; the name of its master was French, and the contract made with the Jews was written in the French language.—Oppenheim, Early Hist. of Jews in N. Y., I: 164, 1646; see also, year 1779, giving revised translations of Dutch documents and other hitherto undeveloped evidences.

An ordinance of Aug. 28, which prohibited the furnishing of intoxicating liquors to Indians, and provided for the arrest and imprisonment of all drunken Indians, is published and affixed at Jan Vinge appears at the court of burgomasters and schepens and complains "of the damage he sustained by the erection of the "Fall of New Amsterdam" walls," that his land lay open and the cattle were destroying his plasted crops. He requested the burgomasters and schepens to stop this behavior and that the damage, with the land taken away, be paid for. He is referred to Stuyvesant to arrange the matter with him—Rec. N. Am., I: 250. On Nov. 23, Stuyvesant and the council issued an order that the above named ship now lies and can be seen, to the sad report of the Directors of the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co. The transaction is for 400 beavers, "and in addition the payment of half the monthly wages earned" during two and one half months, "amounting in all for the entire ship's crew, to fl 225 net." In the inventory of things sold with the ship are "2 prince's flags," "2 swivel guns," "2 iron 3 pounders," some halls, muskets, and gunner's powder-horns.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's tran.), XIII: 120 (N. Y. State Library).

Pieter Lucassen, for himself and partners, sells to Petrus Stuyvesant "the little ship called Abraham's Sacrifice, in length from stern to stern 61 feet, in width 10 feet, hull 9 feet, with standing and running rigging, sails, cordage, anchors, cables, and furthermore, whatever appears by inventory, good and bad." The above named ship now lies and can be seen, to the sad report of the Directors of the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co. The transaction is for 400 beavers, "and in addition the payment of half the monthly wages earned" during two and one half months, "amounting in all for the entire ship's crew, to fl 225 net." In the inventory of things sold with the ship are "2 prince's flags," "2 swivel guns," "2 iron 3 pounders," some halls, muskets, and gunner's powder-horns.—Records N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's tran.), XIII: 120 (N. Y. State Library).

The city hall of New Amsterdam.—Law & Ord. N. Neth., 182-84; Hist. MSS., Dutch, 143.

The burgomasters and schepens allow the following account:
"Item—fl 88 to Joh. Pieter Verbrugge for pay for boys for the bonfire of the viand, according to order."—Rec. N. Am., I: 243. Evidently, this was the celebration of the treaty of peace between England and Holland, April 5, 1654.

Arent van Hattem, the first president of the board of burgomasters and schepens of the city of New Amsterdam, resigns his office and returns to Holland.—Rec. N. Am., I: 244-45.

The burgomasters and schepens write to the directors at Amsterdam inquiring, among other things, as follows: "What are your Lordships' understand regarding the ferry between this City New Amsterdam and Breuckelen—is it granted to this city or Not?"—Rec. N. Am., I: 246. See July 1, 1649; Sept. 19, 1658.

A Swedish ship, the "Golden Shark," bought for the South River, enters Sandy Hook Bay by mistake, and anchors behind Staten Island. Discovering his error, the captain sends a boat up to Manhattan for a pilot. Stuyvesant, on account of the capture of Cortoy by the Swedes, orders the boat's crew to the guardhouse. On Sept. 25, he sent soldiers to seize the ship, and bring the factor a prisoner to New Amsterdam.—Broodhead, op. cit., I: 594, and authorities there cited.

Nicaius de Sille writes to A. de Mist Uyten Hagle, "from America, in New Amsterdam in New Netherland, on the island of Manhattan, the 23d of September, my birthday" (he was born in 1610), and says: "I wish that you were here with me. I should look you in my cellar with the pewter and burgomaster and schepens I done to you that your mind should be filled with wrath so long? If my sudden departure from Holland is the cause of it, I cannot help it, for after I had taken the oath (as first councillor for New Netherland) on Thursday, I had to go on board the following Saturday. God be praised and thanked, we arrived here safely and healthily. If you ever see what I mean, you can do more, and soon a letter sent to Mr. Beeckerken [see Aug. 23, 1653]. This country is good and healthful, for as yet there is neither a doctor nor an apothecary, and the people are seldom sick. We have excellent rivers, game and fish, yet, even grain and cattle enough to feed us. They brew good beer here, but the wine still comes from the father-land, although there are entreprising people here who plant vineyards. Farmers are needed here to turn the woods into plowed land, and there is a lack of women, for it is a fruitful land for everything. The increase of cattle and people, but mostly of children and pigs, proceeds mercifully; in fine, I shall not go back to Holland, but intend to remain here for the rest of my life."

"Since my arrival no ships have arrived, except [one] yesterday, so that a mostly [fourth of a] Gill of brandy costs twelve stuivers [24 cents]. The Frenchman and Spaniard were driven away, but now show up again and bring recruits to the Brandenburg [reference to various wines]. We have here the same fruits and vegetables as in Holland, for this country is almost like Holland, only of melons, watermelons, peaches and sweet and sour cherries there is an abundance. I cannot praise this country enough.

"My children begin to speak the language of the savages, and to take after them; and remain long in distress to his financial troubles, principally with a nursemaid to his children, in Holland.—Quart. Journal of N. Y. State Hist. Ass'n, I: 104, ff., translated by A. J. F. van Laer. See also Aug. 23, 1653 and May 23, 1654."
The iconography of Manhattan Island

Stuyvesant delivers to Martin Creijger, president of the board of burgomasters and scheepen, "the painted coat of arms of the City of New Amsterdam and the seal, cut in silver, sent by the Noble Lords-Directors in the ship De Porceboom" (Pearce).—Rec. N. Col. Docs.: XIV: 309; See Frontispiece, Vol. IV, and Vol. V.

The burgomasters and scheepen vote a recess from ordinary sessions of the court until three weeks after Christmas, "as the winter and holidays are at hand."—Rec. N. Am., I: 271. See Dec. 24.

By resolution of Stuyvesant and the council, Andries Huds is given a permit to act as surveyor.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 144.

A few days later, he petitioned for leave to keep a school at New Amsterdam, but this request was referred to the minister and consistory by the council, on Dec. 31 (q.v.).—Ibid.

Vacancies having occurred in the list of officers of the burgomaster companies of New Amsterdam, they are filled as follows: Lieut. Paulus Leendertse van der Grint is appointed captain "in the Company under the blue flag," Daniel Litschoe is advanced to second ensign; and Cornelis Jacobson Sternecks is named as ensign.—N.Y. Col. Docs.: XIV: 310.

Stuyvesant sails with three ships from New Amsterdam on Christmas eve for Curaque, to establish trade in the West Indies.—Broads. Hist. State of N. Y., I: 396-97, 693. He had chartered the "Porceboom" (Pearce) and another vessel, the "Dolphin."—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 58, 144. After an absence of nearly seven months, he returned to New Amsterdam, in July, 1655 (Broads. 49, cit. in Dec. 603), and, on July 14, the council made record that he had submitted to them a report of his transactions in Curaque and the Caribbean Islands, which report they ordered to be deposited in the office of the provincial secretary.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 550.

One of the first ordinances proclaimed during the administration of Stuyvesant was an edict against destroying or stealing fences, fruits, etc., from the farms, orchards, or gardens in the province (see July 1, 1647). Through repeated retrials and postings, this law was generally observed; but now (1654) complaints are made that burgomasters and farmers are being "daily robbed of Clayboards, Palisades, Pots, Bails, and other fencing stuff." The earlier penalty had been a fine of one hundred guilders, besides arbitrary punishment. The new law now enacted, in midwinter, provides that corporal punishment be inflicted, "without mercy or favor," on any one who is found guilty.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 185-86. This, in my opinion, is a very just punishment, and one that is very well deserved by the daily complaints that were made in the following autumn, when Stuyvesant and the council referred to the matter in another ordinance, of Oct. 9, 1655 (q.v.), which provided even severer penalties—branding and whipping for the first offense.

and for the second violation the guilty one was to be "punished with the balter until Death ensue." To make the capture of the ships an affair of importance, with a promise that their names would be concealed.—Ibid., 1654. This last-named ordinance was renewed on Dec. 30, 1658 (ibid., 365), as it was also on Jan. 7, 1659 (Rec. N. Am., I: 42-43).

Andries Huddle petitioned the Dutch council for a license to keep a school in New Amsterdam. The petition is referred to the minister and consistory.—Col. Dutch MSS., 144 (Albany). Pratts Annals of Pub. Education in N. T. State, 19, ascribes this petition to Dec. 31, 1665, an obviously impossible date. Huddle had been, for years, a prominent figure in the province; he was appointed, on Oct. 12, 1645, to be consistory at Fort Nassau, on the South River, a post he was still occupying four years later.—Col. Dutch MSS., 51, 98. Prof. Kilpatrick considers this request for a license unusually interesting, because it was referred to the minister and consistory. "When we take into account," he says, "the ecclesiastical hatred of heretical teachers common in Holland, and Stuyvesant's fanatical zeal against heretical sects, we are inclined to wonder whether suspicion may not have rested on Huddle's orthodoxy. . . . That Huddle should have wished to teach is strange considering his many business concerns."—Kilpatrick, op. cit., 113. There is no record of his being granted.

In this year the first ferry-house was built on the Brooklyn side of the East River.—See Castello Plan, I: 245.

But in that interim of time the Indians about the Manasatans fell upon the Dutch & in their first furie killed all they could light upon, burning their houses destroying their Cattle, but upon better considerations spared the lives of such as they took & put them to ransom especially for powder & lead, & in one place att one time took 70 of their prisoners, & would not ransom them without a good quantity of powder & lead, by report 24 small barrels with lead proportionable, besides other Cofendotes And that to such an astonishment & terrore of the Dutch that the bowers or flarres generally left their habitations, & betoke themselves to their Citie New Amsterdam, where the affrighted burgers or Citizens themselves were as ready to gott aboard such ships as were then in the harbour, with what goods they could, and to bid a vittimum vale to their New Netherlands . . . .—Clarendon Papers, in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1860), 9.

During the Indian troubles of this year, Staten Island was cut off, "having above twenty fisons slain, who were of Melyen's Children, Nephews, Servants & Tenants: The Town consisting of about four hundred, which were all slain, and Cornels made plunder off [sic] & 90' Petitioners of [sic] father & mother & two sons with all that survived were taken into a barbarous Captivity by the heathen."—From original petition of Jacob Melyn, son of Cornelis, to Richard, Earl of Belomont, governor of New Amsterdam, April 30, 1655, printed in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1913), XLVI: 156-38.

In 1655, Claes van Elsland was an official surveyor in New Netherland (see also 1648).—O'Callaghan, Reg. N. Neth., 37.

Recognizations of seven ships sent over with goods to New Netherland by the West India Co., Amsterdam chamber, netted fees of fl. 22,972:8:8. Among these ships was the "Nieu Amsterdam."—N. Neth. Papers, No. 1221 (2), in N. Y. Pub. Library.

In this month, during a severe winter, "all rivers" about New Amsterdam are "frozen and the land and roads covered with snow; it is possible to cross the "East River on the ice at White Stone," L. I.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 311, 312.

18 Cornelis van Tienhoven, the provincial secretary, informs the burgomasters and schepens that the provincial council intend to appoint Dirck van Schellyphue as "Concierge" (high constable, bailiff, or city marshal), and asks if they have anything against it.—Rec. N. Am., I: 378. The new officer received his appointment from the Consistory, and is to perform duties in the city courts. His commission was signed by Secretary Van Tienhoven, and had "on one side" thereof "the Provincial Seal, impressed on red Wax." His duties were "the maintenance of justice and the execution of judgments" that were rendered either by the council or the city court in civil cases. Stuyvesant was absent on his journey to Curacao when the appointment was made, but knew of the proposal on Dec. 17, a week before his departure.—Ibid., I: 282-83. The concierge's instruction for his conduct are in ibid., I: 282-83; cf. ibid., Hist. MSS., Dutch, 145, 146; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 156-58; Early Rec. of Albany (Notorial Papers), III: 11-12.

Certain persons having cut up and burned a number of the city's palettes, on account of cold weather, are let off by Stuyvesant and the council on condition that they cut and make new barrels in lieu of those they burned.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 145.

On this day, and again on Feb. 1, the burgomasters and schepens ordered certain public auctions "in front of the City Hall." This shows the place where these public sales were habitually held.—Rec. N. Am., I: 279, 280.

Jacob Steendam, the poet of New Netherland, is summoned to the city court for having erected his house, without the consent of the fence viewers or city surveyors, wholly out of the line of the street (Hoog Stroat, now Stone St.)—Rec. N. Am., I: 275-76. The house was on the lot now 16 Stone St. Its rear was the present 59 and 61 Pearl St.

The provincial council having appointed a new board of burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam on Jan. 31, its members now take their oath of office. The burgomasters are Allard Anthony and Offie Stevens, of Cornelis, and the schepens Johannes Nevius, Johannes de Peyer, Johannes Pieteren van Brugge, Jacob Stycker, and Jan Vinje (Jean Vigne). They took their seats on Feb. 8.—Rec. N. Am., I: 281-82, 285; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 146.

The directors at Amsterdam grant permission to Jews to reside and traffic in New Amsterdam.—Oppenheim, Early Hist. of the Jews in N. Y., I: 12. For subsequent proceedings, see March 4, 1666.

The burgomasters and schepens vote to meet on the next day "with the council for the purpose of agreeing on something relative to the Fire Inspectors, chimney's, and the banks of the river" of the city.—Rec. N. Am., I: 288-94; cf. Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 146.

Cornelis van Tienhoven informs the court of burgomasters and schepens "how Gysbert van Imbroeck has by petition requested the Supreme Councillors for permission to make a lottery of a certain quantity of Bibles, Testaments and other books according to catalogue, that two be appointed to value the same, and to select something for the Poor therefrom; and asked if Burgomasters and Schepens had any thing to say against it, as it was a matter, which concerns the Community." The burgomasters and schepens considered the plan advantageous and resolved that it be proceeded with.—Rec. N. Am., I: 288. On March 1, the board was informed that the council had given its approbation to the "book-lottery . . . and that the books be accordingly valued at one hundred [f]7 per Invoice, whereof the poor should receive one third including expenses; the surplus to be for petitioner." Johannes de Montagne was chosen to represent the council, and the burgomasters and schepens selected Jacob Anthony and Johannes Nevius as commissioners to conduct the said lottery.—Ibid., I: 291; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 147. This is the earliest recorded lottery held in the city.

Cornelis van Tienhoven, the schout or sheriff, informs the burgomasters and schepens that "some of the Company's Soldiers and Servants" will seek permission to tap beer, etc., with which he opposes because "many Soldiers and Servants" will thereby "led into debauchery" and "many irregularities" will occur. The same day the board refuses a permit to a soldier to tap.—Rec. N. Am., I: 286-87, 288.

On a wealthy Amsterdam merchant, is at present residing in New Amsterdam next door to the tavern of Michiel Tadens (11 Pearl St., where a part of the Maritime bldg. covers the site). He is charged by the farmers of the excise with selling liquor without a permit, and at the same time they ask...

1. The burgomasters and schepens against "Abram de la Sina" (Abraham de Lucena), a Jew, charging him with keeping his store in New Amsterdam open during sermon, and also with selling by retail. He requests that De Lucena be deprived of his trade and be fined 600 guilders. The case is put over, and, apparently, there was no execution in either case.—Rec. N. Am., I: 291. See Oppenheim's Early Hist. of Jews in N. Y., 6 (note), 7. 7. This is the first case on record of a Jew in New Netherland being prosecuted for breaking a Sunday ordinance. At this meeting, the burgomasters decided that a resolution requiring the Jews who arrived in September, 1654, to depart forthwith should take its course. No further action was taken.—Ibid., 5-7.

The city hall is encumbered “by a quantity of salt deposited therein by Cornelis Schut,” as well as by other goods and lodgers. Therefore, the burgomasters and schepens order Schut "to provide himself with a store-house for his salt," and the lodgers to find other quarters, “so that the City Hall be not wholly spoiled by the salt, nor occupied by others.”—Rec. N. Am., I: 292. Schut delayed his removal of the salt, and was warned by the board on April 12 that they would remove it at his expense.—Ibid., I: 304. On April 21, he was again warned for the same reason. April 22 was the date of the resolution of the 12th.—Ibid., I: 308. He was again warned by the board through the city messenger, on Aug. 16, “without further delay” to obey the former orders promptly.—Ibid., I: 340. Schut requested, on the 25th, “a little time to remove his salt from the City Hall,” and was once more required to obey the former orders and given three days in which to comply.—Ibid., I: 348.

Guert Coerten petitions the burgomasters and schepens for permission to tap, but, for the time being, he is refused.—Rec. N. Am., I: 292. On the 8th, he renewed his request and was referred to the decision thereof.—Ibid., I: 295.

Jan Rutgersen petitions the burgomasters and schepens for leave "to sell beer by the pot in the City Hall where the little sail loft was given to him to dwell in." The board grants him permission "to lodge in the City Hall for one month, as his house was burnt down in the winter, at the expiration of which time he shall depart; meanwhile he can look out for another dwelling," but the rest of the petition is denied.—Rec. N. Am., I: 292. On April 19, he requests, by another petition, that, “inasmuch as he is sorely impoverished by the fire, and an old inhabitant, he may have leave to sell, with others, a few trivels and a can of beer and wine, and to receive lodgers,” which is granted.—Ibid., I: 308. See also Castello Plan, II: 296; and Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 980, for his tavern on the Herre Gracht, now No. 69 Broad St.

The provincial council issues an order on the application of the burgomasters and schepens for a transfer to them of the building formerly used as the city hall ("Stadt Huys"), which now passes wholly under the city's jurisdiction.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 147; Rec. N. Am., I: 291. This building had been granted to the city by the directors at Amsterdam, on May 15, 1645 (q.v.).—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 262; Rec. N. Am., I: 219.

The two burgomasters visit the meeting of the council and suggest “how necessary it was, that proper attention and care should be paid to the matter of survey.” One of the fence viewers, Paulus Leendertsen van Gritter, having gone to Curacao with Stuyvesant, leaving Van Tienhoven as the only remaining fence viewer, the burgomasters, therefore, request that “another fit person, conversant with surveying,” be adjointed to Van Tienhoven, "in place of the late Fence Viewer, Lubbertus van Dinclagen." The council finally designate Pieter Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven for the place.—Rec. N. Am., I: 295; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 149.

Ten residents on the "Straits van de Graft," or street from the ditch (Brouwer or Brewers', later Stone Street, running from Whitehall to Broad St.), petition the burgomasters and schepens, saying that they have found it "by daily experience that the said street is more and more unfit for public use"; therefore, they are inclined, for their "own accommodation and the public good, ornament and welfare" of the city, "to pave the said street with round stone [cobblestones] on the first favorable opportunity." They propose that this work be authorized and executed by the city, and request "permission and such directions in the premises as to surveys, levels, and drains, etc." as the board considers best for the community. The petitioners pledge themselves "to furnish the stone, the raising and lowering necessary thereto, each to the extent of his house and lot, and further to follow the general rule relative to paving and expenses," and ask that others, if unwilling, shall be constrained to do likewise, "so that if the work be begun, it may be completed." The board grants the request and orders that the project be "forwarded to the surveyors" to cooperate with them "soon, so that the necessary work" can go on. Meanwhile, the property owners are "to prepare all the materials necessary thereto."—Rec. N. Am., I: 300-1.

This work was not executed, however, before the year 1658 (see Rec. N. Am., I: 314). The city was then by a pro rata assessment on the abutting owners.—Ibid., II: 309-10; VII: 167. It has often been claimed that this was the first street paved in New Amsterdam. That view is untenable. The record itself refers to "the general rule relative to paying and expenses," as a system in vogue and understood by the petitioners. See, however, Oct.

Rev. Johannes Megapolensis, writing to the classics of Amsterdam about the arrival of Jews at New Amsterdam (see Sept. 22, 1653), says: "For as we have here Pagans, Menonites and Lutherans among the Dutch; also many Puritans, Independents, and Presbyterians, of the City of Nassau in the Province of Zealand, speaking the English under this Government, who conceal themselves under the name of Christians; it would create a still greater confusion, if the obrinate and immoderate Jews came to settle here."—Etelis. Rec., I: 335-36.

The burgomasters court-martial of the city asks the burgomasters and schepens to procure two drums, one for each of the burgers companies; this is referred to the council.—Rec. N. Am., I: 302. On May 17, the burgomasters and schepens grant the purchase of the drums, "at the least possible cost, which shall be paid for out of the City's funds."—Ibid., I: 314. See also Aldecoa.

Jan Paulussen Jacquet petitions the burgomasters and schepens for permission "to sell drink out of his house by the pot with other trivels." Granted.—Rec. N. Am., I: 301-2.

Harman van Hoboken is appointed by the council, with the consent of the consistory of the church at New Amsterdam, as "Chorister and Schoolmaster" of the city, "as thirty-five guilders [$14] per month, and one hundred guilders [$60] extra, per year, for expenses." He succeeds Willem Vestius (see Oct., 1649).—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 147; trans. in Duyshoe, Hist. of the School of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church in the City of N. Y., 23. He was appointed as a petitioner, on Feb. 21, 1656, to the burgomasters and schepens, who said they would consider his case after he had informed them of "what he is allowed for each child per quarter."—Rec. N. Am., I: 39. Some months later (Nov. 4), the asked the city court to "be pleased to grant him the hall and the hall room, as a dwelling," because he did not know how to manage for the proper accommodation of the children during the winter," as they required "a place adapted for fire to be warmed, for which their present tenement was "wholly unfit." Moreover, he said he was "bewhoveen with a wife and children," needed quarters for them, and could not "pay so heavy a rent as a whole house" cost. The court did not allow him the use of "the hall and little room" to the city hall, because they were "not at present in repair," and were "required for other purposes." Yet, as the youth were quite numerous, he was granted 100 guilders allowance for house rent "for a school."—Ibid., II: 219-20. On Jan. 16, 1660 (q.v.), he petitioned the burgomasters for "an allowance from the City," as he was "behind hand with the building of the School [i.e., rent, not construction, as some have believed], and for divers other reasons set forth in the petition." They allowed him "his current salary," to be paid "at a more convenient season" on their order upon the treasurer, and abolished his allowance therefrom.—Ibid., VII: 244. His services ended when Evert Pietersen was commissioned to replace him, on May 2, 1661. On Oct. 27, he was granted his request for other employment, and was engaged as "Adelborst [public use];" for which he was to serve as schoolmaster and clerk on Stuyvesant's bowery, when not needed in the company's service as "Adelborst."—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 231; trans. in Duyshoe, op. cit., 29-30; ibid., 295. On April 28, 1665, he was referred to as "Deacon at the bowery" of Stuyvesant.—Min. of Orphans Courts, II: 44.

Fire-wardens were created, and fire regulations made, by the ordinance of Jan. 25, 1649 (q.v.).—Lent & Ord. of N. Neth., 82–83.

1656
Two hundred spikes, or girders, eighteen following it. consolidation or merging of the burgomasters and schepen makes nominations for fire-wardens of the city, from which the supreme council designates three, namely, Hendrick Kip, Govert Looskermans, and Jan Paulissen Jacobse, for terms of one-third, one-third, and one-third, respectively. See A.

1657
Joannes de Decker, having petitioned the council for employment, is appointed notary public. At the same time, Pieter van der Linde is appointed tobacco inspector.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 148.

1658
The city court enacts an ordinance for governing the time of attendance of the schout, burgomasters, schepen, and secretary, "both in Ordinary and Extraordinary Sessions,"—namely, "to appear, on notification by the Court Messenger, at all ordinary sessions in the City Hall precisely at 9 o'clock on the ringing of the bell; or at extraordinary sessions at the hour appointed." Those who arrive half an hour after the ringing of the bell or the time appointed, when the court messenger shall turn a sand box, or hour glass, are to be fined six stuivers; if an hour late, twelve stuivers, and if wholly absent, or arriving after the court has adjourned, forty stuivers for each time, unless a good excuse is given, "such as sickness, being from home, to sit at Fort Orange, at the South or North." These fines are to be paid down immediately, "without any exception," and to be "collected by the others, to be expended or employed in time and circumstances, as by plurality of votes" is found proper.—Rec. N. Am., I: 306.

1659
Jan Rutgers, Jr., requests permission to L MSS., Dutch, 148.

1660
Nicholas Langevelthusen, a corporal in the soldiery of the West India Co., petitions the burgomasters and schepen for permission to tap liquors. As he is a servant of the company, his request is referred to the council for approval, which he obtains; whereupon, the board allows his request.—Rec. N. Am., I: 308.

1661
The form and manner of construction of an ordinary house in the Dutch period of New York's history are described in the following contract for the erection of the ferry-house, or tavern, on the Long Island side of the East River, for Egbert van Borsum, the ferryman (see June 1, 1654):

"We, Carpenters Jan Cornelissen, Abram Jacobsen, and Jan Hendricksen, have contracted to construct a house over at the ferry of Egbert Van Borsum, ferry-man, thirty feet long and eighteen feet wide, with an side passage of four feet, to place in it such goods and provisions, as shall be purchased in the front, the front to be planed and grooved, and the rear gable to have boards overplanked in order to be tight, with door and windows therein; and a floor and ceiling grooved and planed beneath (on the under side); to saw the roof thereon, and moreover to set a window-frame with a glass light in the front side; to make a chimney mantel and to wainscot the floor-rooms below, and divide it in the centre across with a door in the partition; to set a window-frame with two glass lights therein; further to wainscot the east side the whole length of the house, and in the recess two bedsteads, one in the front room and one in the inside room, with a pantry at the end of the bedstead (hereafter): a winding staircase in the fore-room. Furthermore we, the carpenters, are bound to deliver all the square timber—to wit, beams, posts, and frame timber with the pillar for the winding staircase, spars, and worm, and girders, and foundation timbers required for the work; also the spiles and nails for the interior work; also rails for the wainscot are to be delivered by us.

"For which work Egbert Van Borsum is to pay five hundred and fifty guilders [520], one-third in beavers, one-third in good merchantable wampum, one-third in good silver coin, and free passage over the ferry so long as the work continues, and small beer to be drunk during the work.

"We have subsequently contracted with said Egbert Van Borsum to build a cellar-kitchen under said house, and to furnish the wood for it—to wit, beams, posts, and joist. There must be made two door-frames and two circular frames with windows therein, with a stairway to enter it, and to line the stairs in the cellar round about with boards, with a chimney mantel in the kitchen, and to grove and frame it. Egbert must execute the cellar at his own expense. The carpenters must furnish the nails. For this work one hundred guilders [84] are promised together with one whole good oter skin. Moreover, Egbert must deliver all the flat wood-work required for the house—to wit boards and wainscotting.

"Dated 29th April, 1655, at New Amsterdam.

"From Stiles, Hist. of Brooklyn, I: 214–15. The "bettwe," mentioned in this document, Stiles explains, was built-in, "like a cupboard in a partition, with doors closing upon it when unoccupied," so that the sleeping apartment of an inn could accommodate several travellers with sleeping quarters, and, in the daytime, the room could be used for the general public.

"Arent Jansen, the provost-marshal or jailer, is granted by the burgomasters and schepen permission "until further order to reside in the little side room of the City Hall in order to be able more conveniently to attend to the prisoners."—Rec. N. Am., I: 314. Prisoners under bond are confined in one of the rooms of the city hall, as shown by another record of this year.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 136.

Three thieves confined at Fort Amsterdam break out, and are advertised by hue and cry, and summoned to return to the fort before the third beating of the drum, on pain of having their names affixed to the gallows.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 146. One of these was evidently a soldier, who was sentenced, after the 26th of June, to be conveyed to the place of public execution and hung until dead. At the urgent solicitation of the public at the place of execution, his sentence was commuted by the court to perpetual banishment.—Ibid., 142–43.

Peter Rudolf receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house and garden at the present No. 48, and part of No. 49, Broad St.—See Castellano Plan, I: 74, 196; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 980; Pl. 174, Vol. III.

Rodel Hewit (or Rendel Huwit), an Englishman, who has been temporarily denied permission to keep a tavern and lodgers, is now allowed to do so by the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam.—Rec. N. Am., I: 289, 317. In March, 1656, his wife, Margaret, was up before the city court in his behalf, charged by the schout with infractions of the tavern ordinance.—Ibid., II: 53. He probably conducted the tavern at the east end of Richard Smith's building, which covered the site now Nos. 90–92 Pearl St. See Castellano Plan, II: 312, and Innes, New Am. and Its People, 229.

Michiel Paulissen, or Paulussen, "old burgher, and his wife a "Native of this country," petition the burgomasters and schepens for permission to sell drink "by small measure" in the "vicinity of City Hall," near the Pearl St., as "commonly called Hurdicken or Borger Jorda Island," in that part of the present Borough of Queens which overlooks Berrie Island.—N. F. Cal. Doc., XIV: 336. The poor of the city were aided from a deacon's or poor fund obtained from "alms collected among the people, and some fines and small fees," and from the steward's office of the Dutch East India Co., N. Am. N. Neth., 329, 362. Among the Joy Papers, in the N. Y. Hist. Soc., there is a colored pen and ink "Mapp of the Lands adjoining to the [Brooklyn] Ferry," on which this "Poor Boyry" is located exactly as above stated. The council orders that a petition for enlarging the city gate at the East River, so as to permit the passage of a cart, and for repairing the road, be referred to the city authorities.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 149.

THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

1655 The wife of Paulus Leendertsen vanden Grift, and Egbert Woutersen, for being in the city, nor with the proper notice served on them, in failing to repair "the common fencing here on the Island of Manhattans, conjointly," so that the cattle belonging to them and others may not escape and be lost. The defendants are fined, except Vander Linde, who is an "old man" and has been excused before from making or repairing the common fencing. —Rec. N. Am., I: 22-21.

28 The city court of New Amsterdam resolves to propose to the council the raising of funds for the city's needs, by a tax for stamping and marking weights and measures; also that each tavern-keeper be obliged to take out quarterly a license, and pay therefore six guilders. The consideration of this proposal was renewed, on July 5, when it was signed; but it did not induce authorization from the council.—Rec. N. Am., I: 327-28. The burgomasters and schepens, therefore, renewed their petition, on Jan. 17, 1656, and urged approval of this proposal, to which Stuyvesant and the council assented on the 18th.—Ibid., II: 15-165; Col. Hist. MSS. Dutch, 158.

July Stuyvesant returns from his visit to the West Indies, where he failed to open up trade relations with the English.—Broedhead, op. cit., II: 625. See Dec. 24, 1654.

19 The burgomasters and schepens resolve that, "whereas it is at present the Dogdays," no ordinary session or court shall be held "during the said Dogdays."—Rec. N. Am., I: 333.

27 The Jews of New Amsterdam petition Stuyvesant "to be permitted to purchase a burying place for their nation." The council consulted the request and voted that, as there are no deaths and henceto no immediate need of a place, a grant of land belonging to the company will be made to them when "the need and occasion therefor" arises, especially as the Jews intimate that they do not wish to bury their dead in the common burying-ground.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 150; Oppenheim, Early Hist. of Jews in N. Y., 75. The Jews renewed the request on Feb. 3, 1656 (q.v.). Resolutions were passed by the directors at Amsterdam, on Nov. 6, 1654, granting to two private traders permission to sail in their ship, the "Wittepaert," from Holland "to the coast of Africa and trade there for negro slaves to carry to New Netherland and sell to the inhabitants," which is done, they say, "in consideration of the promotion of population and agriculture in New Netherland."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 704-5. This vessel arrived at New Amsterdam in the summer of 1655, and these "Negroes lately arrived ... from the Gulf of Guinea" were taken for the purpose of making negroes of them, as was stated before; and the council, on the 22nd of July, declared that they had been "carried and exported hence" without the company or the inhabitants of the province "having derived any revenue or benefit thereby." On this account, the edict provided, there should be paid a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem, on all negroes "carried or exported" from the province; which resolution of the council was referred to the N. Neth. Co. and the N. Neth., 191. This was, apparently, the first cargo of negro slaves imported directly into New Netherland from Africa. See also April 4, 1652.

17 The burgomasters and schepens assemble this day to open a certain letter received by the Ship "de Waecht" (the Balance) of Amsterdam from the directors and dated May 26 of this year, which is read by the secretary. In this letter, the directors complain of the failure of the city to provide subsidies for the defending of the common burdons of government, which, they say, is "contrary to the will of all well-regulated countries and cities, and in especial opposition to the government of this city." They urge that, "in this present conjunction of time and circumstances," a further delay cannot be borne; that they have considered the necessity of securing means, and, therefore, have resolved upon the following taxes, viz.;—ten stuivers on each morgen of land, per acre and half per acre for each house, of house hold; the twenta penny, yearly, from the rent of houses. They also conclude to return the excise revenues to "the general treasury of the Company."—Rec. N. Am. I: 340-41.

25 This day is set apart by proclamation of Stuyvesant and the council as a day of general fasting, thanksgiving, and prayer, for invoking the divine blessing on the coming Dutch expedition from New Amsterdam against the Swedes on the Delaware.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XII: 91-92. The proclamation was published by the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam "from the City Hall after previous ringings of the bell," on the 20th. All common business, "such as ploughing, sowing, moving, fishing, hunting, ever as well as all games of tennis, ballplaying, tapping and drink ing," were forbidden on this fast day, "on pain of arbitrary correction."—Rec. N. Am., I: 342-44. See Sept. 5.

The captains and officers of the train-bands of New Amsterdam having asked Stuyvesant and the council "whether the Jewish people" who reside in the city shall also "train and mount guard with the Citizens' bands," after consideration, the council declares that "the said nation" is "not admitted or counted among the citizens" for such purposes in old Amsterdam or any other city in Holland, and that for this and other reasons they exempt them from military service in New Netherland, subjecting, however, all male Jews between sixteen and sixty years to a monthly tax, in lieu of service, and in consideration of the exemption.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XII: 96; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 191-92. On Nov. 5, the council heard a petition from Jacob Barsimmon and Aszer Levy, two Jews, asking for leave to stand guard with otherburghers of the city or else to be relieved from the tax, "as they must earn their living by manual labor." This request was refused, but consent was given to them "to depart whenever and whether they wished."—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 155, translated in full in Oppenheim's Early Hist. of Jews in N. Y., 15. It is evident, however, that Levy was allowed to keep "watch and ward" (rechts en waag) before May 1649, when he made the fact the ground of his application for admission as a burgher of the city.—Rec. N. Am., VIII: 154. Cf. Oppenheim, op. cit., 12-25, 35.

28 The council orders the enrollment into the militia companies of New Amsterdam of all persons who live by sailing sweeps up and down the river, and who have no fixed place of residence in the town.—Dutch, 1654, 1655.

On this day (Sunday), "after the sermon," the squadron of seven vessels, with a force on board of between 600 and 700 men, sets sail for the South River, against the Swedes. Stuyvesant is in command, accompanied by Vice-Director De Sille and Domine Megapolensies. On Sept. 11, they secured, without firing a gun, the capitulation of Fort Casimir, which the Swedes had held since June 1, 1654 (q.v.).—Broedhead, op. cit., I: 604. On Sept. 25, the Swedish Fort Christina surrendered.—Ibid., II: 605. For fuller treatment of this subject, with different dating of the above events, see Johnson, Dutch Settlements on the Delaware, II: Chap. 47; N. Y. Col. Doc., XII: 91-97.

The Indians make an unexpected attack on Manhattan and its environs, murdering and robbing the people and burning their property.—Rec. N. Am., I: 355; N. Y. Col. Doc., XII: 96. It was an act of vengeance, due to the suspended schout-fiscal, Van Heer经查, killing a man and a negro.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 191. This was, apparently, the first cargo of negro slaves imported directly into New Netherland from Africa. See also April 4, 1652.

To protect Stuyvesant's bouwery on Manhattan Island, during the Indian uprising at this time, some Frenchmen are hired by Cornelis Aertsen, by order of the company's fiscal, to remain on the property with him. Stuyvesant is absent on his expedition against the Swedes on the Delaware.—Rec. N. Am., II: 50-51. See March 6 and May 1, 1656, for similar Sentiments on the Delaware, II: Chap. 47; N. Y. Col. Doc., XII: 91-97.

The provincial council writes to Stuyvesant on the Delaware, informing him of the Indian depredations at Manhattan and its environs, thus: "Madame, your Honor's wife, with her whole family and all those, in whom your Honor and she are concerned, are as well. As the citizens of the other provinces, are unwilling to give other people's houses far from the Manhattans, we have, with her advice, hired 10 Frenchmen, to protect your Honor's bouwery on the Manhattans, subject to your Honor's pleasure. We'll keep as good watch as possible, and expect your Honor's speedy return, for to lie in the fort night and day with the citizens, has its difficulties, as they cannot be considered like soldiers. We had much (more) to say, but not to grieve your Honor any more, we will be silent, till another occasion, about the great murder of 100 men in 9 hours; all the country-people are flying, except those of the

All of the assessments were not readily collected, so the burgomasters, as treasurers of the city, on Feb. 1, 1656, appealed anew to the council for power to collect them; whereupon the council referred them to a committee. The committee, after a year, as a sufficient warrant of authority.—Ibid., 159. Debts incurred for the planks were being liquidated by the city in the autumn of 1656 (Rec. N. Am., I: 165, 168, 174, 182); but, as late as Nov. 7 of that year, the city authorities said, when writing to the directors at Amsterdam, that "not one third part" of the assessment had been paid, "through inability of the Commonalty." (Ibid., II: 218).

The directors at Amsterdam again try to regulate the collection and transmission of the mails.—See summary under Aug. 6, 1652.

Orders are issued for the guard duties of the garrison.—See July 28, 1653.

The director-general and council daily hear great complaints that "posts, rails, clapboards and other parts of the fences, put up around sown fields and gardens" are being stolen day and night. They now order that anyone who wholly or partly strips any planted land of any of these protections shall be "whipped and branded for the first offence," and (for a further offence?) "punished with the rope until death." Anyone reporting the offence shall be rewarded and his name concealed.—Rec. N. Am., I: 42-43. For earlier provisions, see Dec. 31, 1654. This ordinance was reiterated Apr. 20, 1659, and Aug. 7, 1659.

A general summons is levied to pay the city's debts.—Rec. N. Am., I: 366-75. For subsequent developments, see March 8, 1657.

An express having been sent to the South River to call the energetic director (Stuyvesant) home to New Amsterdam, he returns to revive the spirits of the colonists, among whom consternation had spread on account of the recent depredations of the Indians (see Sept. 15). See Oct. 7.

During "these dangerous times" of Indian depredations, some of the inhabitants have not hesitated "to go into the Country in small parties, or when going out in stronger force, to separate from each other." Through this exposure, some people, caught off their guard, have been taken captive, whilst others have been killed by the Indians. To prevent this state of affairs, Stuyvesant and the council decree that nobody shall attempt "to go inland" without a pass from them, and that, when permission has been obtained by a party, no member shall run off or become separated from his associates. Those who act contrary to order are, if taken captive, to pay their own ransom.

The burgomasters write to Stuyvesant and the council that they find, by daily experience and petitions presented to them, that there are in the city widows and orphans for whom they deem it necessary that proper provision be made, "in order that they and their property and effects" may "be properly employed and administered." They request, therefore, the commissioning of certain persons who may attend to that duty, "as Orphan Masters." At the same time, they submit four names to the council, out of which two are to be designated. Stuyvesant and the council, Pieter Wolhout, Berthold Ziehov, and Pieter Cornelissen van Veen, on the 19th, "to take charge, in the aforesaid office of the Estate of the widows and orphans in communication with and after instructions from the Burgomasters."—Rec. N. Am., I: 389; Cul. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 155. The appointees served as overseers of orphans, and the two burgomasters continued to sit as judges of the orphans' court, until an independent court, in the nature of a surrogate's court, was created on Feb. 25, 1656 (p. 2.—Rec. N. Am., II: 44-45. The minutes of the court, from 1655, were translated and edited by Berthold Fornow, in two volumes, for which see the Bibliography, Vol. V. On Nov. 29, Jacob Kap was appointed vendor master of public auctioneer to the court of orphan-masters.—Cul. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 155.

Many people have been taken captive during the past month by the Indians in their depredations. Some persons, "by going backward and forward to the Indians," are responsible for the circulation of false reports, both among the whites and the Indians, for which reason Stuyvesant and the council now forbid any further communication of this kind. Whenever a boat is despatched by the government "to have a talk with the Indians about the ravaging of Frenzouns," on its return, the anxious inhabitants of the shore of the North River (very likely the Batavia Path), and by "uneasiness clamor" alarm the Indians and create an unfavourable suspicion, so that they "will not come over to speak with the Director General and Council." A stop is put to this curiosity by an ordinance. Those who are "found in or about the streets" whenever "the General's road is confined," are "to be arrested in their returns, or when any Indians come over to the city, to be arrested by the military and confined, and parents are particularly admonished to inform their children hereof."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 200-1; Cul. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 152, 153.

Commissioners appointed by Stuyvesant, in the name of the Honourable Directors of the West India Company on the one part, and Capt. Thomas Willett, of Plymouth in New England, merchant, on the other part," cause to be recorded at the provincial secretary's office a bill of sale to Willett of the ship "Abraham's Sacrifice," for 3,556 guilders, "payable in good beef and pork, to wit, the fresh unsalted beef and pork to be delivered at the Batters clean on the hook at three stevers and a half the pound, or beef; and the pound of good pork at four and a half stevers; the salt beef in barrels, four stevers, the salt pork in barrels five stevers; it being understood that the half of the purchase money must be paid in the above-mentioned provisions, all in good condition, previous to this winter, and the other half in the spring in the month of April [1656]. . . . It is also agreed that the Prince's flag shall be retained by the Company, on condition that so much bunting shall be delivered to Mr. Willett as is necessary to make an English flag."—Recev'd N. Neth. (O'Callaghan's trans.), III: 138 (N. Y. State Library).

Hage Bruynsen, in an action against a skipper in the court of burgomasters and schepens, charges him with taking away "certain stones, which he drew and had before his door [Pearl St., north of
I hope that the honorable Estimable Gentlemen will now at least open their eyes and not place any more confidence in the flattering letters. We have been, as you will perceive from the general letter and the journal of the first of September, at the South River, where we have captured the forts-nesse Casemir and Christiana from the Swedes without any combat or firing a shot. While lying before Christin, we received letters, that at the Manates some hundreds of savages came, who were inquiring there by murdering, setting fire, and taking captives, so that the General departed from us on the 29th with the small vessels for New Amsterdam in New Netherlands, leaving me behind with Captain Conjnx to regulate everything at the South that was required for the repair of Fort Casemir, as you will be more explicitly informed by the journal. In consequence thereof, I arrived here only on Friday night, the 22d of October, finding everything in a bad condition, the houses on Staten Island all burned down, also those at Pavenia, with some others, more than 100 dead and many prisoners, who are daily ransomed by us. There were ten nations of savages and only a little over sixty of them were killed, the others still use menacing threats, lying in the environs of Manathes, but we have invited their chiefs to visit us, who have promised to come and reach an agreement. The community and all the householders who have sought refuge here, call for revenge and murder against the fiscal and two or three others, whom they loudly proclaim by name to have been the only causes of the attack. The General is not praised, because he does not investigate, but upholds, as it appears, the fiscal; does not lend much ear to the complainants, and when I say anything, or make inquiry, or want to do something, nobody pays attention to me. Everything happened in my absence, so that I do not know how many continued here any longer, as all is to be bittelie me, for the wagon does not go straight, everyone follows his own counsel; the General and the fiscal act together, but it make appear before everybody as if they were great enemies. La Montagne is also in the cabal. The people want to go to Holanda with the forts depart with the stranded ships and in the order; therefore it is now my humble request that you will show yourself favorable toward me. Whereas, when I propose something, or should do something, they will not give me instructions by which I can act or give orders, as has already happened when the General went to Curacao, and other times. Neither will he [Stuyvesant] give me orders, saying, 'do as you please;' and he takes me all over with him, wherever he goes, which I neither will nor can refuse him, though it is highly necessary that one of us always remain here to keep everything in good order, as I have proposed several times; but was answered: 'Have you any writing or authorization for that?' And, perhaps, had either one of us remained here, this [Indian depredation] would not have happened. And what has been done at the South River, Captain Conjnx and I could easily have accomplished. But if I have to go along with one or the other, then the one who remains can play his part, and they understand each other. For this reason I have requested before an Act or authorization from the Honorable Lords Directors with which they did not comply, hence I prefer to you the following request, if you think it advisable, to present it to the meeting, and to support the same, that I may have something written here by virtue of the same. In case those two [Stuyvesant and Van Tienhoven] should be continued in their offices. If not, as we hope, that a General be sent who is not selfish, and no untutored fiscal, and also another able councilor; because I and La Montagne have only two votes, and the Director and the fiscal have three together, so we are obliged to follow them whether right or wrong, whether it be to the profit or loss of the Company, and, therefore, everything cannot go well here; but I fear an evil and short end. I have also been written about these matters to Messrs. van Beeck and Man, and have learned that my correspondence was not very acceptable to their Honors. But I protest before God and the world, that if no alteration takes place in this matter, that I cannot perform my duties with a good conscience, for, moreover, everything is going to ruin here. I would write more, but you and the honorable Lords Directors will be fully able to read in the general letter and the journal, and the accompanying affidavits, about what has passed here. I also think it advisable, that the passagiers and the few people, who now go over here, should in particular, be examined; because they were all present and under arms. Then the Honorable Lords will speedily discover the reason and know the cause through which these disasters have fallen us.

"Now ending with this, I commend you and all friends to the protection of the Almighty and recommending myself to your good graces, I remain, Sir, "Your Honor's obliging servant, Councillor Nicauis de Sille"

"From Amsterdam in New Netherland, the 27 Oct. 1655.
Goody.

Stuyvesant addresses a confidential letter to the directors at Amsterdam, the text of which has not been known hitherto, although there is a contemporary copy in N. Neth. Papiers, No. 1225 (i), in the New Y. P. Library. No text of an answer from the directors is known to be extant. A digest is given here of the most important items in Stuyvesant's letter, viz: He says he returned from Curacao to "Mannades," on July 10, in the ship "De Liefde;" Councillor Nicauis de Sille not a trustworthy man; exploit on South (Delaware) River, against Swedes; and account of expedition to be had from his journal and general missives sent over to directors; has no confidence in Johan de la Montagne; blames massacres by Indians on officials of New Netherlands; 28 bouses destroyed, 12,000 shecels of corn (grain) burned, 40 Christians massacred; and about 100 captured, mostly women and children; his opinion, that firm peace with Indians is best thing; that they be kept from coming into any village or place with arms (guns); that they be obliged to deliver up murderers to be punished; that drunken Indians be kept in prison; that when animals are killed by them, they should be made to pay for them; refers to swearing, drinking, and profanations of the Indians; if any follow me cautiously with English, offensive and defensive; separate country dwellings not yet close to one another; commonalty want revenge against Indians; Fiscal Cornelis van Tienhoven hated, and even English speak against him; Vice-Director Mathys Bex, of Curacao, could be trusted; he found ships because there was no one to make up or fill them; he has many fine credentials from Reuf, and later of Stara, where he had been director; former Fiscal Van Dijck charged with beasting an Indian to death, and selling much brandy to Indians, making them drunk; Cornelis Jacobsen Steenwyck sent to Amsterdam with commission to do and adjust everything as instructed on behalf of New Netherland.

Stuyvesant and the council address a general missive to the directors at Amsterdam, the text of which also, has not been known hitherto, although a contemporary extract exists in N. Neth. Papiers, No. 1225 (ii), in the New Y. P. Lib., and the answer of the directors is printed in N. T. Col. Doc. XIII: 63-64; XIV: 130 ff. On account of the importance of this item, the principal parts are here summarized, with more or less particularity, viz: Letters relating to the sale and delivery of the lands on the South (Delaware) River were all sent over to Amsterdam by the ships "Vokomen" and "Waertberth," in 1653; all old and new documents obtainable to be sent in best form by the ship "Nieu Amsterdam;" but former Director-Gen. Kieft took away many of them; treaty of Hartford, 1650; usurpation of "Meer Pels" (Thomas Pell) of the land called Veeland; and other English interlopers; English claim the West India Co. had only a limited "Octroy," but this declared to be untrue, the company had an enduring right for all time from the states-general; concerning the levying of a subsidy on the commonalty of New Netherland, they promise that advice will be sent by the ships "Wag" and "Bontecoek;" Jewish freedom considered very dangerous, since Christians were hindered in trading, and freedom granted to them made it impossible to refuse it to also to Lutherans and Papists; little obtained from the commonalty for expenses against the English in the late war, or against the Swedes; or for trading with planks; Indians burned 28 bouweries and 10,000 schepens of corn; changes made in the ground-briefs to be sent to the directors; revenues from land, beer, and wine; revenues of New Amsterdam countermanded by the company; income, in 1653, was 22 to 23 thousand guilders, but now greatly reduced and expenses heavy, a pertinent financial report now impossible, yet to be sent by the ship “Waag” for each year, if Carel van Bruggen, the bookkeeper, does not prove dextrous; full report of the exploit at the South (Delaware) River sent in enclosure No. 15; principal land conveyances and copies of particular acts to be sent over; Indian deeds and conveyances; Indians sell as often as they secure buyers; Dutch rights against Swedes over the South River to be sustained, and Dutch argument based upon prior possession, since they had there three fortresses, in the north, in the middle, and above on the river, in 1655 and 1656, together with a trading-house surrounded by palisades, etc., although afterwards deserted, and later in 1659, bought and fortified at the mouth of the river, about the Horckill on the land of Swaveland; and, again, in 1651, Fort Nassau was laid out in the middle of the river, being five or six years before ever the Swedes came on this river; copies of lands bought from Blendon, Midwoot, etc., cannot be properly minded at town clerk’s, or leave of Privy Forests; preacher at Tamaria, in Brazil, known to all, and he was minded to go to Holland in the “Waag,” so that these villages might learn who was to be their teacher; change in ships’ recognizances from 16 to 10 per cent. not conducive to trade; conditions on the Delaware; letter from Stockholm reveals that a Swedish ship lay ready to come over to negotiate with the Swedes or other merchants; preachers, minister at Breuckelen, appointed to the service of the company, and to go to the defense of the Delaware; magistrates of New Amsterdam require excise collected in New Netherland and loans of Le Bleu which were sent from Holland; many passengers held back when ship “Nieu Amsterdam” sailed, and some protested; complaint against “skootten” (traders) who sell to Indians, to the damage of regular merchants; no firelocks (“Snaphaenen”) to be used unless 1½ feet long; surgery-barbers needed for Curacao, Delaware River, and other places; sending remonstrance on account of depressed state of the company; sending Cornelis Jacobsen Steen- wink, who will be punishable by Burgomaster before the court, authorizing him to remonstrate everywhere by word of mouth.

The Treaty of Westminster is signed by England and France.

England is left in possession of Acadia.—Winson, IV: 145; VII: 476.

Cromwell declares war on Spain; the war continued until 1659.

Notwithstanding the repeated publication of ordinances prohibiting the running at large of goats, some of the inhabitants still allow their goats to come within the city limits. The “loud complaints” of the burgurers to Stuyvesant and the council, that these animals are destroying gardens, cornfields, fruit-trees and other trees in their rampage, induce them to renew the former prohibitions, and to demand that all goats be “kept hendered beyond or across the Fresh Water,” and at night be shut up in a barn or stable, on pain of forfeiture if found south of the Fresh Water, for the benefit of the poor.—Lent & Ord. N. Neth., 201-2.

Stuyvesant addresses a particular letter to the directors at Amsterdam on the 15th of Jan.: “In the presence of his excellency, there is a contemporary extract in N. Neth. Papers, No. 1225(3), in the N. Y. Pub. Library. The most important items are digested here, viz: Complaint against the secrecy of the directors at Amsterdam; Indians in New Netherland are stirred up by the Dutch themselves; the whole £60,000 of capitation, or for surrender of territory, hindered; Councillor La Montagne is a bad instrument—a snake barbourized in the bosom of the colony; La Montagne’s “mix up” with the Swedes after the capitulation; La Montagne went to church, and, on the way, in the presence of Fiscal Thiembouren, Capt. Cregier, Lieut. Newton, and Secretary Van Ruyten, upriver Mountaine’s house, and, aforesaid, La Montagne, who recommends keeping a watchful eye on the Swedes, etc; handmaids wanted to equip the burgurers (oeykeluden), also 200 soldiers capable of guarding all Swedish commander, Ruying, gone to Sweden, via England; he requested passage money and was given 200 pounds, Flemish, to be returned in six mouths, etc; transport of well soldiers to Sweden.

The N.Y. Delmar writes: “On petition the burgomasters and schepens for permission to "tack and to keep taverns and lodgings," pleasing misfortune, he having been driven away from his place by Indian troubles, and his property having been burnt and lost. Granted.—Rec. N. Am., i: 393. This seems to refer to Nicolaas Jansen, baker, who, on May 15, 1656 (p. e.), received a ground-brief for a lot near Pearl St., between Whitehall and Broad St.—See Castello Plan, II: 268; and Dutch Grants, II: 386.

On account of "divers petitions" presented to the burgomasters and schepens "by refugees and others" who are inclined to settle in New Amsterdam, and who have requested "small lots in the city, on which each, according to his ability," may erect a house, the board has presented the matter orally to Stuyvesant, who answered that "a proper survey must be first made." They now apply to the council, requesting cooperation and the commissioning of suitable persons to make the survey. Stuyvesant and the council reply the same day; adjudge "the survey particularly necessary," and appoint Johannes La Montagne, councillor, and Allard Anthony, burgomaster, together with the regular fence viewers or city surveyors, "to advance the desired survey," as they judge fit, "without any regard to persons, gardens or places," in order that settlers may have proof and evidence of their lands. If it is found that the survey happens "to run through any person's garden," the surveyors are "specially authorized to value, in the readiest and most reasonable manner, the lots coming, according to the aforesaid survey, on the ground already disposed of, only leaving the approval thereof to the knowledge and advice of the Director General and Council."—Rec. N. Am., i: 393-94. Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 155. This resulted in the making of a survey of the city, which "survey and plot map of New Amsterdam," according to which the streets were staked out, was confirmed and approved by the council on Feb. 25, 1656 (e. d.).—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 164; Rec. N. Am., i: 395. This is the earliest plan of the city of which we have any knowledge. It may have been made by Frederick de Konings.—See Lost Maps, II: 165.

Stuyvesant recommends that "no Indian, coming to any place, village or hut, shall be allowed to remain there over night, except in a special place, to be fixed upon for that purpose according to the localities of the villages," and "that no Indian with any kind of arms shall be allowed to come into any place or hamlet on the penalty of being seized and forfeiting the arms, which he has with him." He also decrees that the sale to any Indian of strong drink shall be punished with confiscation and imprisonment of the drunken Indian "until he shall have told, from whom he has received the liquor."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 53-54.

An important recommendation is made by Stuyvesant to his council with respect to having fixed places for trading with the Indians. He says: "We ought to endeavour with all possible smoothness to bulk the Indians in the use of their guns and ammunition; to accomplish which, it is, I believe, necessary, to prohibit generally, that anybody should trade and negotiate with the Indians except upon a certain place, to be determined upon, and further to forbid, that any gun or locksmith shall repair any lock or make a new one, except upon the showing of a note with our seal, in which the name, for whom, is stated and that then the gun shall be marked or branded and a record kept of them."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 54. See Nov. 27, 1655, for De Sille's opinion. Another time Stuyvesant suggests to his council that upon their recommendation no separate bouweries or plantations shall be made, but that the out-lying farmers shall be compelled to draw together their deserted houses, and henceforth no one he allowed to settle in the open country, except in clusters of at least 10, 12 or 16 families, closed close together, at the place of entry, and hindered by him and the council, or their deputies, and "that henceforward nobody is allowed to live on the separate places, which have been either burned or deserted" during the late Indian depredations. He also suggests that "on the occasion of forming new villages and hamlets a blockhouse shall be built for logs for a certain and the sake of the inmates."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 53.

As there is some sentiment for beginning another Indian war, Stuyvesant tells the council why he thinks the time not propitious.
Where it is suggested that some Indians might be captured, in order to exchange them for Christians held in captivity, Stuyvesant declares that it is "too dangerous for the present and impracticable besides." He adds: "I say too dangerous, because new occasion might thereby be given to the savage tribes either to murder the captives and/or to carry them off further inland, without hope of ransom and I value the blood of one captured Christian more than 100 Indians."

He thinks it better to get back the captives from the Indians "by the friendliest means, even if it were by giving some contraband articles as presents."—N. Y. Col. Doc. XII: 52-53, 54. See also Brodhead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 606-11.

Secretary Van Tienhoven, in reply to Stuyvesant's proposals of November 10 (g. t.), says, that, "after a general peace had been concluded with the natives in August 1645, the peace and the articles of the treaty have been infringed and broken as follows: First in killing 14 Christians since August 1645 (up to 15th Septbr 1645) at different places and at various times, for which we have never been able to get justice done, much less satisfaction, notwithstanding we asked for it in accordance with the treaty, but on the contrary they have fooled us with lies and false reports."

He says: "The Indians have been violent and broken the treaty of peace in an outrageous manner in this city [New Amsterdam] on the 15th of September last, as follows: In that they landed very early on the rivershore within the city-walls from 64 canoes about 500 men, all in arms, without having given previous notice of it, and that they immediately upon their arrival, almost before any citizens were on hand, ran in large crowds of armed men through the streets, breaking forcibly into the house of Mr. [Isaac] Allerton, bursting off the lock of the door, threatening and beating the people; that they noisily searched the house under the pretext of making for Northern Indians, as they did in many houses in this city, until upon the complaints of the inhabitants, and to avoid further troubles, they were driven from the High Street [Hoogh Straet, now Stone St.] to the banks of the North river, where their canoes laid [sic] and they had landed in the morning."

While he desired that different tribes be asked in a friendly manner "to appear at the Council-chamber in the fort, which they did. Here they were asked by the councillors, "in the presence of the Burgomasters, Scheepers, citizens and military officers, for the reasons of their coming thus armed" and molesting the people. The council and city authorities thereupon requested that in the interest of mutual safety "and to prevent mischief and trouble the savages should remove themselves from this island [of Manhattan] to Noten Island [now Governors Island], which they promised and then took their departure."

But "instead of leaving, as they had promised, they joined in the evening, they then, more they shot after guard-mounting Hendrick van Dyck, the former Fiscal, with an arrow into the breast and threatened to kill Paulus Leendertzen [vander Griff], Captain of the train-band, with an arrow." This led to the cry of "Murder, murder, the savages kill the Dutch," and "by this dismal cry the citizens, standing under arms in the fort, to keep good watch, were thrown rather into confusion and hastened without any order through the gates and over the walls, so that they came in conflict with the savages, who were prepared, on the strand. Two Dutchmen were killed and three wounding three savages remained dead on the strand, where they were found (afterwards). After this rencontre had taken place the savages went over the river and elsewhere and burned during the night many houses, murdered and captured Christians, killed cattle, and a few days later cleared Staten-Island people and houses."

This action was "contrary to the articles of peace, made in the year 1645, whereby it was expressly stipulated, that if reciprocally on one or the other side one or more persons had been killed or murdered, no general war should therefore immediately be begun, but that the injured party should make its complaints to the chiefs or magnates of the one, who had offending justice might be meted out to the malefactor, according to circumstances." Van Tienhoven gave judgment that it was "just and righteouse to make war on the Indians for the breaking of the treaty and their fearful misdeeds." He believed it was necessary to reduce it in some submission. If it was already to March he considered it not feasible; therefore he recommended that authority to begin war be secured from the superiors in Amsterdam, and that in the meantime they should "dissimulat, Novbr, though it be unpleasant, and if possible not spare some small presents, in order to bring the savages to a truce, without making an absolute compact, and help the captives" in the hands of the Indians. He also urged preparedness, by placing the villages "on a day awaiting this and the guards and watch from Holland. Without such reinforcement from abroad, he said, he did not believe a war could, "humanely speaking, be brought to a desirable end."

This opinion Van Tienhoven wrote out on the 14th, but "Delivered the 29th Novbr 1645."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 56-57. See also Sept 15, 1645.

The selection of the tapsters' excise on wine and beer consumed in New Amsterdam, for one year from date, at 5,950 guilders, payable in quarterly instalments. The excise rates are fixed by the provincial council.—Rec. N. Am., I: 18-19, 419-21.

At some time prior to this year, Oloff Stevensen van Cortlandt's brewery was erected, as indicated by a reference in Rec. N. Am., I: 234. It covered the site of Nos. 11-13 Stone St.—See Castello Plan, II: 251-52; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 963.

Prior to this year, a horse-mill was erected for Jacob Wolphertse van der Donk, and the rear of what is now 41 Stone St. It was demolished in 1660.—See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 961. See also Dec. 20, 1656.

About this year, Hans Deeper opened a tavern at the present intersection of Pearl, Bridge, and Broad St., where the Bush Terminal building now stands. It was discontinued in 1666.—See Castello Plan, II: 269; and Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 978.

In this year, Charles II, while in exile, was invited to join the colony of Virginia, and be its king. This incident suggested the title of "The Old Dominion." From this year to 1659 England was at war with Spain, caused by English aggression on the sea.—See Oct. 16, 1655.

In this year, Domine Johannes Megapolensius erected a house upon his grant (Liber Deeds, A: 27), the site being that of the present Nos. 9 and 11 Broadway. Balthazar Bayard acquired the house in 1674.—Orig. Book of N. T. Deeds, 1677-1675, in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collected MSS., Dan. Copy (1913), 52-53. Augustus Joy subsequently erected a substantial mansion upon the same ground; and here, also, for many years, the Atlantic Garden stood, one of the famous taverns and places of resort in the early nineteenth century.—See June 2, 1710; Pl. 56, and Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 950-51, 976, and Pl. 147, Vol. III. Valentine is in error in stating (Man. Gan. Coun., 1854, pp. 442-45; ibid., 1858, opp. p. 558; and ibid., 1866, pp. 554-55) that the Kings Arms Tavern, or "Burns' Coffee House," stood on this site.—See "Atlantic Garden" and "King's Arms Tavern" in Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 976, 979.

New Amsterdam contained, in 1656, when first surveyed, probably by Capt. De Kommand (see Nov. 10, 1655), 120 houses, and 1,000 souls.—O'Callaghan, Hist. of New Neth. (1843), II: 450.

The receipts of the West India Co. from recognizances and convos of ships to and from New Netherland, a total of eight ships, were 24, 62,144 florins.—N. Neth. Papers, No. 1220, op. cit.

Stuyvesant's office at 6, Dec. 1656 (c. 2.) to the directors of the West India Co., said: "We thought it advisable to send you also a small sketch of the city, drawn in perspective by Sieur Augustin Heermans three or four years ago," etc. This view, which may be the one from which the original of Pl. 6, Vol. I, was engraved, was therefore probably drawn in this or the following year.

"Stuyvesant's Code of Laws is published in London. These laws are usually called the "Blue Laws of Connecticut."—Winsor, III: 371-75.

Megalopolis and Disius, the two Dutch clergymen of New Amsterdam, petition Stuyvesant and the council against the holding of "convincetings and gatherings" at Middelburg (Newtown, L.I.), by "some inhabitants and unqualified persons," who presume "to teach the Gospel," whereupon, an order is made in council that "placets" shall be issued against the practice.—Rec. N. Col. Docs., XIV: 335-37.

Among certain questions which Stuyvesant submits to his council for solution is one "whether it is not necessary, to make a general monthly muster of all men, able to bear arms, in each village or hamlet, to find out how they are armed and to take and list them, in order to prevent the selling or destroying of the arms," the council resolves, thereupon, that the magistrates of each village be directed "to make inquiries in private, what arms the people in their jurisdiction had and to report thereon to the high Council."—N. T. Col. Docs., XIII: 59. See also Nov. 10, 1655.

The isolation of the country people from one another has resulted to "many murders of People, killing and destruction of Cattle, and burning of Houses" by Indian incursions. This was particularly true during the Indian uprising of Sept., 1653. Stuyvesant and the council now declare that the inhabitants ought to profit from these sad experiences, and "form compact dwellings in suitable places," so that the government can assist and maintain its subjects. A provincial ordinance is, therefore, promulgated by them, commanding the scattered inhabitants "to concentrate themselves, in the form of Towns, Villages, and Hamlets," and declaring that those who remain thereafter "on their isolated plantations," will "do so at their peril without obtaining, in time of need, any assistance," and that they will "moreover be fined annually in the sum of 25 guilders for the benefit of the public."—Laws & Ord. of N. Neth., 1656-75, Rec. N. Am., I: 19-20; II: 17-18. See also Feb. 9, 1660.

The election of burgomasters and schepens took place annually, on Candlemas Day (Feb. 2). Until now, they were named and appointed solely by the director-general and council. A new election being near at hand, the ruling burgomasters and schepens now petitioned for the privilege to "nominate a double number of the new incoming Burgomasters and Schepens," from which the director-general and council can "at the usual time . . . select and confirm a single number." The request to nominate is at once granted, yet with a proviso that "no opponents" of the supreme government shall be included, and with a reservation that if the supreme authority chooses it can "commission any person . . . whom the nomination" suits.—Rec. N. Am., II: 16-17; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 158. On Jan. 21, Cornelis van Tienhoven, the schout, proposed "that a day be fixed for assembling," in order to make the nominations, and that, meanwhile, "each burgomaster do take out a nomination without communicating to the same anybody else." Accordingly, the board met on the 31st, certified a double number of nominees, and requested Stuyvesant and the council to "be pleased to elect from them the wisest, most intelligent and best qualified." On Feb. 2, Stuyvesant and the council resolved, "for pregnant reasons moving them hereunto, . . . to continue for another year the Burgomasters and Schepens at present in office for the sake of peace and harmony, for the welfare of this City, and only to supply the two vacancies of Schepens with two other reasonable and proper persons," who were, however, among those that had been certified as nominees.—Rec. N. Am., II: 24-30. See, further, Jan. 30, 1658.

Stuyvesant and the council decree that, "in order to prevent sudden conflagrations" in New Amsterdam, "no houses shall henceforth be roofed with straw or reeds," nor any more chimneys be constructed "of clapboards in the form of Towns, Villages, and required to promulgate the ordinance by placards. This they did on the 20th, "after previous ringing of the bell," at the city hall.—Rec. N. Am., I: 207; II: 18; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 207-8.

On Feb. 26, the burgomasters, realizing from former experience that many houses were negligent in caring for their fires, and remiss in keeping their chimneys clean, from which conflagrations had resulted because "the greater part of the houses" were of wood, "some covered with reed, with wooden and clapboarded chimneys," named fire-warden to inspect without hindrance and at their discretion, "all the houses within the city, and to issue such orders in each place for fire prevention as they judged best, with power to see that these orders were carried out.—Rec. N. Am., II: 44. See also Dec. 15, 1657.
Cows, hogs, and other animals are reported as having been stolen in the meadows, and slaughtered by persons said to be whites, yet who go "under the guise and name of Indians." To avoid this misdemeanor, Stuyvesant and the council, by ordinance, establish an excise on slaughtered cattle, forbidding "every man-/woman or child, within the city of New Amsterdam, or any other Town, Village or Hamlet on the Flatland," unless he is the owner of the cattle. On the 26th, the council makes a provision for the magistrates to collect a fine of 20 dollars for the first offense. On the 28th, the council makes a provision for the magistrates to collect a fine of 20 dollars for the first offense.

On the 19th, an ordinance is passed prohibiting the discharge of firearms in the city without the permission of the mayor and the burgomaster. On the 20th, an ordinance is passed prohibiting the discharge of firearms in the city without the permission of the mayor and the burgomaster.

As Stuyvesant and the council have decided that the preceding burgomaster has changed every three months, "Oldi Stevensen van Cortlandt presides over the court. — Rec. N. Am., II: 30.

"Lodewyck Pos, a burguer of New Amsterdam, is granted permission by the burgomasters and scheepen "to sell wine and beer by the small measure."— Rec. N. Am., II: 33. His place is advantageously situated on a terrace near the roadstead and landing-place at the North River, "in front of the bea-mer's path" (Battery Place), and close to the fort. — See Castello Plan, II: 214-16. Pos later became captain of the watch.—See Nov. 15, 1658.

Michel Jansen, a "farmer and former resident" in New Amsterdam, petitions Stuyvesant and the council for "a lot within the city next to Abraham Clock, 30 to 36 feet wide." He says he has lost his entire savings of seventeen years in New Netherland by the recent Indian depredations, "all of which [at Pavana] has been cruelly burned or taken away" by the Indians, leaving him, his wife, and six children with "no means in this world," and "he desires to gain a living in the city." He is "granted a small lot . . . next to Abraham Martensen Clock, measuring in front and rear 26 to 27 feet and as long as the lot of the said Abraham Clock, provided that the petitioner shall fence the afore- said lot on the rearward toward the street in the same manner as the fencing has been begun on the city-gate." But a memorandum added, states: "The above order was annulled for some reasons on the 15th February 1656 and another lot granted to him."— N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 61. That other lot was on "The Schrijers Hoek." The building now at No. 12 State St. exactly covers the site of his house and tavern.—See Castello Plan, II: 284-85; and Dutch Grants, II: 391. See also Nov. 22, 1655, and Addenda.

In reply to a petition of Van Hoboken, the schoolmaster (see March 23, 1655), for financial assistance, the burgomasters and scheepen direct him to let them know "what he is allowed by each child per quarter, pursuant to the instructions of the Lord General and Council, which being done, further order shall be taken on petitioner's request."— Rec. N. Am., II: 357.

The states-general ratifies the Treaty of Hartford, with respect to the boundary line between the "United English Colonies" and the "Dutch Province of New Netherland," which was agreed to on Sept. 19, 1650 (p. v.).— Laws & Ord. of N. Y., 215, 457; N. Y. Col. Doc., I: 611-12.

Stuyvesant submits to the council proposals urging the providing of ways and means for the support of the government, the balancing of the public accounts, and the conservation of the outlying settlers into villages.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 160. These suggestions seem to have been renewed by him on March 3, when he added another proposal in relation to Indian affairs.—Ibid., 162. See also Laws & Ord. of N. Y., 334-35; Rec. N. Am., II: 22-23; I: 51-53, 60, 154-55.

The Council of July 27, 1655 (p. v.), for a burying-place. The council thereupon instructs Nicolas de Sille and Cornelis van Tienhoven "to point out to the petitioners a little hook of land situate outside of this city for a burial place."—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 160; Oppenheim, Early Hist. of Jews in N. Y., 75-76. The location of this cemetery has been placed near the New Bowery and Chatham Square.—Oppenheim, 13; Daly, Settlement of the Jews in North America (1893), 35-42. See also chapter on "The Dutch Period," I: 60. That the burial-ground here pointed out was made use of, and that it was situated at the above place, said lot on the side of the little hook of land, "is plausible; but there is no record of it other than as above cited. The Jews purchased land in the same locality for a place of interment, in 1618-19, part of which still exists as the oldest burying-ground on Manhattan Island. Singularly enough, its oldest grave-stone bears date of 1652. See Pl. 30, Vol. I; Landmark Ref. Key, III: 927; and Dec. 17, 1729.

The city's fire-warden is appointed. See Dec. 19.

On Jan. 27, Stuyvesant and the council proposed the observance of a general day of fasting and prayer on March 1, on account of "the increasing population, the merciful protection against a dreaded and threatening war with our neighbours [New England] unexpectedly changed into a wished for and acceptable peace," etc. The proclamation recalled the Indian uprising of the previous year, when "many inhabitants" had been "savagely murdered and stripped of property and many houses burned, and the public good . . . retarded." This proclamation was published at the city hall on Feb. 4.—Rec. N. Am., II: 39-42.

The two burgomasters are authorized, after consulting with the captains of the burgier companies, "to cause a corporal's guard, to patrol and look after during Divine Service on Sundays.—Rec. N. Am., II: 51-52.

To prevent the burgiers or others from lodging Indians in their houses over night in the city, the two burgomasters are authorized to prepare ordinances on the subject. At the same time Stuyvesant and the council advise both the burgiers and those who are residents within the jurisdiction of the city government. Four names are submitted by the burgomasters, from whom Stuyvesant and the council elect and confirm Paulus Leendertsen van der Grift and Pieter Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 1615: Min. of Orph. Court, I: 14-15; Rec. N. Am., II: 44-45. See Feb. 10, 1653; Oct. 18, 1655.
Charges have been filed by certain householders of the city Ma., with Stuyvesant and Councilor Nicolas de Sille, which place the responsibility of "the last disaster and Indian Massacre" (Sept., 1655, p.75) upon those who were entrusted with the government during Stuyvesant's absence on his journey to the Cape of Good Hope. The petitioners are allowed to prosecute inquiry for elucidating their charges, and the burgomasters and schepens are instructed to appoint from their own number a commission "to hear and examine the witnesses" to be brought before them. Accordingly Oloff Stevensen van Cortlandt, burgomaster; and John Pietersen, a schepen, are commissioned thereto.—Rec. N. Am., II: 54-55.

The following minute is made in the Register of Resolutions of the directors at Amsterdam, concerning free passage to New Netherland: "Some deliberations having been had concerning the population of New Netherland, it was resolved and approved, that all mechanics and farmers, who can show that they will be able to make a living there, shall receive, with their wives and children, free passage thither—provided that, if they should wish to return here, they shall be obliged to pay double passage, which shall be comminuted to the absent members" (of the chamber).—N. Neth. Papers, No. 1248, in N. Y. Pub. Library.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant and his council, expressing their vexation over the Indian depredations of the previous year, and recommend that "not only the poor prisoners, but also all persons in a suitable manner and returned to their families, but also such precautions may be taken at every instance, that such disasters are not to be feared in the future." Regarding the proposed concentration of the people into villages, they add: "Your Honors' proposition, made for the security of the people in the open country, to settle in some neighbor a road and provide their settlements with some means of defence, sufficient at least against an attack, is not extravagant, we think, and it would seem to be quite advisable, to make a provisional treaty, that the savages must keep away from the places, where our people have settled." They suggest a possible "offensive alliance with the English, for which plans have been made before this." With respect to the "requested subsidy for the suffering and impoverished people," they think "the twentieth penny on the houses and the tenth on the plantations and boweniers, which remained intact," to be a sufficient revenue to be used provisionally for the year, and promise to exert themselves to secure something more than they ask from the city "for the relief of these poor people." To prevent as much as possible the Indians from obtaining arms from the Dutch, "to their own damage," they resolve "that the passengers and free men, who may henceforth go to New-Netherland may be carried from now to take with them a matchlock in place of a flintlock, as may be seen by their passports."—N. T. Col. Docs., XIII: 63-64.

In a letter of this date, the directors at Amsterdam order Stuyvesant and the council to dismiss Cornelis van Tienhoven from all public business by him, and suggest that Nicolas de Sille perform, provisionally, the duties of fiscal. His dismissal was due to a long series of complaints against him. —N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 324. A rumour of his dismissal reached the ears of the burgomasters and schepens on May 30, but as Van Tienhoven was absent on public business at the South (Delsware) River, the city court awaited his return and confirmation thereof. As fiscal he had been also city schout to the city court. He, himself, appeared in that court on June 7 (see summary under May 30), and gave confirmation of his dismissal, which had been ordered formally on that day by Stuyvesant and the council.—Rec. N. Am., II: 108, 109; Council's minutes (N.Y., Dutch, 1657).

On Aug. 1, Johannes Pietersen Verbrugge (or van Brugge), bookkeeper of the company, complained that he could not close his accounts, because the receiver's books were missing, and Stuyvesant and the council addressed a letter to Van Tienhoven, who had been in the office of receiver or the Dutch revenues, in which they ordered him to furnish the books.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 171. As Van Tienhoven abscended, the council ordered the seizure and sealing of all books and papers belonging to him, on Nov. 7.—Ibid., 176.

On Nov. 10, in a new fiscal, De Sille, asked the council for leave to remove the books and papers from the late residence of Van Tienhoven, who, evidently, had committed suicide, since his hat and cane had been found floating on the water; and, on Dec. 21, De Sille applied for permission to seize all of the real and personal property of Van Tienhoven, his wife (Rachel Vigne) was nightly moving goods in baskets from the premises. The council ordered De Sille to take an inventory of the personal effects; but for opposition against the process, the petitioners are allowed to procure inquiry for elucidating their charges, and the burgomasters and schepens are instructed to appoint from their own number a commission "to hear and examine the witnesses" to be brought before them. Accordingly Oloff Stevensen van Cortlandt, burgomaster, and John Pietersen, a schepen, are commissioned thereto.—Rec. N. Am., II: 54-55.

That Jews were not allowed to worship, collectively, in a synagogue shown in New Netherland, and were allowed to worship only during the festivals at Amsterdam to Stuyvesant, as follows: "The permission given to the Jews, to go to New-Netherland and enjoy there the same privileges, as they have here [Amsterdam], has been granted only as far as civil and political rights are concerned, without giving the said Jews a claim to hold a church, or to perform their religious service in a synagogue or at a gathering." This did not preclude them from the exercise of their religion, "in all quietness . . . within their houses."—N. T. Col. Docs., XIV: 341, 351; Oppeinheim, Early Hist. of Jews in N.T., II: 23, 33.

On June 19, Sybaut Claessen, Jacob Steendam, Adolph Pietersen, Sybrant Jansen (also called Galma), Adriaen Blommaert, and Jacob Schellinger (son-in-law of Cornelis Melyn) appeared at the court as neighbours and expressed their unanimous consent to construct the sheet piling before their lots near the City Hall on the Strand," but asked that some provision be made for the work in front of the lot of Jochem Pietersen Kuyter, deceased, as nobody came forward to represent that property. They also asked for a confirmation of the "survey of the slip and their houses and gardens." These petitioners were ordered to proceed with the work, and Secretary [Jacob] Kip, as Vendue Master of the property of the deceased," was instructed to pay the expenses against the Kuyter property's proportion. The street inspectors or city surveyors were ordered "to complete, with all diligence, the survey of the sheet piling shown in a letter from Jacob Schellinger's house, which lay in the canal and on the road," as projected by the survey for public improvements, was not to be proceeded with any further.—Ibid., II: 113.

By Sept. 21 (p.79), the sheet-piling "in front of the City Hall [now St. Paul's] and several of the consents referred to the East River city gate, at Pearl and Wall St.," and at "other places thereabout," was finished.—Ibid., II: 176. On Oct. 2, Claessen was in court as plaintiff against Jansen and Pietersen for having failed to construct and make the sheeting, which they, with him, had undertaken. They were ordered to get to work together by the following Thursday. —Ibid., II: 288. On Oct. 9, these "carpenters of the sheeting before the lot alongside the City Hall" came again into court and requested an order as to "how far" they were to "erect the sheet-piling." The two burgomasters were delegated to make an inspection and dispose of the matter.—Ibid., II: 185. Yet another hatch occurred in the way, and another in the city council requested the magistrates to "signify in what manner the wing on the sheet piling at the Canal" (Graft) should be constructed; whereupon it was ordered that inspection be made the following day, when directions would be given.—Ibid., II: 203.

Although permission was granted by the director of New Amsterdam, the Jews were denied the privilege of residence and trade in New Netherland. They had to reside and trade there, provided they did not become a charge on the Treasury or the West India Co. Stuyvesant and the council refused to permit them to own real estate or to carry on a continuous trade on the South (Delaware) River, at Fort Orange (Albany), and at other places in the province. A committee of the Jews, therefore, on Nov. 29, 1655, petitioned the provincial government not to hinder them in the enjoyment of their guaranteed rights; but, "for weighty reasons," their request was declined. One of the Jewish merchants at New Amsterdam bought a house at public auction, on Dec. 14, 1655, which, "for pregnant reasons," Stuyvesant and the council would not permit the seller to convey. On the other hand, the government levied heavily on the Jews for funds for the public works.

Now (March 14, 1656) the Jews petition anew, recite the limitations imposed on them in 1655, and ask to be taken out of the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities on their previous petition. They declare they are "willing and ready... to contribute according to their means," if they may "enjoy the same liberty allowed to other burgers," in trade and in the purchase of real estate. Stuyvesant and the council seek to evade the undoubted right of them to enjoy these liberties and declare them subject to the tax," because the public works are for "the security of the persons and goods of the inhabitants," including Jews.

In the meantime, the advice of the directors is sought to "the purchase and ownership of real estate" by Jews. The directors, on June 14, 1656, reprimanded Stuyvesant and the council for having forbidden the Jews the open trade and ownership of real property, and ordered execution thereupon "punctually and with more respect." Jews, they said, were not "to establish themselves as mechanics," nor to "have open retail shops." The last prohibition did not stand; such Jewish shops or stores were already in operation at New Amsterdam before the directors wrote, and were allowed to continue.—Texts and translations of original records, in Oppenheim's Early Hist. of Jews in N. T., 9-12; 24, 21,

Dirck Schellinger, a "conceited" high constable, asks the city court for instructions as to the confinement of "persons of quality or of good name and character" who are arrested for debt, and is told to take them to "a decent tavern," if they pay their own expenses, or, "otherwise, to the City Hall."—Rec.

Sarah Schepmoe, widow of Jan Schepmoe, deceased, claims the ownership of a hand-bell (schel) in use by the city court at the "Stadt Huys" or city hall. Having proved ownership, she is granted payment of ten florins ($1.20) for "the bell out of the burgher excuse."—Rec. N. Am., II: 76, revised with Dutch original in office of city clerk, New York. There is no connection here with the bell (blass) which the court voted on Jan. 24, 1656 (p. 94), to be hung on the city hall.

The farming out to the highest bidder of the revenues of the wealth-house in New Amsterdam is considered by Stuyvesant and his council, who, in the by past an ordinance for regulating the were paid and all goods weighing above 25 lbs. are subject to fees.—

The magistrates and people of Gravesend petition Stuyvesant and the council for some ordinance and ammunition to protect the willage, which has been surrounded with palisades; they are granted "two of the pieces lying near the Packhouse on the Strand (Pearl Street) of the East river," as well as some powder and

Some inhabitants of New Amsterdam, whose children and kinder were held by the Indians, petitioned the city court, on March 20, that means be raised "by a general collection or otherwise" for ransoming the captives. The court at that time approved, and recommended the matter for speedy action to Stuyvesant and the council. The latter now order a contribution in cloth to be made by each merchant of the city for this purpose.—Rec. N. Am.,

The determination of matters relating to the carrying out of the new survey of the city having been left to the burgomasters (see Feb. 25, 1656), the two street inspectors now complain to the officials that they are being run "of lots, houses and stoops" in the city without their knowledge, and that a penalty be imposed, to prevent the disorder occasioned thereby.
They also ask for a graded fee for measurements and surveys, on lots, houses, stoops, and fences, respectively.
The burgomasters order them "to pay particular attention, that all building be done in good order according to the last survey convised by the Director General and Council," and no one is to build before these inspectors have been "on the spot." Fees are established as follows: for a door, "or such like," three stuivers (60 cts.); for a house, three guilders ($1.20).—Rec. N.
Am., II: 80-81;

The ordinance for regulating the business of the weigh-house (see May 4, and Aug. 10, 1654) is renewed with amplifications.

Stuyvesant and the council order that the excise be paid in strong wampum, in bundles containing at least 25 or 30 guilders.

The place was devastated by the English, in September, 1654 (p. 95),

Amsterdam. These two now petition the burgomasters and scheeps for permission to conduct taverns in the city, which is granted to them.—Rec. N. Am., II: 93; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 381.

Dirck Thomas Hall and Caspar Herren, or Aertsen, who have been commissioned by Stuyvesant and the council as overseers of fences on Manhattan Island, bring suit against nine persons, because "the common fence" has been out of repair, and has been put in order by them as overseers, for which they want the nine to pay, proportionately, at the rate of "one guider per head of cattle." The Court fixes upon this rate, and the parties, "for the most part," are "willing to pay." Jan Vigne, however, says he has "a private pasture of his own," and so has no use for the common grazing place; but the court holds "that the erected fence" is "for the public advantage," and that those "in default in contributing their share in proportion to their stock," shall be bound to pay the same, etc., "according to valuation," within fourteen days.—
Kes., III: 467.

William Brodkman and Thomas Hall appear in the court in May as plaintiffs against Slipper Lourens Corneliszen Vander Wel and Jacob Schellinger, charging that they have "applied repeatedly to deets to enclose by a common fence their land lying next to theirs, and that they and others" have neglected "to enclose it... whereby they... are... suffering great loss from the cattle to request their crop." The defendants assert that their land is "not under common fence;" claim they obtained from Kieft "a particular ground brief thereof," and are "not bound to make a fence in common." Beckman, as schepen, asks Stuyvesant's advice in the May dispute "regarding a certain parcel of land, about 5 or 6 morgen large, lying within the public Enclosure [the Common] near the Valley, beyond the Fresh Water," where Vander Wel has refused and failed "pro rata to maintain with others the common fence," as he maintains it is in Bible. Stuyvesant, in reply (on the 9th), that "special ground-briefs" were "passed for all lands within the Common Enclosure and even if they were not, and the lands lay within the Common fence, that would excuse no one from maintaining the public enclosure, or from defraying the charges necessary there, or failing to defend the same." The Dutch council was obliged "to construct his part of the common fence" within two days, or lose his rights.—Rec. N. Am., II: 95, 96-97.

Nicholas Backer receives a ground-brief for a lot, the present No. 51 Pearl St.—See Frontispiece, Vol. I, and I: 135; Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82, 82e Vol. II, and II: 268-69; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 356. See also Nov. 8, 1655.

Harbouring of Indians "during the night," between the wall of New Amsterdam "and the Fresh water," is forbidden by ordinance, after Stuyvesant and his council have censured on the matter with the burgomasters and field officers of the burger corps. A list of 25 guilders is named, to be collected from anyone who hereafter lodges "a single Indian during the night without a ticket signed by the Director General or the Secretary." This action was taken to prevent massacres.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 128; Rec. N. Am., II: 244; II: 51-52, 167.

Simon van Cort Cornelis van Tienenhoven has been "dismissed from all his offices." This rumour reaches the ears of the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam. If true, it means that a vacancy, among others, has been created in the office of city schout. The city court says that they are "ignorant of the certainty" of the report, and decide to wait until Van Tienenhoven, who is absent on a mission of investigation at the South (Delaware) River, has returned, and the dismissal has been confirmed. But the court decides, as soon as the fact is established, to ask Stuyvesant and the council, as they have several times requested before, that the office of schout be filled as a separate office "from the Burgomy, unrelated to the office or person of the company's fiscal.

In a few days, Van Tienenhoven returned, and the burgomasters and schepens appealed to Stuyvesant and the council, to whom they also exhibited the concessions obtained by them from the directors, on May 18, 1654 (p. 1). They were answered, on June 7, that the separation of the offices could not be made, "at least" not "without further advice and information" from the directors. This was really hedging (cf. with N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 317); but that opinion prevailed, and Stuyvesant and the council appointed Nicolas de Silfve, who had acted, ad interim, in the dual office, to serve regularly as city schout until an alteration should be made by the directors.—Rec. N. Am., II: 168, 109, 121; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 167, 186.

At an extraordinary city court session, on June 7, Van Tienenhoven appeared, related his dismissal, and asked if the court "had any thing to say relative to the performance of his duties" while schout; if so, would they let him know, so that he might "purge himself" of any charges, or, if not, would they give him "a formal Acte as to his deportment" in that office. The court resolved, unanimously, that there was "nothing against" him, but, "on the contrary," thanked him "for his services rendered for the good of the city, in a certificate confirmed with the city seal.—Rec. N. Am., II: 111. See also Feb. 2, 1653; March 13, 1656.

Prior to this date, as shown by a reference in a mortgage (Mortgage, 1654-60, trans. by O'Cullagh, 357; Jacob Wolphertsen van Stuyvesant erected his brickhouse, the site of which is now covered by Nos. 27 and 29 Stone St. In a court record of Dec. 6, 1664 (Rec. N. Am., V: 167-68), it appears that he had for 12 years two partners in his brewery, Joannes Withart and Jacob Vis; also that a record of the amount of beer brewed was evidence in the case. This partner record was expunged long before 1664, but from another entry, of July 25, 1665, it appears that he took as partners Vis and Symon Jansen Romeyn.—Ibid., V: 281, 285. Jacob Wolphertsen died, bankrupt, prior to April 12, 1670.—Ibid., VI: 351. The curators of his estate appear to have come into possession of the house, according to Oloff van Cortlandt, Johannes van Brugh, Cornelis van Borsuin, in right of Sara Kiersted, his wife, and Hendrick Vandewater, "who appear to have been a sort of specialist of creditors."—Iones, New Am. and Its People, 149. See also Castello Plan, II: 304-6.

The English traders petitioned the burgomasters and schepens, on May 8, for a modification of the export duties in the field. The request would be presented to the director-general and council for favourable action. The "free Traders" in the city, a week later, asked for "a repeal of the duty," as it tended to ruin the trade. The supreme authority now takes action by an ordinance, which establishes a new rate.—Rec. N. Am., III: 134, 1009, 1421.

Stuyvesant and the council address a missive to the directors at Amsterdam, the text of which has not been known hitherto; also a contemporary extract exists, in N. Neth. Papiers, No. 1224 (in N. Y. Pub. Library, and an answer, in part, of the directors, of Dec. 19, is printed in N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 371 ff. On account of its importance, a digest of its principal items is given here, viz: They consider granting of freedom to the Jews in New Netherland, on a par with other residents, as "abominable," and say that the Jews have sought it several times, unsuccessfully; capitalization of the Swedes on the Delaware was necessary, reasons given; ship "de Waag" and Swedes on the South (Delaware) River; the ship "Mauritius" manned with 150 men; attempt to populate the South River in order to conserve it; all captives ransomed from the Indians, save two or three children (a reference to those taken during the raid of 1653); Indians come to Manhattan in large numbers, from one to three hundred, with things to sell, which Stuyvesant does not despise, yet always keeps an eye on them; wine and beer revenue this year, 5,050 florins; exported wine and beer; Renseelaerswyck refuses to pay taxes (tenths), and also opposes the tapsters' beer and wine excise; Heemesteer, Vlissingen, and Gravesende pretend exemption so long as Rensselearwyck does not contribute; Fical Cornelis van Tienenhoven and his brother, Adriaen, given releases in consideration of the fiscal's good service for the company, and desire to go into other employment; Jan de Decker to be made commissary over the "five goods" in the "P office," but still at Fort Orange; the ship "Dolphyn" taken from the Swedes with cargo of tobacco; books and accounts to be seat, could not be got ready earlier, because Fical Van Tienenhoven was at the South River.

The directors at Amsterdam inform Stuyvesant that they would "have been better pleased" if the New Netherland government "had not published" the ordinance of Feb. 1 1656, (q. v.), "against the Lutherans," and "committed them to prison," as it has always been their "intention to treat them quietly and leniently;" the "same laws, without the punishment," will be published in future. They order Stuyvesant to "pass it over quietly and let them have free religious exercises in their houses."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 351. For further particulars regarding the Lutheran controversy, see Oct. 4, 1653.

In a letter of this date from the directors of the West India Co. at Amsterdam, the first intimation is given of the division of the territory on the Delaware, which led to the establishment of the new colony of New Amstel, under the dual jurisdiction of the city of old Amsterdam and the company. Negotiations for the division were under way on Dec. 19, 1656, and the new government was in operation from 1657 until the surrender of New Netherland in 1664. For the documents, see N. Y. Col. Docs., XII.

A Jewish quarter, "in a convenient place on one or the other side of New Amsterdam," as the Jews might choose, is recommended to Stuyvesant by the directors at Amsterdam.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 551; Opperhoorn, Early Hist. of Jews in N. T., 32. No such concentration of the Jews was carried out.

Various farmers and owners of plantations on Manhattan Island appear before the council and are notified to pay their tax of tenths during the summer, as the same time in the town, agree to their protests; but, on June 27, the director-general and council passed an ordinance warning all persons who were obligated by patent or deed to pay tenths not to remove their crops from the field before coming to an amicable agreement with the government in the selection of the tenths.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 1657; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 235; Rec. N. Am., II: 154, 155, 136.

Dirck Houthuysen is appointed by the council as smith of the company.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 168. He rented a house owned June by Dr. Jacob Hendrickse Varreveranger, and abscended in 1660,19 leaving an involved and insolvent estate behind him.—Rec. N. Am.,3 24 The farmer of duties complains that vessels depart from 25 New Amsterdam "without asking or receiving from the Fiscal a proper pass . . . and without duty entered their exported goods," which was a subject to duty. To prevent the defrauding of the public revenue in this manner, a provincial ordinance is passed, forbidding "any Ships, Yachts, 26 Barks, Ketches or any other vessels, of what nation soever," to "cast anchor before, or near" the city and to raise the same for departure to any place whatever, before "having asked and obtained a proper pass from the Fiscal; under a penalty of 50 pounds. Nobody is allowed to "embark any Pelties, Wines or Beer . . . subject to impost or duty," unless first entered and the duty thereon paid. Smuggled goods are made forfeited and three times the value thereof. The fiscal is also ordered to inspect the ships and cargoes before granting a pass.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 233-34.

27 Jacob Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven receives a ground-brief 28 for a lot with building thereon called the "Old Church," the location of which was the present No. 39 Pearl St.—See Castello Plan, 28 A joint court at Fort Amsterdam considered the case involving the provincial authorities and the burgomasters of New Amsterdam on account of the increasing number of Indians who run about the city's streets in a state of intoxication, and to consider means for ascertaining positively "where they get the liquor." Now "suspicious point to one Jan Dircksen and his wife, whose house the sages frequent" often. They decide that this couple shall be "privately informed and directed to leave by the next ship," but,

"upon the intercession of the Burgomasters . . . and the requests of the preachers, and for other reasons," the deportation order is suspended, and instead a reprimand and warning are administered.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 69.
29 Dirk Claesen Braekket petitions the burgomasters and scheepen for permission to keep a tavern, which is granted.—Rec. N. Am., II: 137 (cf. 131). This perhaps refers to Dirck Claessen, the potter, who dwelt on the East River shore at about the present Queens St.
30 Stuyvesant and the council, as a supreme court, issue a commit-mment against Jan Peck, a tavern-keeper, for felonious assault on a soldier in his tavern in the Smits Vly. He is locked up in the city hall, where he protests to the city court that he is illegally held, as he was only ordered, Isaac de la and wife against the soldier's vio-29 lence.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 170; Rec. N. Am., II: 144, 149.
30 He was a leading tavern-keeper of the city (ibid., II: 263, 266, 268), but his tavern gave the city and provincial authorities considerable anonymity from illegal acts. See Dec. 30, 1663.
Vinchey, as vendeur-maitre, is involved in the supreme court of director-general and council for furnishing liquor to Indians. The case had come up before the city court, which referred it to the higher court.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 170; Rec.
N. Am., II: 145. Tadens made his plea and answer. On the 3 May, an Indian to whom he had sold liquor gave evidence to the 31 court, and, on Aug. 3, Tadens was sentenced to a fine of 500 guilders, to be paid, or, if not paid, to be banished from the province. He asked that the banishment be commuted 32 to a fine. On Nov. 7, he again petitioned the council for pardon and leave to reside on Long Island, which was granted, he to pay 33 25 beavers to the church.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 171, 172, 176.
His tavern was on the south-west corner of the site of the Maritime building, or No. 11 Pearl St.—See Sept. 5, 1653; July 1, 1664. See also Castello Plan, II: 272; Dutch Grants, II: 587; and Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 981, where the reference should be "Key to Castello Plan, Block G, No. 4," instead of "No. 3." In 1665, he was several times charged with excise violations (Rec.
N. Am., IV: 265, 320; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 257), and, on July, 1664, was again charged with selling liquor to Indians.
Stuyvesant and the council address a missive to the directors 34 at Amsterdam, the text of which has not been known hitherto, although a contemporary extract exists in N. Y. Hist. Papers, No. 1225 (cf.
in Y. T. Libr. Public., and the answer of the directors, of Dec. 19, 35 is printed in N. Y. Col. Docs., XII: 131-32 XIII: 70-71; XIV:
36 371-75. As it is important, the principal items are summarized here: viz: The account books sent over have many errors; Sminkes and Maquaats; Sminkes bring 4000 beavers; ordinance against selling guus and ammunition to Indians to bring the price of fur to be to 37 35 feet long; Sminkes dangerous, not to be entertained in the fort or city of New Amsterdam, and trading with them to be done in a trading-house on the river "Achter het Cel," where the colony of Nederhorst formerly was; negotiations for Maquaats land at Fort Orange; information received that a Jesuit from Canada has come into the Sminkes country with about fifteen Frenchmen; Sminkes a powerful nation, able to take revenge on the Maquaats and the Dutch at Fort Orange; desire for succor for the South (Delaware) River; all necessary are dear, and recommendations for cargoes; no improvement in trade to be expected, whilst beaver and other furs are 82 cents. This year food and company's debts mostly paid; militia; income from tithes or tenants very small, and colony of Rensselearwyck will not pay tenants or excise; Jan de Decker's thanks for seat offered him in the council, but for weighty reasons cannot accept, as he must 38 go to Hollandy; people at Fort Orange and Beverwyck built a church, toward which there was contributed, on behalf of the company, 1,000 to 1,200 guilders and a bell, the money being paid, and the court there given directions to solicit the bell from the company; "Midwyck" (Midwout) and Hemstedt solicited through the preachers that, with a little bell, he should sell for 250 39 pounds weight of furs. Jacob Janzen, it is reported, was relieved of paying recognizance of 25 beavers, on condition of making a "stol" for the court of Fort Orange.
An ordinance of the director-general and council renewed and amended former edicts prohibiting the importation of articles that are contraband, such as guns and munitions.—Laws & Ord. N.
An ordinance of this date prohibits the roadstead or anchor-place for ships before New Amsterdam, on both the East and North Rivers, for revenue purposes, and to prevent smuggling and the entry of contraband.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 237-38, 248-49;
On April 8, this year, the lot, now No. 39 Pearl St., with the "Old Church" which was built in 1675, was sold by order of the Stuyvesant and the council to the highest bidder.—Cal.
Docs., XIV: 34. Jacob Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven was the buyer (see June 30, this year), but he almost at once became involved in debt and was obliged to give the deed to the bailli, to sell the house and lot, as security for the debts. The "voluntary sale" was fixed by the city court for Aug. 19. At the sale best buys the property.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., A: 71 (register's office, N. Y. County). On Oct. 2, the creditors of Van Couwenhoven, who had not yet been able to obtain the amount of their claims, were allowed by the court to have the purchase money lifted from De Forest by Secretary Cornelis van Ruyven, as vendeur-maitre, in satisfaction of the debt.—Rec. N.
Neth., II: 151, 153, 177. See also 1655.
The roadstead for ships on the North River is at the foot of The Beaver Path (now Morris Street). Regulations for the anchorage are now made; they were revised on June 12, 1657.—Rec. N. Am., II: 109; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 237, 248, 312. See Aug. 24.

Sept. Stuyvesant appears in the court of burgomasters and schepens, and makes certain proposals. These the court requests in writing, "so as to deliberate thereon." He draws up an informal minute, in which he gives the substance of what he says. He says he has come before them solely to ask "once more and for the last time" that supplies be provided, since for want of them the city works are held up, such as surrounding the city with palisades, erasing "other forts or defences, and rendering it defensible and close against a sudden assault either of Indians or others." Worst of all, he says, the work already done is "wholly in ruins," and scarcely a hand is raised to repair anything. He does not impute this state of affairs so much to the "negligence or indisposition" of the city government as to "want of money" for repairs and the completion of what is unfinished. He reminds them of the many plans that have been proposed by him and the council for raising means, apart from the voluntary contributions that were taken up in the previous year. He says they have been allowed to collect a tax on "the cattle fattened for consumption" in the city, but he is ignorant of what they have done, and he deems it "not inadvisable to farm it out now." So, too, they have been allowed to "impose and levy something on beer and wine consumed" in the city, and, if it has not profited, the fault is mainly their own. The directors at Amsterdam have ordered to the city "to fix the rate and liquidate the city's debts, or of having the levy made by him and the council, who would then assume the incurred debts to themselves and repay, as far as feasible, the decayed works, and endeavour to complete the work begun with palisades on the North River."—Rec. N. Am., II: 161–65.

On Sept. 8, the burgomasters and schepens voted to farm out the revenues of the slaughtered cattle and burgher's excise; to explain to Stuyvesant and the council why the new imposts had not been imposed; "to impose an assessment on the lots," and this proposal is now urge anew by Stuyvesant, so that funds may be available to pay the "incurred debts, some of which have "existed already three, others two years," and that the lenders may "receive, henceforth, a reasonable interest, until the discharge thereof." He feels it necessary to have an income "to provide a reserve fund, "to be used in time of need." He gives the city government the alternative of fixing upon a tax rate and of liquidating the city's debts, or of having the levy made by him and the council, would then assume the incurred debts to themselves and repay, as far as feasible, the decayed works, and endeavour to complete the work begun with palisades on the North River."—Rec. N. Am., II: 161–65.

Stuyvesant and the council replied by apostil on the foregoing points on the 20th, claiming that the conditions for new imposts were "premature," because indefinite "somewhat unbecoming," because "a perpetual and eternal tax" would be "unrestrained" in any place; and "unnecessary," since it was "unexplained" to take anything from the burgomasters and schepens which had been imposed by them "on the burghery by consent of the Director General and Council." But they were counselled to "deliberate on some ways and means to be introduced with the previous kind consent of the Director General and Council." The city court, on the 27th, concluded that the marginal answer did "not agree with the intention of the petition."—Ibid., II: 174–75. They resolved, on the 28th, "to write at the first opportunity" to Holland, "in order to prevent as much as possibly the sale of cattle and the burgher excise on wine and beer, after some delays, sold out on Oct. 30, at 710 and 4,200 florins, respectively.—Ibid., II: 176, 179, 204, 208–11. On Nov. 7 (p. 8), Sept. they addressed their grievances to the directors at Amsterdam.—Rec. N. Am., II: 216–19.

The fees for a bill of lading at the custom-house, and for the government porters for carrying goods to the company's public warehouse, are prescribed by a privilege, and these privileges accumulate the fees for passports.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 249–50.

Country food products have been brought to New Amsterdam now and again by Farmers to be sold, who "are obliged frequently to remain a long time [at the Strand] with their wares to their great damage, and to the great inconvenience of the people who live at a distance from the city, and have to pay the East River" to sell their goods "there" because they are unequally in demand there. This inconvenience is the farmer and seriously damages the farmer, who often loses more "by his absence from home" than he gains from his sales. Therefore, Stuyvesant and the council, seeking a remedy, order that "henceforth the Saturday shall be Marketdays here within this City, on the beach near or in the neighborhood of Master Hans Kierstede's house." (at what is now Whitehall and Pearl Sts.)—Rec. N. Am., I: 211; II: 167; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 251. See also Castello Plan, II: 627–641. Landmark Map Bld. Kry, III: 959; Pl. 174, Vol. III, and Frontispieces, Vols. I and II. This was the first public market-place in New Amsterdam.—See I: 123; and De Voe, Market Book, 36.

Several commissioners are named by the burgomasters of Amsterdam, Holland, to have the oversight of the affairs of that city's colony of New Amstel, on the Delaware. On the 16th, the Amsterdam chamber of the East India Co. selected two of its directors for the same purpose.—N. Neth. Papers, No. 1121 (6), in N. Y. Pub. Library. This record is new, and not among the printed evidence.

Although orders were issued on Oct. 7, 1655, in regard to the soldiers of the company's garrison at New Amsterdam, requiring them to appear "before the courts at first hearing," and to post themselves by the second, then "to pay its delinquents by the superior and inferior officers." So now another order is given, requiring every soldier to appear "fully armed before the court," and if found absent on the third beat of the drum, "he shall suffer a fine for the first offence and corporal punishment for the next." If he breaks ranks while standing or marching, or discharges his gun without an order from his superior officer of the troop, he is to be fined a month's pay. Those who are detailed on guard duty are ordered to appear fully armed at drum beat and not to absent themselves without leave, nor put a substitute in their stead, unless with the knowledge and consent of the Director General, the Captain, or the satisfaction of the officer at the time in command, on penalty of forfeiting half a month's wages for the first offence, a month's pay for the second, and corporal punishment thereafter. Other regulations are made against appearing drunk on guard, drinking while on guard, etc. Nor are the soldiers to discharge their muskets "either within or without the fort," except by order of duly appointed superiors. The sergeant of the guard is obliged to drill his men every morning at least an hour and a half, when the weather is "dry and suitable." Fines are distributed, one-third to the complainant and two-thirds to the officers and soldiers of the company. —Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 232–54.

Jan Jansen, Jr., petitions the city court for permission to keep a tavern, and is granted his request.—Rec. N. Am., III: 170.

The sheet-piling "in front of the City Hall [Pearl St. and Coen's Alley], and before the Water-port on the East River [Pearl and Wall Sts.]" was "not yet finished" (from Broad St. to the city hall), by this time "finished." It is now "deemed expedient, not only for the welfare" of the city in general, but for "the neighbours resident about the beach in particular, that the sheeting be altogether erected and completed," and the burgomasters and schepens give notice through their court messenger "to all persons realized and the Director General and Council of the City port and City Hall," to line their lots properly with planks, "according to the executed plan and survey," made by Capt. De Koninck in the early part of this year, and to finish the work by Dec. 17, or suffer a penalty of 25 florins each, and have the work done by the company. —Rec. N. Am., III: 176. On Dec. 20, Govt. Lockermans informed the city court that the sheet-piling was "not being proceeded with according to order,"
The city court again sent its messenger around "to notify the occupants or proprietors of the lots" involved to do each his part properly and without further delay, or the provisions of the former order would be enforced.—Ibid., II: 250-51. See also March 13, 1667.

"Houses, fences, gates, etc. are erected in New Amsterdam by many persons without the knowledge and approval of the official surveyors, which results in a great deal of irregular and bad building, and tends to the disrepute of the city. It is, in fact, an infringement of an ordinance of July 25, 1667 (p. 125). Therefore, the city council now renews the prohibitions and penalty previously enacted, and publishes the same from the city hall on the 28th.—

Stuyvesant has resolved to go to Fort Orange (Albany) to settle affairs there, but the two burgomasters attended a meeting of the council and beg him "not to go . . . in the existing circumstances of the country"—namely, the fear of an Indian attack. He says he "must necessarily be at Fort Orange" yet, as the magistrate

"of Breuckelen, Amersfoort and Middelwout" have also requested him to remain in the city, he calls another conference of the burgos-masters and council at this fort on this day, "to take good resolution" on the subject. The city court adheres to its former request, and the burgomasters do not attend the conference. The council, however, declares his voyage is necessary, and he goes to Fort Orange.—Rec. N. Am., II: 175-76, 179; Cal. Hist. MSS.,

Dutch, 16, 175, 177, 179.

"It having been found that export duties are often paid with very bad beavers, so that when the company's receiver tries to make purchases with these beavers are refused as payment by the merchants, even "by the very same persons" from whom they were received, to the serious loss and damage both to the Company and of its Servants in this country:" therefore, the fiscal and the provisional receiver are instructed "not to receive for the Export duty any other pay than good, whole, merchantable

Beaver," and in no case to accept "any Summer skins or drielings"

(meaning those at 3/4 the full value), which are "generally rejected and refused by the Beg. and others thereof the 3d.

Eight guilders to the beaver is the exchange rate named for exported merchandise. The "remitted 4 per cent" duty is made payable in silver coin, at the rate current in Holland, or in good beavers, "reckoned no higher than six guilders, or in goods," if the company needs them, "at 50 per cent advance on the duty,"

Odd amounts are to be adjusted, payment to be made "in silver coin, or whole strung Wampum," according to the value then in vogue, or by a return of any overplus amount by the receiver, in like coin or wampum. Half beavers or small pieces are to be valued Eight per pound.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 255-56.

Willem Bogardus is appointed by the council to be comptroller of the company's wind-mill, situated west of the fort. He was appointed, on April 25, a clerk in the office of the provincial secretary, which post he still holds.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 166, 175,

George Wolsey (or Woolsey), of Yarmouth, Eng., who, as representative of Isaac Allerton, Sr., resides in Allerton's warehouse (present Pearl St. and Peck Slip), applies to the city court for permission to keep a tavern there, but is refused. On the 24th, he petitioned the council, which gave its consent on the 26th, for one year.—Rec. N. Am., II: 183; Cal. Hist. MSS.,

Dutch, 39, 176. Wolsey was one of the curators of Allerton's estate in New Netherland, in 1659-61, and had removed from Manhattan Island before May, 1664.—Rec. N. Am., III: 90, 288; V: 55.

The request of the schout, burgomasters, and schepens,

Evert Duyckinck, the New Amsterdam glazier, supplies glass for the church windows in the fort, for each division of which he charges two and one-half beavers. Evidently, these were leaded wash with painted family arms, as he was told by the court to collect payment from "each one, for whom the glass was" put in.—Rec. N.

Am., III: 226; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 177. Wolsey's statement has been made, based on this and similar records, that glass making was practised in New Amsterdam in Dutch times. See also Addenda.

25 Mention is made of the tavern kept by "Michiel Jansen

Rec.

of Michael Jansen (Vredeland) built his house, but went hence to New Jersey in 1661.—Laws & Ord., N. Neth.,

Key, III: 797.

Hans Drepper is permitted to tap.—Rec. N. Am., III: 197.

His tavern, on the modern plan, would be at the intersection of Pearl,

Broad, and Broad Sts., now covered by the lower half of the Terminal building. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 797.

The Dutchmen petition Stuyvesant and the council for permission to enjoy their own public worship.—Eccles. Rec., I: 358-

60. See summary under Oct. 4, 1663.

As the laws previously against the desecration of the Sabbath and the giving of intoxicants to Indians (see June 18, 1663) are constantly disregarded, Stuyvesant and the council make another law, providing that all ordinary labour on the Sabbath, as well as hunting and fishing, shall be prohibited, "on pain of forfeiting One pound Flemish for each person." Moreover, a double fine is prescribed for "any lower or unlawful exercise or Amusement, Drunkenness, frequenting Taverns or Tippling houses, dancing, playing Ball, Cards, Trictracks, Tennis, Cricket or Ninepins, going on pleasure parties in a Boat, Car or Wagon, before, between or during Divine Services." A fine of six guilders for each person is to be levied against tavern-keepers or tapsters who entertain clubs, tap, give away, or sell "any Brandy, Wine,

Beer, or Strong Liquor to any person before, between or during the Sermons;" and "every person found drinking" is to be subject to a fine of three guilders. Taverns are also not to entertain persons or sell intoxicants "to any person at any time, on Sunday, or on any days, after the posting of the guard or ringing of the bell, under the same penalty." This order exempts "inmates of the family" or domestic guests, or "persons appointed on public business with the consent and by order of the Magistrates." The law inveighs against "the very dangerous, injurious and dissolute, bestowal and giving" of intoxicants to the Indians, and puts a complete ban on this traffic, under punishment for disobedience of a fine of 500 guilders, corporal punishment, and banishment from the country. Everybody, even servants, are enjoined to give information about intoxicants, and failure to reveal is to charac-terize the delinquent as "pervious to" the infringement and make him liable for the payment of half the fine. Peddling liquors of any kind along the rivers by skippers, slip owners, canoe men, boat men, or any other free or bound Inhabitants," is to be stopped, and shipments of liquors are to be made only in conformity with prescribed regulations, under a permit, and subject to subsequent proof of delivery made to the consignee.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 1657.

The Ropemong Clock (or Cloc), upon his petition to the council, is granted appointment as a notary in New Amsterdam.—Cal.

Hist. MSS., Dutch, 176. On July 21, 1661, he was suspended by the city court for six weeks, on account of irregularities in office, and later was fined for a similar offense.—Rec. N. Am., III: 348-49, 417.

Dirck van Schellayne resigns his office as "Comisier" (high costable, bailiff, or city marshal) of New Amsterdam (see Jan.

18, 1656), and Mathias de Vos, city notary, applies to the city court for the office, pleading as a recommendation that the burgos-masters have "already conferred on him the appointment of governor of the City Hall" (Gastenlijst). The court gave him the place on the 6th, and his appointment was confirmed by Stuyvesant and the council on Dec. 7—Rec. N. Am., II: 220-21; Cal.

Hist. MSS., Dutch, 177.

Three sworn butchers are appointed for the city by the burgos-masters and schepens, "to serve in butchering and cutting up, and to provide, have and possess their own rope, hand-harrows, troughs and other articles requisite for slaughtering." Rates for slaughtering and dissecting oxen, cows, calves, pigs, sheep, and goats are established, subject to approval by Stuyvesant and the council.—

Rec. N. Am., II: 222-23. On the 20th, the council, with Stuyvesant's approval, gave his consent "to a profession of slaughtering," or "to kill for himself," the right to do so,

"but at such price as the Court" had fixed or should establish, and only upon receiving "a proper permit from the Farmer."—

Ibid., II: 224.

Dirck Op Dyck applies to the burgomasters and schepens for permission to keep a tavern, "as he hired the house next the City"

1696 and to sell them wine and beer," which is granted.—Rec. N. Am., Nov. II: 222. Op Dyck had been several times commissary at Fort

6 Good Hope (Hartford, Conn.). He held an imperfect patent for Coney Island from 1644 until declared void in 1662. In 1666, he was appointed by the safety of the officers and court of assizes of the city court of New Amsterdam.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 49, 70, 109; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 57, 360, 508; Rec. N. Am., II: 276.

7 The frequent resolution of the burgomasters and schepens to lay their grievances before the directors at Amsterdam (see Sept. 4) now finds expression in a letter, in which they petition for the restoration to the city treasury of the revenue of the weigh-scales and the ferry. See the "Form of Government," of Feb. 1, 1653. They also say that the receipts from the slaughtered cattle and the burgher excise are by no means adequate to pay for the general public works, more less for more urgent repairs and erection of the City Walls, which were hastily built of sand and afterwards a plank curtain added," but are now fallen into ruin; nor for "the sheet piling along the river;" for "the repair of the City Hall," for "watchouses;" for "the building of schools;" for "the construction of the Graft [Canal] and other similar mat- ters," necessary "to the safety and better defense in time of war," all of which, they add, could be done if the directors would favour the city with the additional revenues, "and release it from the old debts incurred in the troubles" with their English neighbours. They say that, on account of "the inability of the Commonalty, "not one third part" has been collected of the general assessment levied in Oct., 1655. Among other things, they ask that effect be given to the former grant of the directors, of May 18, 1654, in regard to the separation of the office of city schout from that of the company's fiscal.—Rec. N. Am., 216-19. But the directors, on April 7, 1657, informed Stuyvesant that they were still resolved "not to separate the office of Schout from that of the Fiscal... that the duties of both be performed by one person."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 338.

On the other hand, Stuyvesant and the council made a provi-sion of the fourth of the revenue of the weigh-scales to the city treasury, on Jan. 25, 1658 (see summary under Jan. 22, 1658), subject to ratification by the directors at Amster-dam; but the directors objected, on Feb. 13, 1659 (p. 70), because the grant had been made without first consulting them, and Stuyvesant and the council replied, on July 29, that the proceeds had never been handed over to the city and, in view of their disagree-ment, would not be paid over without their order.—Rec. N. Am., II: 314; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 437, 441, 449.

8 William Hallett, a Baptist, who was confirmed as schout or prosecuting officer of Vissingsen (Flushing) in March, 1656, is now held prisoner by order of Stuyvesant, who has "the audacity to call and allowed to be called conventicles and gatherings at his house," and, in violation of the provincial ordi-nances, has permitted "an exegesis and interpretation of God's Holy Word, together with the administration and service of the sacrament, the eucharist and bapting by one William Wickendam," a Baptist from Rhode Island but native of Oxford-shire, England, all of which the authorities declare to be "in direct contradiction with the general political and ecclesiastical rules" of the mother country, and particularly violated of the pro-vincial laws, which they declare Hallett "is Schout... was bound to uphold and strictly enforce," but nevertheless "himself... transgressed and disobeyed." Hallett is dismissed from his office, fined 50 pounds Flemish, and ordered "banished" from New Netherland, meanwhile being held a prisoner until his fine and the costs of the court are paid.

On the same day, the provincial court sentenced Wickendam to pay a fine of 100 pounds Flemish and be banished, but to remain in prison until he paid his fine and the costs of the prosecution. However, on the 11th, the court (having been "credibly informed" that Wickendam was "a very poor man with a wife and several children... that he trade he did not with profit, and so had no means") remitted his fine, on condition that he quit the province and, if ever caught thereafter within its confines, be obliged to pay the sum remitted.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 341, 369-76. "No appeal was made to the charter of the town by the court for the reasons given... Wickendam did not guarantee freedom of worship, but freedom of conscience. It was only when this freedom of conscience seemed to be called into question by 'an order from the Hon. Director General not to admit, lodge and entrench in the said village any one of the heretical and abominable sect called the Quakers,' that the people of Flushing appealed to the right guaranteed in their charter.—Zwetsiein, Religion n. Neth., 1656-66.

9 John Jacob Stevenen by his next door neighbour on Pearl St., Hon. Jacob Strycker, because he neither repairs nor pulls down his chimney, which endangers "the whole street" with a "sudden destruction by fire." Stevenen, and his wife, Mary Joosteen, are forbidden to build any more fires, "under pain of confiscation;" and the case is put at the disposal of the fire inspectors of the city. Stevenen and his wife had come over from Holland in the previous year, and were soon in court, charged by their neighbours with living "dreadful and immoral lives," for which they were threatened with banishment.—Rec. N. Am., II: 371, II: 230-31.

Paulus Vander Beeck, as farmer of the burgher excise, asks the city court to "fix some hours in the day" when he may "issue licenses" and when they may be "taken by the Burghers" also that the brewers be prohibited from delivering beer, except through the sworn beer carriers, "so as to prevent all fraud." The court to follow "that the Farmer or his carriers shall sit every morning from 8 to 11 o'clock, and in the afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock, at a certain place," which Vander Beeck says will be "the office of Isaac d'Forest... Here, and only at the prescribed hours, licenses are to be issued, except occasionally to some strangers" who may wish to "take and sell" beer, "which are to be accommodated out of hours. The delivery of beer is allowed the brewers only through "the sworn beer carriers or one of them," unless special consent is given to the contrary.—Rec. N. Am., II: 228.

Solomon La Chair, as farmer of the slaughterhouse, suggests to the city court specifications for regulating the business of his office, and the court establishes rules, rates, and fines, accordingly.—Rec. N. Am., II: 232-35.

Neeltie or Cornelia Wessels, mother of Warner Wessels (see Nov. 23, 1654), petitions the burgomasters and schepens for "leave to follow the trade of the public slaughtering, and to sell 'on condition that she observe such order as is proper therein."—Rec. N. Am., II: 223; cf. 263, in list of tavern-keepers. Stevens locates this tavern on "Vaner Street" (Pearl St.), near "de Heere Grant" (Broad St.).—N. Y. Herald, Dec. 17, 1693.

Paulus Vander Beeck, the farmer of the burgher excise in New Amsterdam, sends a communication to the court of burgomasters and schepens, requesting to be maintained in his rights. He states that he went on the day before with the court messenger to the house of Oloff Stevenen van Cortlandt, brewer and one of the burgomasters, "to inspect his cellar," in order to find out if any beer had been made. But when the court was there, he found the cellar "filled to the top with various merchandise," and stated "in this state as in property thereof."—Rec. N. Am., II: 233; cf. 265, in list of tavern-keepers. Van Cortlandt makes this action, he alleges, has prevented him from catching all the other brewers in town who have not made a return to him. He cites a law of old Amsterdam, of 1686, as his evidence that beer should not be taken to any houses from breweries "without a permit from the excise officer." As the brewers have failed to make entry through him, he maintains that he has the right to search their cellars, and asks that Van Cortlandt and the other brewers be condemned to pay fines. With Van Cortlandt and other brewers as members of the court, a ticklish situation is presented. The members of the bench who are not brewers are unwilling to "decide absolutely in the case," so it is agreed that they shall communicate with Stuyvesant about the question and, after deliberation, make a decision. The brewers claim they are not classified as "beer merchants," so are not under the law cited. These points were submitted to Stuyvesant, whose answer came in a provincial ordinance on Nov. 25, which further regulated the excise. It was a compromise, so far as the immediate controversy was concerned.—Rec. N. Am., II: 233-37. Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 263-65. (These two translations of the ordinance of Nov. 25 are irreconcilably different.)

Paulus Vander Beeck again asked the court, on the 28th, for "an act of consent, to visit all cellars and houses, in order to prevent all smuggling, and for the maintenance of the City excise." The court decided that all who received wine or beer from Holland or other places should have to "bargain with the Farmer for what the consumption of the city... when disagreements occurred the court would regulate the same. The brewers who were members of the court objected to Stuyvesant's ordinance as prejudicial to the interests of all brewers in the city, and determined to address Stuyvesant in the matter, so as "to prevent, if possible, the same being enforced."

A conference was held with him on the 29th; he told them "that he had been informed of the want of bread," and now left the advice to the city court "to make such an order on the Farmer's petition" as this court "should deem proper."—Rec. N. Am., II: 237-38.

Vander Beeck was summoned before the city court on the 30th for examination; he insisted that the regulations he enforced, that the brewers be bound, "like other Burgurers, to pay the Burgier's excise," and be required to make entry of what they brewed as soon as they put it in barrels, "so as to prevent all frauds," and to "regulate the guaging," and also enter what the brewers had hitherto failed to have entered for excise. The immediate outcome was a set of rules drawn up by the burgomasters and schepens, which Stuyvesant approved on Dec. 5, and which were published and posted at the city hall on the 6th, so that nobody might "pretend ignorance."—Ibid., I: 27-28; II: 235-41.

On Dec. 11, Burgomaster Van Cortlandt, Schepen Jan Vigne, Schepen Willem Beekman, and Pieter van Couwenhoven, six brewers, and three of them members of the bench, were defendants in the city court, charged by Vander Beeck with smuggling.—Ibid., II: 244-46. The cases were postponed; but, on Dec. 12, the farmer of the excise delivered his answer in court and the schout and remaining members of the bench, who were not under charges, voted to leave the case to Van Vigne, Beekman, and Van Couwenhoven from the charge of smuggling, because the order in regard thereto was not made until after the acts complained of were committed. But they were required to pay to the farmer specified sums as well as the costs of suit in each case. Van Cortlandt's case was not so easily settled. The court could not "agree in opinion," and concluded "to go in a body" to Stuyvesant, "with all the papers" in the case, "bear his advice thereupon, and follow his conclusion."—Ibid., II: 249, 250, 252-54. For the regulations that followed upon this excise matter, see Jan. 9, 1657.

The burgomasters at Amsterdam and in Holland, with the advice and consent of the lords of the states-general, promulgated a revised code of regulations governing the transportation of all persons to New Netherland, whether servants, colonists, or "other free persons," and their conduct during the voyage. The fourteen chapters of this important code concern: First,—obedience due to skippers and military captains; the administration of justice by a board of six persons on shipboard, consisting of the skipper, supercargo, commander of the soldiers, pilot, chief boatswain, and gunner. In case of conspiracies or "notorious capital crimes," on either the outward or homeward voyage, the guilty persons, after investigation by the board, are to be delivered over to the authorities, either in Holland or in New Netherland, "according to their deserts." Second,—penalties for cursing and blaspheming; respect due to the clergy; the requirement to attend morning and evening prayers. No man shall raise or bring forward any question or argument on the subject of religion, on pain of being placed on board and water three days in the ship's galley.

Third,—no persons to be received on board without passports; no persons, "bound to service," etc., to be brought from New Netherland by the skipper, etc. "except with special consent of the Director there, on pain of forfeiting Six hundred Florins for each person." All skippers, etc., are to keep a journal on each of their voyages, which they shall "deliver over to the Burgomasters or their commissaries, appointed over the Colony in New Netherland," or suffer penalty. Officers, soldiers, and sailors are required to repair on board the ships at drum beat. They shall not run their ships into foreign ports, except in case of urgent necessity justifiable under bond. Persons going to New Netherland in the service of the city of Amsterdam "shall be bound to remain there and to serve by water and by land, for the term of four years, exclusive of the time spent in going and returning, or as much as may be need of them, and this Voyage may require." They may be sent home sooner, however, at the discretion of the city officials of Amsterdam. Penalties and punishments are prescribed for deserters.

Fourth and fifth,—provisions relating to wages under various circumstances, the care of wounded or sick, and death of crew.

Sixth,—provisions relating to private trading enterprises by persons in the service, the disbursement of goods from the public store, etc.

Seventh,—the obligation to be content with fixed rations during the voyage. "Every one shall be bound to drink every day his ration of wine without being permitted to save or sell it to any body else, and the ration of him who may not require to drink shall remain in the pipe, and he shall not be at liberty to demand said portion afterward." A penalty is provided for stealing provisions, or throwing food overboard on the pretext that it is not good, except by consent of the skipper or commissary.

Eighth,—the care and inspection of arms and powder.

Ninth,—the duty of surgeons to give due service cheerfully, with no other compensation than monthly pay.

Tenth,—regulations relating to wills and the property of deceased persons.

Eleventh,—orders concerning various offences and disorders on the voyage. Dice, cards, or other implements of gaming are not to be brought on board, under penalties for infractions, "unless the skippers or ship's Council should permit something of the sort for pastime." The loser of a wager in a forbidden game shall not be obliged to pay, or, having paid, the winner must repay it or let it be deducted from his monthly wages, and both winner and loser shall pay a fine. Any person guilty of drunkenness, assault, drawing a knife in anger, or doing bodily harm to any person, "shall be nailed to the mast with a knife through his hand and there remain until he draws it through and if he wound anyone he shall be keel-hauled, forfeiting nevertheless six months' pay." If guilty of murder, "he shall wholly live or be thrown overboard with the corpse, and forfeit all his monthly wages and booty." A person who carries "fire or a light into the hold, the ship's battery or the powder magazine," or who uses "any fire or candles except by permission of the Skipper and Commissary," shall be "whipped with cat-o-nine-tails through his quarters," etc. To further prevent the danger of fire, and "the trucking which arises from bartering tobacco and drink," there is prohibition against selling or bartering of tobacco, and against the use of it except during the day, and then only on the forward deck before the mainmast, with the consent of the skipper and commissary.

Twelfth,—concerning the enforcement of all these regulations.

Thirteenth,—the duties and obligations of the soldiers and council of war. "All Military Officers and Soldiers, and when necessary all others in the City's employ shall, without any exception, be bound . . . to labor at erecting and repairing of Ports, Batteries, Trenches and other works . . ." Every one shall be charged with his arms and have their cost deducted from his monthly wages received from the City . . . . No one is permitted to do injury to the person or property of the inhabitants of New Netherland, "whether French, English or other Christian Nation, or to the Natives of the Country."

Fourteenth,—munitions of war not to be sold to Indians. "And, therefore, every one must, if needs be, submit to a proper inspection and examination of his Chests, Cases, Casks and other packages, before he be able to go ashore.

The directors at Amsterdam wrote to Stuyvesant: "We consider a change of the value of your currency, that is, placing the beaver at 6l. instead of 8, and wampum at 8 for a stiver, instead of 6, a matter of great importance and have therefore deferred the consideration of it until next spring. Meanwhile we shall think about it and later inform you of our opinion and wishes."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 372. See April 7, 1657.

The directors at Amsterdam, in order to obviate any "further expenditures and troubles," wrote to Stuyvesant their "consent to have the fort there [New Amsterdam] surrounded by a wall of cut stone," and say they intended "for that purpose" to send over "some good masons also some carpenters, and in the spring.

They recommend to Stuyvesant, meanwhile, "to prepare the work there and have everything ready as far as possible," They say it is "not necessary to wait for the required sailors, because the Company's negroes are "sufficient to bring and fetch the needed material."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 377.

A year later (Dec. 22, 1657), they wrote again, as follows: "At your urgent solicitations and in order to push the walling in of the Fort we have engaged three stone-masons, who with . . . sailors, called for formerly, are now going over at such wages, as the enclosed list shows, as yet we have not been able to engage the terriers, because they are more inclined not to enter service and to go there as free men, as some are doing now with these ships, that if need be you may employ them on day's wages."—Ibid., XIV: 401.
On March 19, 1658, Bartholomeus van Schel and the two other masons who had recently arrived from Holland to complete the stone wall around Fort New Amsterdam applied to the council for an increase of allowance, which was granted.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 182, 187. A few months later (Aug. 19), Stuyvesant presented proposals to the council for completing the stone wall of the fort, as well as for enclosing the city at the river side with palisades.—Ibid., XIV: 200.

The extra allowance granted to the masons displeased the directors, who, on Feb. 13, 1659, wrote: "We cannot approve of it, the more so as according to your testimony these men are progressing lazily and slowly in their work. We direct you therefore, to discharge them, if these masons are not willing to work diligently and profitably for the stipulated pay of 14 fl., and in that case to deduct and make them pay for the passage here [Holland]. To finish the work on the fort you may then engage such English masons, as understand to build with stone."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 428. Stuyvesant and the council explained, on July 21, that the increase of one guilder in wampum was not in day's pay, but for board money, and said a change would be made in the boarding regulations of these men to meet the objections.—Ibid., XIV: 439.

We see, then, that the plan for walling in the fort with stone had its inception in 1656, yet that the actual work had scarcely begun before 1658, and was still in progress in 1659. We also know that Bartholomeus van Schel and the other masons received their discharge from the public service on May 23, 1661.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 243. See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 944.

The receipts from duties in New Netherland during this year are estimated by the directors at Amsterdam to amount to $4,100 florins ($20,500), which does not include "all the other revenues in the country." Nevertheless, all the revenues together are "hardly sufficient to pay the old debts," gross defalcations having taken place in the treasury through the misconduct of Adrian van Tussenbroek and others. Cornelis ten Broeke, the report by the directors to Stuyvesant, N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 372.

An important criminal action has been before the city court for several months, in which Geert (Gertrude) Coerten and her husband, Guert, have been accused of slandering the reputations of Cornelis Stuwerwyck and the wife of Willem Beeckman, one of the schepens. The gossips of New Amsterdam have a live subject, and Beeckman pursues the case relentless.—Rec. N. Am., II: 285, 286, 287. But the court considers its authority "too limited to pronounce judgment, which inspires them to petition Stuyvesant and the council for an extension of authority, so as to be able to "[blacksmith] to execute sentence in all criminal matters, capital cases excepted." On the 24th, Stuyvesant and the council granted this inferior court the right "to judge all injuries and criminal delicts of a minor degree to branding and incarcering," unless an appeal was taken in by owners to them, as a higher court, within 24 hours after sentence had been pronounced. If the judgment of the lower court was confirmed or revised by the higher, the final "execution of the punishment of the prisoner" was to be left to the city court of schout, burgomasters, and schepens.—Ibid., II: 285-286; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 242; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 285-290.

In a deed recorded this day, Jacob Wolpherts and van Couwenhoven conveys to Nicholas de Meyer the "lot where the Mill stands" on the south side of the Syck Steeg.—Liber Deeds, A: 81 (New York). This still stood in the rear of the present No. 41 Stone St.—See Castello Plan, II: 328-330; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 961, and Pl. 174, Vol. III. See also 1656 and 1660.

The council grants Isaac de Forest permission to conclude a contract with Jacob Wolpherts, van Couwenhoven, for all the strongest beer he shall brew for a year.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 178. As an increase of allowance, which was granted.—Cal. Hist. MSS., being pursued in court by his creditors, and is obliged to sell off some of his property to avoid an execution sale by either the schouther or the city marshal. He seems also to have considerable owing to him by others, which he cannot easily collect.—Rec. N. Am., II: 151, 152, 153, 154; 1660, 281. De Forest pursues among other things, to prevent the abandonment of Van Couwenhoven's "well-situated brewery" (the site of present 27 and 29 Stone St.), and to save its owner from ruin.—Innes, New Am. & Its People, 147, 148.

But Van Couwenhoven continued to be harassed by debts. On Jan. 21, 1659, he was sued in the city court for the payment of a mortgage of fl. 64319 st. on "the stone house, the mill and lot which he owned, and on Feb. 11, the attorneys of the mortgagor asked the court "that the mortgage be sold by execution," so that the moneys might be obtained.—Rec. N. Am., II: 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324. Perhaps about this time, Van Couwenhoven formed a partnership in the business of brewing with Johannes Withard and Jacobus Vis, which could not have lasted many years, judging from a long court litigation, in 1664-5, over the closing of the premises of this partnership; said then to have ended "several years" before.—Ibid., V: 154, 158, 165, 167, 281, 235. At any rate, Van Couwenhoven continued the brewery, heavily mortgaged to Pieter Roodbusch (A: 255).

On June 2, 1665, Fredryck Flipser (Phillips), who had only recently married Rudolphus's widow (Margaret Hardenbrook), exhibited in court "a judgment, mortgage and settlement" against Van Couwenhoven, and demanded in satisfaction thereof the sale by execution of the "brewing materials, hypothecated to his predecessor and subsequently to him." To which Van Couwenhoven replied he had already "allowed his dwelling house, brewery and its contents to be seized for sale on the 2d July next," so as to satisfy his creditors therefrom, and the court ordered Flipser to wait, "saving his action in case of preference or concurrence." On July 1, Frederik Flipser and his wife were joined in court by a warrant for a warrat to the city marshal "to sell the dwelling house, brewery, brew rat and brewing apparatus" of Van Couwenhoven in satisfaction of the mortgage, which the court ordered the marshal to execute, who presently undertook "to seize his brew kettle and brewing apparatus." When Van Couwenhoven appealed to the court (July 12) for leniency, he was ordered to see Flipser in the matter.—Ibid., IV: 256-57, 271-72, 272; Bolton, Hist. of Winchester Co. (ed. of 1881), I: 111-112.

Gybert Op Dyck and Claes van Eldsant, Jr., are admitted as court magistrates of the city. This is a yearly salary, each, of 150 guilders, on behalf of the West India Co. and 50 guilders, each, on the part of the city.—Rec. N. Am., II: 276.

A renewal of the ordinance "against any person shooting or druming, etc., on New Year's day, or planting-Maypoles on May day," is published from the city hall.—Rec. N. Am., II: 284.

The West India Co. expended fl. 526,910 st. during this year for transporting and victualling soldiers who went over to New Netherland in the ships ("Dutchman," "St. Jan," and "Gulde Otter," as well as for certain persons conducted back to Holland, for ammunitions, etc.—New Neth. Papers, No. 1220, in N. Y. Pub. Library.

Nicholas Bernard receives a ground-brief for a lot on William St. just south of the central market, being now part of the site of the building of the National City Bank.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C: 89, Vol. II, and 406.

Stuyvesant and the council receive "manifold complaints of Inhabitants and Strangers... respecting the great, excessive and intolerable dearness of all sorts of necessary commodities and household supplies, the prices of which are enhanced from time to time, principally, among other causes, in consequence of the high price of Beaver and other Pelttries in this country beyond the value, which, by reason of the great abundance of Wampum, is advanced, to ten, eleven and twelve guilders for one Beaver. And Wampum bought for want of Silver and Gold coin, as yet the most general and common Currency between Man and Man, Buyer and Seller, domestic articles and daily necessaries are rated according to that price, and become dearer, from time to time, the rather, as not only Merchants, but also, consequently, Shop-keepers, Tradesmen, Beggars, Beggarsly embareased to subsist, and now charge 40@50 per cent when they sell their wares for Wampum or for Beaver. This tends, then, so far to the serious damage, distress and loss of the common Mechanics, Brewers, Farmers and other good Inhabitants of this Province, that the Superior and inferior magistrates of this Province are blamed, abused and cursed by Strangers and Inhabitants, and the Country in general receives a bad name, while some greedy people do not hesitate to sell the most necessary eatables and drinkables, according to their insatiatory avarice, viz. the can of vinegar at 18@20 stivers; the can of Oil at 4@5 guilders; the can of French wine at 40@45 stivers; the gill of Brandy at 15 stivers, and two quarts of home brewed Beer, far above its price, at 14@15 stivers, &c., which the greater number endeavor to purchase at the gill, and lose a great deal of the flavor of the Wampum, that it is partly to buy partly long; that they must give 11@12 and more guilders before they can convert the Wampum into Beaver.

These conditions determine Stuyvesant and the council to work out regulatory measures, in so ordinance of this date, which declares: "Wampum a commodity and merchandise in the matter of commerce and wholesale trade; to wit, only among those who import it from abroad, or trade it in this Province with Indians for Furs; but inasmuch as, for want of Silver and Gold coin or other pay, Wampum must, in smaller quantities, serve as currency between Man and Man, Buyer and Seller," it is resolved "to rate Wampum, and as far as is possible to cause it to be rated at the value of Beaver, the Beaver being still restricted, until further Order and advice from Patria, at Eight guilders and no higher."

To prevent further "complaints of misleading of the Wampum" and loss to the Company's treasury, it is ordered that hereafter "Wampum shall not be paid out or received, between Inhabitants and Inhabitants of this Province, even for merchandize or for contracts made before this in Wampum, by the tale or stiver, but only by a stamped measure, authorized to be made and stamped for that purpose, by the Director General and Council, the smallest of which measure shall be five stivers; the whole ten, and the double 20 stivers."

If a purchase amounts to less than half the smallest measure, or 24 stivers, "the Receiver or the Payer" are to "make up the smallest fraction under or over 24 stivers, by the tale" each while Wampum bead being reckoned at half a farthing, and each black bead at one farthing. Publication of the law and obedience to it "everywhere within this Province of New Netherland" is enjoined. A fine of 50 pounds, Flemish, for the first infraction and double penalty for a second offence are the punishments to be meted out to those who do not pay or receive or keep by the tale, or any other measure than that Ordained and stamped" as provided for by this law.—"Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 259-92."

On Jan. 8, Nicolas de Sille, the first provincial councillor, informed the burgomasters and schepens that the director-general and council intended "to publish a certain Ordinance relative to the zeewan and that by a certain measure," meaning the proposed law described above. He told them that the provincial authorities wanted the advice of the city fathers therein, who, considering it "a matter of great importance" to the public, thought it wise "to invite some of the principal Burghers and traders to the City Hall to aid in advising on this subject in a form of a Common Council," on the subject for the public good.

The afternoon of the 8th was fixed upon for this purpose, when the meeting took place in the city hall. Stuyvesant was accompanied by De Sille. The city bench was represented by Allard Anthonly, the burgomaster of Stuyvesan, Jan Cornely van Curler, Coenraet Stuyvaert, Jacob Stuyckter, Jan Vigne, Willems Beeckman, and Hendrik Kip. Those invited by the city bench, "after having communicated with" Stuyvesant, were Cornelis Steenwyck, Govert Lockermans, Joost Teunisn, the baker, Ch耐reft Ten Eyck, Isaac de Forest, Daniel Latschou, and Abram de La Nov. They assembled in the ordinary Council Chamber of the City Hall. Stuyvesant placed before the meeting "certain oral propositions relative to the decline of the zeewan and the causes thereof." He told them the subject had been considered "in the Supreme Council at various times about six months or longer ago, and that it was finally resolved to fix the zeewan at a certain rate wherein his Honf submitted a sample, which should be about eight zeewans for one stiver. He then asked "why it should not be so rated . . . or if possible to propose and to aid in devising a better expedient," since it "was the intention" of the provincial government to "restore Wampum to a better accommodation, but create considerable confusion," and that, as it would immediately become known to the Indians, more would be charged for everything by the Indians, who would "enrich themselves," and as a consequence the rate could never be restored to its previous state. Then "various debates arose thereupon." The invited representatives of the people "finally withdrew," leaving the determination "to their Superiors and the Burgomasters and Schepens."

Then, "after divers debates in Court" between Stuyvesant, De Sille, and the burgomasters and schepens, "it was determined to postpone the rating of the zeewan to a better and fitter opportunity, and to let it go at the same rate as it has done to the present time; and it was thought necessary to make a difference by Ordinance in the payment of zeewan, silver, beavers or tobacco as already exists among all as well in trade as in labor, and to fix the price accordingly of beer, wine, bread, and other daily necessaries, each different according to the pay."—"Rec. N. Am., II: 260-61.

Formal suspension of the ordinance, "until the Wampum be somewhat reduced in quantity," was voted by the provincial council on Jan. 9.—"Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 292-93."

On Dec. 12, the directors-general and council to the wampum ordinance, sent it back to Stuyvesant, with a "few alterations," adjudged that wampum should not be rated or exchanged at a higher rate than in New England, and ordered that all ordinances or edicts should in future be issued in the name of the chamber of Amsterdam, instead of using only the title of the West India Co.—"Ib., II: 295; N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 400. See Jan. 8, 1657. See also Nov. 29, 1657, for the further ordinance concerning wampum."

A conference, "in the form of a Common Council," is held between Stuyvesant, De Sille, the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam, and seven of the principal merchants of the city, "in the ordinary Council Chamber of the City Hall," to deliberate concerning the decline of wampum as money (for full particulars, see Jan. 13); but other matters are "proposed and decided to be taken into deliberation," and with this view a memorandum is made by the schepens. These proposals relate to establishing a "law of citizenship" or Burgerrechte, "to keeping open store and selling by retail practised to the present time both by Jews and all foreigners."—"Rec. N. Am., II: 260-62."

Wannaer Wessels applies to the burgomasters and schepens for "the office of guage and overseer of barrels." He receives the appointment. On the 9th, he took the oath, and, on the 13th, regulations were made for him for guaging and stamping or branding "all barrels, whether beer barrels, half barrels, quarters or other casks made or used" in the city "and delivered from one to the other, whether to Wessels, or Vertis, or to others." Nobody was allowed to make delivery of any barrels before they were guaged, and a penalty of 50 guilders was fixed upon for infractions of the ordinance.—"Rec. N. Am., I: 295; II: 260, 262, 265, 166-67."

An ordinance was passed by Stuyvesant and the council on Oct. 26, 1656, by which it was forbidden to carry on the business of tavern-keepers without a license, to be renewed every three months. On the 30th of that month, the edict was published at the city hall of New Amsterdam, and it was to become operative from Nov. 1.—"Rec. N. Am., I: 26-27; II: 207, 208; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 261. See also Nov. 23, 1656."

The burgomasters and schepens now resolve "to summon all the tapsters of the city to appear at the city hall on the morrow, to be informed of their duty to take out quarterly licenses and pay each time 6 fl. or one pound Flemish ($1.40). Accordingly, 22 tavern-keepers, men and women, whose names are recorded, gathered together and before the provincial ordinance read the edict. They were given time to retire from the court chamber and "order together thereupon," and, after a short deliberation, returned to court, and through a committee of four made known that they could not agree, but were willing to abide whatever the court should "consider proper." For the public peace it was agreed that a fixed sale price, inasmuch as there was "considerable trust and bad pay," and nobody could serve for nothing. The court held that there must be a fixed price for beer, yet, on wines, which were Jan. 9 not so necessary for the common people, they allowed discretion and there was no fixed rate. The price of beer was fixed upon as the highest; the stewards (4 cents a quart) called gallons "Vaan" (4 meals = 5 qts.), and licences were ordered to be taken out within a day after publication of the rescript.

The city authorities did not favour the licensing of the bakers, because it was "not customary in any place for tradespeople to pay anything in this shape," and said, if such a thing were introduced, "it is hoped hereafter to be imposed also on other undertakers." On Jan. 11, the presiding burgomaster informed the court that a committee of the tavern-keepers had requested through him "an abatement" in the license fee from six to three florins, as no more was required of tavern-keepers in Holland; and that the sale price of the "Vaan" of beer be fixed at 12 or 13 stuivers. The court held fast to its original order, and required its enforcement, especially "as many" had "already paid." Some of the tavern-keepers, however, petitioned anew, on the 15th, but got no further concession.—Rec. N. Am. I: 28-35; II: 261, 266, 268; cf. also the order for renewal of licences in April.—Ibid., VII: 175. On Jan. 23, another provincial ordinance was passed with regard to licensed taverns and the excise under supervision of the subaltern courts of the villages throughout the province.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 296-97.

The city court passes an ordinance prohibiting everybody from using in the city "any other ell, weight or measure than that used" at old Amsterdam, and directs that all these measures in use in the city shall be brought to the city hall once a year, on Jan. 25, to be there stamped as correct, by the court messenger of the city, "in the presence of two of the Courts." A stamping tax is fixed upon, and a series of fines is established against those who use any unstamped measures.—Rec. N. Am., I: 29-30; II: 260, 262, 266-68.

Numerous complaints are registered with the provincial government concerning "the chopping of Firewood and cutting of Timber on lands claimed by divers" Patents" originating from the fact that many land-grafting inhabitants of the province have received, several years ago, "many and large tracts of land on Letters patent from the Director General and Council, on the express agreement to cultivate and improve them," but which in many cases the patentees have "allowed to lie" waste, unfenced and unimproved. Such a disregard has militated against the interests of the West India Co. and "curtailed" its revenue, whilst it has delayed "the settlement of the Country." Other inhabitants, who have sought "to earn an honest livelihood for themselves by chopping and cutting Firewood and Timber," have been hindered by the patentees of the unimproved lands, so that guards have often ensured. Stuyvesant and the council, on this account, order all persons who claim any lands, by virtue of patents or deeds, to "properly set off and fence them in," so that the government may visualize what lands still remain ungranted; they may be used "for the carrying off the wood or timber on unfenced lands," at the most convenient places, without hindrance from anybody. The ordinance was published at New Amsterdam at the city hall, on the 24th.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 294-95; Rec. N. Am., II: 274.

The burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam, in a petition to the provincial government, remonstrate against the daily increase of peddlers, who are arriving from Holland and refuse to sell their goods in the city, but rather proceed "immediately to Fort Orange or to some other place, and, having finished their business or traded to Holland and the environs, leave the city, where the city derives no profit from them. They now allege that "even the provisions" which were brought over from Holland in the summer of 1666 have had to be "recovered from Fort Orange," because the trade there is "much better" than at New Amsterdam. This commerce they requested to be in accord with the rights of the Freedoms and Exemptions, which designated Manhattan Island as the staple port for the whole province of New Netherland.

The city government having assumed obligations for defence against English encroachments and the Indians, the city fathers request that the commonalty be favoured "with some privileges." They want a grant of the burgherright, citizenship, "one of the most important privileges in a well governed city," and the restriction of public trading within the jurisdiction of the city to those who will be known as burghers. Residents who are not regular settlers, they say, should "not be allowed to trade to any quarter" in the environs of the city, except by permission of the supreme authorities.—Rec. N. Am., II: 274-75.

On Jan. 23, the council, answering the foregoing representation of the city fathers, admitted the justness of the complaint against the itinerant peddlers and the fatal consequences thereof to the people of New Amsterdam. They decreed that henceforth traders who arrived in the province should "be held, by virtue of staple right and pursuant to the Lords Patrons, to set up and keep an open store within the gates and walls" of New Amsterdam "in a hired or owned house or room and to ask from the aforesaid Burgomasters and Schepens, beforehand, the common or small burgherright or citizenship (Poorter rech) to enable them" to trade. For the right, 50 guilders were to be paid to the city, and "during their stay in this City" they were "to bear like other Burghers and citizens their burdens, expenses (taxes), rounds (tochten) and watches.

The city was granted also the privilege of establishing "a Great Burgherright" for those who might apply for it, and to collect a fee of 50 guilders therefor. Only those persons who possessed the great burgherright could be nominated and hold office in the city, and they were to have certain concessions, such as freedom from arrest by order of any inferior court in the province.

On the 9th, the city fathers asked for an "explanation of the conformed privileges," i.e., those for whom the present privileges of the large and small burgherrights should apply. They requested that the great burgherright might be held by all former schouts, burgomasters, and schepens, those who held office, as well as those who were to be chosen presently for the new year.—Ibid., II: 286-88; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 308-309; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 178.

Reply to this query came in a provincial act on Feb. 1. It designated for the great burgherright all persons who had been and then were "in the High or Supreme government of the Country . . . and their descendants in the male line" "all former and actual Burgomasters and Schepens" of New Amsterdam and "all other descendants of the victualers (spelens, or tavern-keepers) of the city, now or formerly in office and their descendants in the male line," the commissioned officers to the Ensign inclusive" belonging to "the City regiment," as well as "their descendants in the male line." Others could procure the grant by virtue of the method provided in the law of Jan. 50.

The small burgherright was given to all persons who had been bona fide residents for the preceding year and six weeks; to "all born in the city: to all who had married or thereafter might marry "native-born daughters of Burgers," and to those who should secure for themselves according to the system laid down in the law of Jan. 30. The proceeds from burgherright fees were to be spent by the burgomasters "principal and in strengthening and circumsallation" of the city. The law ordered the burgomasters to make out lists, respectively, of the great and small burgerrights, in a true Register, and deliver a "copy thereof into the Office of the Secretary of the inhabitants and Council."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 501-13; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 180.

On Feb. 6, forms of certificates of the great and small burgherrights were drawn up, and, on March 29, the burgomasters issued a warning against trading in the city save by those who procured a burgherright. On April 9, all who claimed to be burgerrights were ordered to band in their names to be registered.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 181; Rec. N. Am., VII: 147-48, 149.

Persons who had had a residence in the city, and removed, forfeited their burgherrights and were required to reestablish themselves according to the same system laid down, as previously provided, and the city bench confirmed them in cases brought up in court.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 149, 158.

From April 10 to May 3, there were inscribed on the records of the city the names of 20 great burghers and 206 small burghers (ibid., 150-53). They were not the twentieths of the twelfth part of the total of the burgherright in Jews. In Jan., 1683, when the nomination and election of new city officials was being taken up, a communication was sent by the director-general and council to the city court which referred to "the small number of the Great Burghers and the consequent trifling change of persons in it" for city magistrates. Therefore, the council, "in the opinion of the old and suitable persons," men like Isaac de Forest and Frederick Lubbersen, who came to be among the best citizens of their generation in the province.—Ibid., III: 315.
The burgomasters and schepens resolve to petition Stuyvesant Jan. and the council for the privilege of appointing official with the approval of the supreme provincial authority. They formally made request on the 31st, as a privilege appointing to municipal offices for two weeks, because it is a "violation of the order in Netherland." Action is deferred."—Rec. N. Am., II: 272, 273; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 180.

The brewers of New Amsterdam ask the city court to prohibit Paulus van der Beeck, farmer of the burgers' excise on wine and beer, from working there, because it is a "violation of the order in Netherland."—Rec. N. Am., II: 272.

His salary is fixed at 250 guilders per annum. He is also to take six stewards for each morgen of land surveyed for private individuals and three stewards for every morgen surveyed for the council or company.—New Narr. Papers, No. 12259, pp. cit.

Willem Pietersen, also called De Groot, seeks permission from the burgomasters and schepens "to construct the sheet pling embankment; beschaving, a lining of planks, pales, or stone, in front of his lot on the East River, of stone." His neighbours having "sheeted with timber pursuant to the order" of the director-general and council, his request is placed before Stuyvesant for an opinion. This resulted, on the 29th, in a refusal of his request and instructions to raise his house and lot according to the general order."—Rec. N. Am., II: 275-276, 281.

Anthony Lodewyckszen Beek, nominated by the burgomasters and schepens, is confirmed as city jailer in the city hall of New Amsterdam.—Rec. N. Am., II: 283; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 180. As such an office is still a obligation . . . committed or delivered over to him by the Schout, Burgomasters and Schepens or Burgher Court Martial . . . or in their name," whether arrested in civil or criminal cases. It is obliged to "sleep every night in his ordinary chamber," even if there are no prisoners in jail. Searching of capital prisoners, periodical inspection of the cells, and cleaning of the prison every week are only a part of his duties, for which full instructions are given. Prisoners who are permitted to "sit in the prison chamber" are allowed candle light and fire; "but no fire nor light" is allowed "in any part of the prison" at any time.—Rec. N. Am., II: 294-296. This was the beginning of the first city jail administered by the city itself.

 Grain and lime measures for the city of New Amsterdam, nominated on the previous day, are now appointed.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 180. Jacques Leendertsen van der Grift and Michiel Janmarn, were appointed by a court messenger, according to another record, on the 19th.—Rec. N. Am., I: 50-51.

The vacant offices of orphan-master, city surveyor, and fire warden of New Amsterdam are filled by appointment of the council.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 181.

Ollof Stevensen van Cortlandt is elected a member of the orphan-masters' court.—Min. of Orph. Court, I: 29.

It having been found that "many burgurers and inhabitants" are throwing "their rubbish, filth, ashes, dead animals and such like things into the public streets," as well as into the craft or canals along street, the ordinance is published as putting an end to such nuisance in future and prescribing that "all such things must be brought to the most convenient of the following places to wit, the Strand [of the East River], near the city hall [Pearl St. and Coenties Alley], near the gallows [Pearl St. and Whitehall], near Hendrick [Williamsen] the baker [fourth-west corner of Bridge and Pearl St.], near Dar Daniel [irus [dots], just outside the water gate, Pearl near Wall Stj, where tokens to that effect are to be displayed. Times or punishment are prescribed for violations of the ordinance; moreover, "everybody" is enjoined to "keep the streets clean before his house or lot," or be likewise subject to the penalty.—Rec. N. Am., II: 297, 298; also 32, for continued violation.

Pieter Tonneman, whom the council appointed on the 6th Mar. to be a church-master at New Amsterdam in place of Nicassia de Sille, retired, is now confirmed in office by the burgomasters.

Govert Loockerman is his associate.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 143-144; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 181.

Pieter Cornelissen van der Veen, a merchant of New Amsterdam, Mar. 15, 1657, in a petition to the burgomasters, says he has "incurred great expense on his dwelling house at the corner of Pearl Street" (south-west corner of Pearl and Whitehall Sts.), and is "about to make greater improvements as an ornament thereunto." On that account, he asks them to provide "that a Square may remain and be made by resolution there." The burgomasters refer the case to Stuyvesant for settlement, but he declares "the aforesaid Square was disposed of, long before the distribution of the lots was granted to the Burgomasters," and therefore does not belong to them, so Veen is referred to Stuyvesant and the council, "if it dissatisfied."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 147, 149.

Jochemsen's daughter. He died in 1661, and, in 1663, his widow was married to Jacob Leidler, whose occupancy of the house, better known by his name, then had its beginning.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 231, 379. Purple, Marriage Records of Ref. Dutch Church, 16, 28. Innes, New Am. and Its People, 241-242. Certain lots in the city of New Amsterdam were granted in 1656 "to divers persons who were in want and had no places to build upon," and if some of these persons having failed to build or even make preparations therefor, "to the evident obstruction of population," the burgomasters now give notice and warn all delinquent grantees shall be "bound to make preparations within 14 days from date to build on their lots," or suffer forfeiture.—Rec. N. Am., 1663, 18. That this omission to fulfill the delinquents is evident from a provincial ordinance of Jan. 15, 1658, on the same subject.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 323-27; Rec. N. Am., I: 36-37; II: 301-3.

For some time it has been known in New Amsterdam, as well as in the tobacco trade, that some of these agents, have been committing frauds by the shipment of "poor, bad, rotten, moulder Tobacco," making gross overcharges for this poor stock, so that the importer cannot even "realize the ship's freight." A provincial law is now passed to provide for a better inspection of tobacco, namely, "the Virginia Tobacco . . . as well as that of New Netherlands." To prevent the fraudulent changing of brand marks on hogheads, a new system of branding of both Virginia and New Netherlands tobacco is prescribed for the different grades. Exported tobacco, designed for Holland, is subjected to inspection "by a proper, trustworthy and sworn person, in or in front of the Company's store," on the 20th of March, and before tobacco is "embarked or shipped." The poorest quality, which is marked zero, cannot be exported "except on the Shipper's own account," and his giving "sufficient security for the ship's freight and other charges" to be incurred. The bills of lading and invoices are obliged to carry the findings of the inspector as to quality and brand marks, "in addition to the Merchant's marks." A fine of one pound Flemish is fixed upon for every hoghead shipped in violation of this law.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 307-9.

Silkworm culture in New Netherland is proposed by the directors at Amsterdam, who send over "a small box with eggs, that the experiment" may "be made there also." In this correspondence they refer to bales of silk arrived at Amsterdam from the English in Virginia.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 388; more eggs were sent over in December of this year (ibid., XIV: 401), and in December, 1659 (ibid., XIV: 432).

The burgomasters at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant: "Concerning the proposed change of the value of your currency or reduction of the beaver and the wampum, we have after due consideration come to the conclusion, that depreciation of the currency means destruction of the commerce and consequently ruin of the country. To prevent greater improvements as an ornament thereunto. On this account, he asks them to provide "that a Square may remain and be made by resolution there." The reduction on the currency value of beavers from 8 to 6 guilders is deferred.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant and the council "that they have" by no means the intention to grant the Lutherans any more liberties than theirs. "On account of this," in their letter of June 14, 1656, and by which they still stand.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 358. For full particulars of the Lutheran controversy, see Oct. 4, 1653.

The directors at Amsterdam inform Stuyvesant that they are still resolved "not to separate the office of Schout [of New Amsterdam] from that of the Fiscal . . . that the duties of both be performed by one person."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 388. See Nov. 7, 1656.

It appears that Stuyvesant and the council have applied to the directors, at Amsterdam for some ship carpenters, but that the directors, thinking that house carpenters were meant, "because of the small shipping owned there [New Netherland] by the Company," reply that it is expensive to engage such people, "and therefore trade as carpentering, brick-laying, blacksmithing and others ought to be taught to the negroes, as it was formerly done in Brazil," they further that "this ship has sufficient fitness for it," and that it will be "very advantageous."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 387.

Nicholas Verleth (or Varlet) is appointed by the council as commissary of imports and exports, and Warmer Wessels is chosen inspector and sealed to the company. On the 31st, Verleth, as storekeeper, was granted permission to receive merchants' goods on storage in the public store of the Company.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 183, 184.

Andries Jochemsen petitions the burgomasters and schepens for permission to still remain in the tavern, which is granted on condition that he take out a proper license.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 155. It was conducted in his "great house," the most southerly one of three which he owned on the present sites of Nos. 125 to 131 Pearl St. See Castle Plan II: 327-8.

On Jan. 17, 1656, Seton Tonnenman demanded that Jochemsen be fined 28 guilders for having tapped for three negros on Sunday during the time of preaching, contrary to law, and requested that he "be condemned not to tap any more for a year and six weeks," paying also the costs of the prosecution. The court ordered Jochemsen to "deposit the money with the Secretary" of the city, and provisionally ordered him "not to tap."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 9. On Jan. 24, the case came up again. A petition from Jochemsen was considered, in which he declared that, if given time "until the next Court day," he would "prove to the contrary" the charges against him. The schout was, therefore, ordered "to produce further proofs" on the River Hackensack, but, if the defendant should appear with witnesses.—Ibid., IV: 13-14. On Jan. 31, the court examined further into the charges and decided "that the negroes of Cornelis Steenwyck, Govert Lockermans and Tomas Hall be summoned" to court on the next court day—Ibid., IV: 12. On Feb. 1, the schout produced his papers to the suit, and requested that Jochemsen "be ordered to produce by the next Court day the papers in his defence, on pain of deprivation of right," to which the court agreed.—Ibid., IV: 33-34. On Feb. 28, the schout appeared about the aforesaid negroes. Resolved Waldron acted as their interpreter, and they were asked "one by one . . . if they had not drank one Sunday during the preaching, at Andries Jochemsen's house!" Their testimony disagreed, but in the main showed they were at his place only once, when the preaching was nearly over. The case was continued until the next court day.—Ibid., IV: 41-42. On March 7, the schout re-inspected "the definitive judgment on the monies deposited" by Jochemsen regarding the irregular tapping on the Sabbath to negroes and heard the 28 Feb. last. Jochemsen again denied the charge. He was asked to swear "that he gave no drink, either directly or indirectly, himself or by his wife, at the time when Steenwyck's negro may have tapped." The court decided the judgment, stated that he confirmed the same "on oath at the hands of the President," and the court then excused him from the fine and dismissed the case.—Ibid., IV: 45-46.

Seton Tonnenman, however, kept an eye on Jochemsen. On June 12, 1656, he charged in court that Jochemsen had violated the ordinances for tavern-keepers, alleging "that he saw people sitting" at his house "at night between ten and eleven," which was contrary to the law, which required that "no person can eat after tine o’clock.” Jochensem denied the charge. He said they merely "sat together conversing with each other, among other things of the sale of houses.” The court then simply reprimanded him, which was done in his absence from the chamber.—Ibid., IV: 254-55. But on June 26, however, on June 26, 1657, the court decided that they did not continue to make such charges and ordered the Jochensem fined 25 guilders "for having sold drink by the pot, found to be too small, . . . depraving the public and wronging them intentionally;” also the schout requested another fine of 34 guilders "for having there found on Sunday, being the 17th instant, seven @ 6 persons bowling and two others sitting ticktacking or playing baggakom," in violation of provincial ordinances recently renewed by the city court. Jochensem said in rebuttal that he had "not tapped with the pots seized nor made any use of them, admitting that he tapped, but that such was done after the preaching at the Bowery was over.” This referred to the service at Stuyvesant’s bowery. The court condemned him to pay a fine of ten guilders "for having tapped with unstaumped and under sized claws," and decreed "that no tavernkeeper can have in his house any other pots than those of full size and stamped” as the law requires. The rest of the charges were dismissed.—Ibid., IV: 264-65.

Tibout Riversen asks the burgomasters for permission to keep a tavern in New Amsterdam, but they answer that it cannot be allowed until he has purchased his burgheeright in the city.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 154.

Jaco Cohen Hendrikus, or Henriqueus, a Jew, asks the burgomasters for “permission to bake and sell bread” in New Amsterdam, “as other bakers, with closed door.” The request is denied as “directly contrary” to the special privileges granted to the burghers and as contrary to the orders of the directors at Amsterdam. On the same day, Aver Levy, another Jew, petitions “to be admitted a Burgher;” claims it ought not to be denied him, because he keeps "watch and ward (toch en wacht)" like other Burghers, and exhibits to the burgomasters a certificate of his burgheeright in old Amsterdam. They decree, “as before,” that it cannot be granted, and refer him to Stuyvesant as the council.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 154.

A second general survey of New Amsterdam was finished shortly after this time by Jacques Cortelyou, who was appointed surveyor-general on October 1, 1656. This survey, with the exception of the city hall and the city hall’s lot, was completed by May 3, 1657, a time considerably, in some localities, streets, lots, and fences.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 156-60.

For the general survey made in the previous year, see Feb. 25, 1656.

Certain neighbors of Marten Cregier or Krijger “on the Grant” (ditch or canal, now Broad Street) petition for the repair of the Grant,” but the burgomasters defer the determination of the matter "until the general survey vide infra be done.”—Rec. N. Am., VII: 156.

This survey was completed within a few weeks thereafter, and, on June 26, the burgomasters appealed to Stuyvesant and the council for a loan to the city of 1,000 to 1,500 florins, with which to repair "the City’s works as well at the City Hall as the sheet piling at the Grant etc." and promised "to repay it from the City revenue” at the earliest opportunity. Work of excavating and sheeting the grant, so as to make it accessible for small boats, was declared to be "just commenced,” on Dec. 3, when it was also issued a loan of 250 florins. On June 26, demand was made of the city hall by the house holders or their servants, and "again filling up” what had been excavated. On Jan. 26, 1658, the city authorities were reminded that no accounting had ever been made for the loan, which had amounted to 1,000 florins ($500), received by them for the purchase "of de burgts wal” (canal).—Ibid., II: 313; VII: 162, 170.

Sheeting of a part of the grant had been first put up before the summer of 1654, for we find in August of that year that heavy rains and tides had broken down the planking thereof, necessitating a reconstruction.—Ibid., I: 231. The larger operations began in 1657 proceeded slowly. On Feb. 21, 1658, the city court summoned before it "the three laborers of the gracht” (canal), and asked them "why they did not continue the work." The court then reminded the three laborers that they had already replied that the weather was unfavourable. They were told that complaints were being made against them because there was no filling in, and they were ordered to go on with their work at once and “not stop.”—Ibid., II: 316; VII: 173. The work on the Heere Gracht, as it was now called, was completed in 1659 (ibid., VII: 210, 215), and cost 2,792 florins, which amount was levied early in 1660 on the owners of lots on both sides of the canal.—Ibid., VII: 246-47.

The "neighbors in the Glaziers Street” petition the burgomasters "for a cart way to the Strand” of the East River, and are informed that their request will be given "further attention” as soon as "the general survey" of the city is made.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 156. The street referred to was the Sylck Steegh (Muddy Lane), now South William Street. "Glaziers Street" was an allusion to Evert Duyckingh, the glazier, who lived and had his business there. The street was an impasse at the time. As an insurrection, the lane was cut through, and since Street (William Street) was extended. See Pl. 826, Castello Plan of 1660, and II: 299.

Warraer Wessels and Paulus van Beeck, farmers of the weigh-scales at New Amsterdam, ask the burgomasters to have "a sworn attendant on the scale" appointed, according to the custom in Holland, and propose the name of Joost Goderisen (or Goderus) for the place, "promising to give him a reasonable fee from themselves in addition to his ordinary salary . . . , and even to keep the great book” (ledger as distinguished from journal). As the weigh-scales concern the company, the matter is referred to Stuyvesant. On the 26th, Goderisen received the appointment and took his oath of office to "do equal justice to every one, both buyer and seller, . . . and duty and honestly enter all that shall be weighed.”—Rec. N. Am., VII: 155, 156-57. At the same time, Wessels asked "that the weigh-scales and the weighing-room be corrected and stamped,” they being "not correct.”—Ibid., VII: 157.

Pursuant to an order of the burgomasters to the inhabitants of New Amsterdam, to make known what damage they have sustained by the survey of the city in this year, Daniel Litscho asks an award for a lot “taken away by the survey.” Other claims included Johannes Nevius, for a lot; Madaline Vincent, for part of a lot cut off for making a road; Jan Vigne, on behalf of his sister, Rachel, widow of Cornelis van Tienhoven, "for the lot through which the road is run;” Allard Anthony, "for the survey through his garden and the taking away his lot given again to Borger Jorisen in satisfaction for Borger’s lot, through which the street was run;” Albert Leendertsen, “for the survey through his lot, which was granted his wife” by the city.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 158-59, 164.

Among the claims put in against the city is one by "the heirs of dec’d Ariansene Cuville” (Adrienne Cuville, mother of Jan Vincke), "for breaking of fences, and damage and injuries, etc., in consequence of running the Walls of this City through their land.” The burgomasters disallow the claim, because it is for damages resulting from the survey of 1656, whereas their recently-issued order relates only to damages claimed for losses resulting from the later survey of 1657.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 159. For the surveys referred to, see Feb. 25, 1656; April 19, 1657.

The burgomasters issue a formal notice to the inhabitants of New Amsterdam to regulate their fees “according to the general survey” just completed, and to do so within two weeks after due notice.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 160.

Daniel Litscho demands payment from the city for planking which he delivered “for the arranging the shore piling” of the East River.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 158.

The "Deputats ad causas Indicas” report to the classic of Amsterdam that "a Lutheran minister named John Earsent,” who has been "named "blind water" of the North River” (Madison), and recommend a remonstrance to the burgomasters of old Amsterdam as an aid in securing from the directors of the West India Co., Amsterdam chamber, a refusal of permission to the Lutherans overseas to "freely exercise their forms of worship.”—Eccles. Rec., I: 157. For full particulars about the Lutheran controversy, see Oct. 4, 1653.

Owing to the bad management of the finances of the West India Co. in New Netherland, the directors at Amsterdam draw up a new plan of financial administration, so that they may "for once . . . see well and correctly keep books." They appoint John J. Clark, chief administrator of the company, as their agent in New Netherland; he also serves as a member of Stuyvesant’s council, and commits "the funds and books of the treasury to the care of Secretary Van Reuven" (Cornelis van Ruveny)—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 391.

The specifications of this interesting plan of reform are printed in extenso in ibid., 392-43.

De Decker was formally commissioned by the provincial council on Dec. 20, 1667, and a copy of his commission was filed on March 19, of the next year.—Rec. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 192.

On July 23, 1669, Stuyvesant and the council informed the directors that the "accurate accounts" kept by Van Ruveny "served the dismissal of objections." They give general satisfaction to everyone.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 443.

Jacques Cortelyou surveys for Cornelis Janzen Pluvier a house and lot. On the following Nov. 17, Pluvier acknowledged before the schepen an indebtedness on the property due to Christian Barenzen, from whom he had purchased the same.—Liber Mortgages, 1654-1660, 129-31; Rec. N. Am., IV: 73.

On Jan. 16, 1672 (p. v.), the Lutheran congregation was already seeking permission from Gov. Lovelace to erect another house of worship, and sent an agent to the Delaware country to solicit contributions for that purpose.—Ex. Coun. Min. (ed. by V. H. Paltzko), II: 587, 589. On Oct. 17, 1675 (p. v.), the new Dutch governor, Colvile, ordered the removal of certain buildings, among them the house on the old Pluvier plot, and gave the Lutherans in exchange lot No. 5 in the Company’s Garden, on May 22, 1674 (p. v.). This new site was near the south-west corner of Broadway and Rector St. The original site of the first Lutheran Church was on land now a part of the Trinity Churchyard.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 133; N. Y. Col. Doc., XII: 617-76, 716; N. Y. Col. MSS., XXIII: 435-36. The original grant of May 22, 1674 (p. v.), is still preserved in the New-York Historical Society. The present church, the Second Lutheran, is at 224-25; also, for history of Lutheran Church, see Oct. 4, 1653.

Stuyvesant and the council address a missive to the directors at Amsterdam, the text of which has not been known hitherto, although a contemporary extract is preserved in N. Neth. Papers, No. 1122 (7), in N. Y. Pub. Library, and an answer of the directors, in part, of Sept. 15, is printed in N. Y. Col. Doc., XII: 197-98; XIII: 72-74; XIV: 397-99. On account of its importance, a digest of the principal new items is given here, viz.: Indians bold, therefore the order for all settlers to concentrate on their farms; ask advice on order in regard to price of beavers in wampum; Rensselaerswyck unwilling to pay tenths or other taxes, ask advice therein; the income of about 65,000 florins has been in beavers, wampum, etc.; effects of late receiver, Cornelis van Tienhoven, put under arrest until books of accounts have been examined; asks for masons; French continue in "Sindeske" (Seneca) country, and a Jesuit lives also near Fort Orange; Jan de Decker’s misunderstandings at Fort Orange, and La Montagne to be sent there instead; transfer to Jacob Aibrich (Alrich) of Fort Casemare, now called Nieuw Amstel, on behalf of the burgomasters of Amsterdam; garrison of Casemare departs immediately to Fort Cristiano, now called Albcric; order solders to go to Verycountry now called Catteneburg, not a fort, but only a plantation (Hof), and left deserted by order of late Swedish Gov. Prints; man who lives on Werckhoven’s boowery (New Utrecht, L. I.), a surveyor (Jacques Cortelyou), desires to go to South (Delaware) River, and knows Jacob Alrich; soldiers on the boowery of Heer vander Capellen (Staten Island); inquiry as to whether the ministers at New Amsterdam who live in the company’s houses should seek cottages to reside in; want medicaments for horses, 600 lbs. of powder, paper, and books; solders left at Fort Casemare putting up quarters on Cuypers Island, because Fort Cristiano is ruined; Director Alrich takes oxen, cows, and horses and other necessary things from Swedes, left at the capitol; authority over the South River, and lands of Swedes there should fall finally to the new burgomasters of village or town should be formed near Fort Altena; convenience of trade with the Micrones, and Pieter Tonneman to look into it; Jan Paul Jacquet, against whom many complaints were made, is replaced.

Jacob Kip, who has been city clerk from the beginning of the city government seven years, resigns his office, and requests that a successor be appointed. On the following day, however, the council ordered his continuance in office until he had finished the transcribing of the records in his care, and at the same time Timotheus Gabry was appointed to succeed him.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 186, 187. Gabry did not continue long in this office, having been succeeded by Johannes Nevius by the following January.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 168.

The council gives notice that crops shall not be removed from the field until the "teenth" of the preceding year have been paid.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 186, 187.

"A renewal is made of laws pertaining to Sabbath observance (see Oct. 16, 1650), against selling liquor to Indians (see June 18, 1651), and smuggling; designating the anchorage for ships at the port of New Amsterdam; providing for postal regulations, and putting a ban on fast driving through the streets of the city.—Land & Ord. N. Orth., 313.

Stuyvesant and the council pass an ordinance regulating the delivery of incoming mail.—Laws & Ord., N. Neth., 313; see summary under Aug. 6, 1652.

The burgomasters, Allard Anthony and Paulus Lencereus, on 16 vander Grift, represent to Stuyvesant and the council that they are "forced almost entirely to neglect their private affairs relating to their families," on account of their daily preoccupation with the city’s affairs. They say they attend "all ordinary and extraordinary Court days along with the Schepens," sit every Thursday on city business, and are also obliged to "attend to building, pluming, surveying and a multitude of Burgher matters." It appears that Nicasius de Sille, the schout, is endeavouring to "depose the said Burgomasters from their presidency, and to make himself president of the Bench," a right they claim by concession of the provincial council with approval of the directors at Amsterdam. Therefore, "in order not to nullify the privileges given and granted," to their court, the burgomasters ask for their dismissal "from the Bench of Schepens," so as to be able to "properly attend to the matters concerning their office and the City," and request that "the presidency of the Schou and the Schepens" be disposed of by the director-general of the N. W. Co. The resolution of the Burgomasters of Schepens must have been disallowed by the provincial authorities, although the records are incomplete and do not reveal the answer given to the burgomasters, but show that they never were separated from that duty.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 162-65.

Johannes Earnestus Gutwasser, the first Lutheran clergyman sent to New Netherland, arrives at New Amsterdam in the ship "Goode Mueen," "to the great joy of the Lutherans, but to the special displeasure and uneasiness" of the Reformed Church in the city.—Evangel. Rec., I: 391-94. Brodhead, op. cit., I: 635. For particulars of the Lutheran controversy, see Oct. 4, 1657.

Christiaan Barenzen receives a ground-brief for a lot, including what is now the south-east corner of Wall St. and Broadway, the south-west corner of New and Wall Sts., the bed of Wall St., between the corner of New St. and Broadway, and a part of the bed of New St.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II and III: 586; Rec. N. Am., VII: 158.

Megapolensis and Drisius, the Dutch clergymen of New Amsterdam, write to the Classis of Amsterdam:

"We have had an Indian here with us for about two years. He can read and write Dutch very well. We have instructed him in the fundamentals, now called the articles of faith, and he answers publicly in church, and can repeat the Commandments. We have given him a Bible, hoping he might yet do some good among the Indians, but it all resulted in nothing. He took to drinking brandy, he pawned the Bible, and turned into a regular beast, doing more harm there than good among the Indians."—Evangel. Rec., I: 398-99. See July 15, 1654.
On this day a strange ship approached the fort, "having no flag flying from the topsmast, nor from any other place on the ship." 6 It fired "no salute before the fort," as was "usual with ships on their arrival," and "no honor or respect" was accorded the flagship when he boarded her. The matter of the ship, when he came aboard and inquired of the assistant, "resembled a Lyons vessel." The assistant stood still with "his hat firm on his head, as if a goat." With some difficulty, Stuyvesant learned that the ship had "come from London in about eight weeks," and at last discovered that it was "a ship with Quakers on board." She sailed away again on the next night, bringing on board and landing amongst the people, apparently, in the language of the Dutch clergymen, Megapolismen and Driusius, who recorded the particulars about the ship, "all the cranks of New England retire." 10

These Quakers left at New Amsterdam "two strong young women" (Mary Weatherhead and Dorothy Waugh), who, "as soon as the ship had fairly departed . . . began to quake and go into a frenzy, and cry out loudly in the middle of the street, that men should repent, for the day of judgment was at hand." The inhabitants, "not knowing what was the matter, ran to and fro, while one cried 'Fire,' and another something else." The upshot of the matter was the arrest of the women by the fiscal and an assistant, who "seized them both by the head, and led them to prison." On the way, and in prison, the women "continued to cry out and pray according to their manner," and "from this circumstance," the Dutch clergymen perceived that "the devil is in the streets somewhere." —Entire Rec., I: 399-400, 409-410, 426; cf. Broedhro, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 616.

The smuggling of imported goods into New Netherland continues, "under the name and cloak of Sailor's freight," and is detrimental to the company, the farmer of the revenue, and reputable merchants, who are unable to compete with those who evade the customs duties. A provincial act of this date prohibits "all Skippers, Ship's Officers and Sailors" from bringing "with them any goods or merchandises, under the name of Sailor's freight, without exhibiting" in port a "correct list thereof signed" by their master, and, moreover, not of a value above two months' wages, under a penalty of forfeiting "unentered Merchandise or goods." —Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 314-15; cf. 346, art. 21. The directors at Amsterdam, on Dec. 22, approved with some modifications this act of their representatives in New Netherland, and sent over printed copies of the revision to be placed. They reverted to the subject in subsequent correspondence. There was some question as to the meaning of the clause about not bringing in a value above two months' wages, as to whether the same was subject to or exempt from duty. So, on Dec. 22, 1659, the directors informed Stuyvesant and the council that it had never been their intention to prevent tradesmen in the ship to bring a little into New Netherland "to trade to the amount of two months' pay without paying duties." —N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 400, 419, 440, 427, 430-31, 438, 448.

Stuyvesant writes a letter to the directors at Amsterdam, the purport of which has been known only in part from an answer of the directors, on Dec. 22 (printed in N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 75-76; XIV: 399-401), although a contemporary extract exists, in New Neth. Papers, No. 1222 (3.), in N. Y. Pub. Library. Stuyvesant discusses affairs at Curacoa; a Spanish price, Capt. Augustin Beaulieu, a Frenchman, commander; Lutherans; massacre of Indians, etc.; soldiers wanted; provincial salaries, 33,000 guilders.

The consistory of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Amsterdam, Holland, receives a letter from the Rev. Johannes Ernestus Götzwasser, relating to further experiences in New Amsterdam, and enclosing certified extracts from resolutions of Stuyvesant and his council, of Sept. 4, 1657, in regard to himself. —From archives of Evan. Luth. Church, Amsterdam. See also Aug. 14, 1677.

The financial records of the West India Co., from this date until the end of June, 1658, show receipts in New Netherland from ordinances/ordonnantien, 7,927,758 florins; and expenditures for monthly wages of employees, 4,249,833 florins; also, for the monthly pay of soldiers, 79,715 florins. It is doubtful if these accounts are complete. —New Neth. Papers, No. 1220, in N. Y. Pub. Library.

Thirteen ships' recognizances of goods to and from New Netherland produce receipts of 31,166 florins for the West India Co. —New Neth. Papers, No. 1220, in N. Y. Pub. Library.

The city authorities, with the approval of Stuyvesant and the council, forbid everyone from building "within a cannonshot from the City's wall." On Jan. 15, 1658 (g. 6), the provincial government declared by ordinance that "no Dwelling-houses" should "be built near or under the Walls or Gates" of the city, until the vacant lots in the city had been properly improved and built upon. —Rec. N. Am., I: 32, 375; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 327.

Formal notice is given by the city authorities to everybody under their jurisdiction, regulating the slaughter and consumption of "any ox, cow, calf, sheep, lamb, hog or goat" from this time until Sept. 26, 1658, as well as the use of imported, salt, or fresh, meat. —Rec. N. Am., I: 32.

The Lutheran clergyman, Johannes Ernestus Götzwasser, is ordered by Stuyvesant and the council to depart from New Amsterdam "Waag" (Scales) whereby he is ready to return to Holland. On Oct. 10, some of his people petitioned to have the order set aside, but the provincial authorities were obdurate and demanded compliance, saying that two ships had sailed since he was first ordered departed on September 4th. —Entire Rec., I: 405-7. For particular accounts of the Lutheran controversy, see Oct. 4, 1653.

Stuyvesant and the council address a misive to the directors at Amsterdam, the text of which has not hitherto been known, although a contemporary extract exists, in New Neth. Papers, No. 1222 (8.), in N. Y. Pub. Library, and an answer of the directors, of May 20, 1658, it is printed in N. Y. Col. Docs., XII: 214; XIII: 80; XIV: 417-20. On account of its importance, a digest of principal new items is given here, viz: Inventory of goods in ship "De Hey," sent on behalf of the Swedes on the Delaware; Cornelis van Ruyten to keep correct accounts of the company's exchanges; complaints against Albrich, that ship "De Waag," laden with clap-boards, was detained, and freight of merchants at the Delaware left behind; James Grover, a sedulous English merchant, acquaintance of George Baxter and James Haybert (Hubbard), who, in 1653, set up the arms of Cromwell at Red Bank, New Jersey, received in turn from Grover a letter, which he brought back to the village of Gravesend on purpose to have it read there, but the authorities of Gravesend sent the letter unopened to the provincial authorities at New Amsterdam; fear that English on Long Island will revolt and go under protection of England; Indians on the Long Island who took a 100 Powder and 2,000 florins in the New Netherland; masons needed for repair of the forts and company's works; no able negroes fit to learn a trade; express surprise that the company should allow a Lutheran preacher to come over, since a state of unity is not promoted thereby; books of the receiver, Cornelis van Tienhoven, have been badly kept, but to be put in shape, and sent to the directors with the first ship; map of the South (Delaware) River, made by Aneys Hude, to be sent to the directors; beer and wine sent to Virginia, etc., etc.; tobacco; fierce murders daily by the Indians; ask that powder be sent over with all ships for the magazine; proper orders against smugglers; passage money paid by the company.

Previously published laws relating to an inhibition against the bringing on board and landing amongst the people, without the knowledge of the Fiscal or his deputy" have not been "observed as they ought to be," and the company is thereby "subjected to serious loss of revenue." A new law demands a "stiffer observance," and prohibits loading of any goods on vessels before "duly entered," under a penalty of confiscation. —Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 316.

The consistory of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Amsterdam, Holland, receives a letter from the Rev. Stuyvesant addresses a particular letter to the directors at Amsterdam, the text of which has not been known hitherto, though contemporary extracts are preserved in New Neth. Papers, Nos. 1222 (8), and 1223 (4), in N. Y. Pub. Library, and it is cited in a letter of the directors, of May 20, 1658, printed in N. Y. Cal. Doct., XIV: 418. A digest of some important parts is given here, viz.: English at the eastern end of Long Island seek, through a written request of Cromwell, to be taken under the government; their hope built upon a missive written by Cromwell, "To the English well affected on long island, in America," which letter was brought into the village of Gravesande (Gravesend), and the messenger sought to have it opened and read there; Cromwell's letter and enclosures sent to Holland, etc.; advises the directors of keeping a watchful eye on the situation, so that the whole of Long Island may not be spoiled for the company through a revolt of the English, and thus become a total loss to Dutch, as well as the whole region of the North River; recommends sending over more free persons, to strengthen the population; complaint of inhabitants against Capt. H. de Raeth, skipper of "De Waech;" all goes well with the English masters at New Amsterdam, but carpenters are needed; wants 18 to 20 sledge-hammers (maocheren) to split clapboards, some iron and coal; complaint about smuggling of wampum 'under cover of the colony of New Amstel on the Delaware; complaint against Skipper De Raeth for his inconsideration; Stuyvesant seeks permission to go over to Holland.

The burgomasters order "that a notice be drawn up about the stealing of the timber" by persons in the city, and "also a placard of the king's letter of the present Broad Street."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 169. Regarding the latter subject, see Feb. 20, 1657; and regarding the former, see Dec. 3, 1657.

A provincial ordinance for regulating the currency is passed by Stuyvesant and his council. It follows in general the premisses of the suspended law of Jan. 3 of this year (which see for particulars), but shows a variation in the tabulated prices of necessaries, namely, "articles of food and drink." The new ordinance is designed "to introduce some better order herein, as far as possible," since nothing better has been discovered "after much serious consideration and advice, even of the Lords Patrons themselves." Therefore, wampum is declared to be "in trade an absolute merchandise, to buy, barter, sell and rebarter it at wholesale, according to the value and quality thereof. But, inasmuch as Wampum, for want of Gold and Silver Coin, as already stated, must still serve as smaller change, it is necessary to reduce the value of the Counting House [Pearl near Broad St.], the Wampum due the Company for Rents or other outstanding debts," and to "keep, receive and pay it out at Beaver value, the Beaver being reckoned still, and until further advised from Fatherland, at 8 guilders; therefore, fixing and reducing the Wampum at the general Counting House, provisionally, from six to eight White for one stiver, and from three to four Black Beads for one stiver, at which rate Wampum shall be received and paid out, after the publication and postage hereof, at the general Counting House, without any distinction of persons; provided that the Wares, labor or services charged to the Company shall be computed according to the value so much lower, at least not higher, than the price of Beaver. If, on the other hand the Receivers are willing to continue the old rate, the Director General and Council resolve and ordain that the Company, or its servants on its part, can then agree respecting the quantity or portion of Wares or goods it is ordinarily current. Since some persons may have in their possession "a large quantity of Wampum," a recognized commodity, and suffer loss from sudden action, Stuyvesant and the council declare that they "do not intend, by this reduction of the Wampum at the general Counting House, any alteration or impairing of it in Private Contracts, Agreements or sales of Merchandise heretofore made or hereafter to be made," and they grant the privilege to public debtors, who pay within three months at the company's counting-house, to rate at six white and three black beads to a stiver, after which time all payments must conform with the new rate. This ordinance is in force until Dec. 6, 1658.

On July 11, 1658, the burgomasters of New Amsterdam resolved "to propose to the Board of Burgomasters and Schepens the regulation of the Seawant (Wampum)."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 189. On Sept. 14 following, the city court "resolved to fix the seawant at eight white and four black beads for one stiver, and to communicate the same" to Stuyvesant.—Ibid., III: 10. In this communication, which was sent on Sept. 19, they said that they perceived the great quality of Wampum, and its being brought from N. England to the great advantage of the latter and loss of this place, inasmuch as those of N. England give 25 per cent more of the seawant they bring higher, whereby this place is so overstocked that it is held in no esteem, and bakers, brewers, traders, laborers, and others are so particular, that much difficulty is experienced in disposing of the provisions; and therefore, "provisionally to fix the seawant at eight white and four black beads for a stiver," if Stuyvesant and the council considered it "for the advantage of the Communality."—Ibid., III: 16; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 201. The new ordinance was issued on Nov. 11, 1658 (p. 300).

Meanwhile, however, the burgomasters and schepens wrote to the directors at Amsterdam, telling them that "the money and daily currency in this Province, and especially in this City of New Amsterdam, consists of seawant, in which great deprecation occurs, and also are many complaints of the same price rising, and that the public benefit can be done with it with the merchants, traders, shopkeepers, bakers, brewers and other such like, or any thing with difficulty be bought for it, unless goods be paid for at three to four hundred per cent, and Their trade has very much declined, and they get aid from over to Stuyvesant silver coin of an unusual stamp or mint, and having received that, better order can be introduced then by the General and Council in the Seawant and beavers."—Rec. N. Am., III: 17. The directors at Amsterdam, in a long letter to Stuyvesant and the council, on Feb. 13, 1659, revealed that Stuyvesant had sent them a "private letter" in which he had said "that it would be very desirable, if coin could be brought to New Netherland. They, however, saw "as yet no chance for it, there being many more places in the world, where this kind of currency is not to be found, as for instance among the people along the Gold Coast of Africa, where for want of it they make shift with some kinds of dress goods or small shells or other objects of little value, which for all that has quite as good a circulation, for anything will pass as currency in trade, as long as a value is placed upon and benefit derived from it." They added: "Even if we saw any chance and had the means to bring coin into the country, we see no way of keeping it there, especially as long as so much is lost on the return cargoes from there. The experience in Brazil has taught us the same lesson, for notwithstanding that the gold and silver coins were made 25 to 39 c. lighter, specie could not be held there, but was very much expired." "The general Commerce of the whole country, is a further crying down of wampum by a general reduction of it." They did not agree with Stuyvesant's limitation of the reduction "only in the Company's office," but were "quite sure that a general reduction will cheapen all commodities and goods and therefore the laborer and the people generally will profit more by it, than the natives" (Indians).—N. Y. Cal. Doct., XIV: 418. See also Oct. 9, 1658.

Claes van Eehtlandt, Jr., one of the city court messengers, is ordered by the burgomasters to find out from the persons who have obtained recent grants of lots from the city if they will begin to build on them, and to inform those who will to make their appearance at the city hall on the morning of Dec. 6. On that day (not the 9th, as of record) a number of persons appeared in regard to this matter, or to be interrogated as to setting the bank of the East River (de Wael) before their lots. Hendrick Willemens, butcher, also agreed with the burgomasters to set up a fence beside the city hall.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 166-68.

Complaints having been made to the burgomasters and schepens that many of the tapsters of New Amsterdam are luring their patrons to linger unduly long in their taverns, not only taking from them their drinks but also receiving goods in payment for more drink, to the impoverishment of families, who have become a burden to the deaconry or poormasters of the city, the tavern-keepers are now therefore forbidden "to receive in pawn any goods, of whatever nature they may be, such as clothing, furnis-

"...er's, or the like," to sell or pawn. These provisions are fixed for infractions.—Rec. N. Am., I: 33-34; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 120. Cf. Peterson & Edwards, op. cit., 59-61.
Frequent complaints having been made to the city authorities Dec. 3 that timber for piling, for building houses, etc., is being stolen and carried off, the burgomasters, on Nov. 15, ordered that a notice be drawn up on the subject. Such a notice is now issued by them and the sheriffs, prescribing "arbitrary correction for the first offense; death for the second; and an exemplary sentence on all, who are guilty of the theft, and abettors are to be punished likewise.—Rec. N. Am., I: 333; VII: 163.

The surgeons of the city are required, whenever they dress a wound for a patient, to find out who wounded him, and to make a report thereof to the solicit.—Rec. N. Am., I: 348.

Digging for the graft (in Broad St.) is "just commenced."—See Apr. 19, 1657.

In a fire ordinance enacted by Stuyvesant and the council, they declare as follows: "Further, whereas in all well ordered Cities and Towns it is customary that Fire-buckets, Ladders and Hooks be found provided about the corners of streets and in Public houses, in order to be the better prepared in time of need, which is more necessary here than elsewhere, because, for want of stone [or brick], many Wooden Houses are built within this City, the one adjoining the other; Therefore . . . [we] Order and authorize the Burgomasters of this City, and the Sheriffs, for the time being, shall at once promptly demand, collect or cause to be collected, from each house, whether large or small, One beaver or eight guilders in Wampum, according to the rate at the Counting House, in order, with the proceeds thereof, to be sent, by the first opportunity, to Flanders for one hundred to be paid for the building of Fire-buckets, and for the balance to have some Fire-buckets and Fire-hooks immediately made, and, further, once a year, from each Chimney, one guilder for a supplement and repairs thereof."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 333; Rec. N. Am., I: 343-35. See Jan. 18, 1656; July 1, 1660; Aug. 27, 1661.

Pursuant to this order, the burgomasters ordered the city treasurer, on June 15, 1658, "to proceed with the bucket money."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 185. And, on Aug. 1, four of the shoemakers of the city were called before the burgomasters, who informed them that it was "intended that the whole of the buckets made, showing them, with that view, two made in this country, to give their opinion thereon and the lowest price" they would make them for. One declined to bid; another declared there were no materials to be had. Finally, the burgomasters contracted with Reinout Reinaute and Adriaen van Laer on the following conditions: "Reinout Reinaute undertakes to make the aforesaid buckets and to do everything that shall be necessary to them except cordage, for which of which he shall receive, six guilders ten stivers, half zwaant half beavers; it being well understood, that the fourth part of the beavers shall be half beavers and three quarters of the whole, and on the aforesaid conditions a contract is entered into with him for one hundred buckets, which he promises to manufacture between this and fourteen days after All Saints." Van Laer contracted, on the same conditions, for fifty buckets.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 191-92. The court messenger of the city bench was told by the burgomasters, on Aug. 8, 1658, "to go again around and to receive himself the bucket money;" while on Oct. 1, the city treasurer was instructed to hold in the treasury whatever the court messenger collected, and to record the names of delinquents and report them to the burgomasters.

That there was opposition to this tax is evident; so too that there were delinquents. For on Nov. 29, 1658, the court messenger, Pieter Schaffiink, was ordered out again on a collection tour. This time he was instructed to get from the recalcitrants an answer as to whether they would or would not pay the levy.—Ibid., VII: 192, 194, 201.

On Jan. 4, 1659, the treasurer reported to the burgomasters that "nothing comes in from the bucket money," so the court messenger was told to hand over the assessment lists and returns to the treasurer who, in turn, was to show the presiding burgomaster the names of those who "failed to pay the bucket money, that the treasurer might tell the burgomasters."—Ibid., VII: 206. On Jan. 10, Reinaute brought to the city hall 100 "leather fire-buckets," as per contract; and at the same time Van Laer brought 25.—Ibid., VII: 207.

Immediately, the burgomasters made provision for the hanging up of the buckets, which were to be numbered, as follows: to the city hall, nos. 1-50; at Daniel Litscho's, nos. 51-64; at Abraham Planc's house in the Smith's Valley, nos. 65-74; at Joannes Pietersen Verbruggen's, nos. 75-86; at Paulus Lendertsen van Drift's, nos. 87-98; at Nicolas de Sille's in the Sheep Pasture, nos. 99-110; at Pieter Wulpertsen van Couwenhoven's, nos. 111-122; and others at the houses of Jan Jansen, the younger, Hendrick Hendrichs Kipe, the elder, and Jacobus Backer.—Ibid., VII: 207.

The burgomaster having inspected the fire-buckets, on Jan. 31, reported no. 124 missing, but made record of 122 others as placed according to former orders at houses named. The same day Van Laer brought 25 more buckets to the city hall, the balance of those he contracted for, which were "taken away by Evert Duycking to put the City Arms on them and to number them."—Ibid., VII: 209.

Paulus Lendertsen van Drift, the new city treasurer, was ordered on Feb. 28, 1659, not to collect "bucket money individually from the poor people" who lived "in hired houses" and could not afford the assessment; but to levy one half the amount and charge it "to the account of the owners" of the houses. The unpaid assessments were now to be collected by the treasurer through Resolved Walderom, the under-schout, and by one of the court messengers, for the amounts registered on the revised assessment lists.—Ibid., VII: 21 1-14. Vander Grit was able to report, on March 28, that "something" had been collected. But, as "many" persons were "removing," the city treasurer urged that the under-schout be "empowered to collect the bucket money before May."—Ibid., VII: 217-18, 220.

The burgomasters ordered the city secretary, on Aug. 8, 1659, "to give a minute to the Fire Wardens, ordering them to complete the fire ladders, fire hooks, and to inspect the buckets, whether they are tight and fit for use in time of need."—Ibid., VII: 228. For a later assessment, see July 8, 1661.

The English magistracy, about a quarter century later (see Feb. 28, 1667), required householders to provide buckets for themselves, the number for an average household being dependent upon the number of hearths in the house.—M. G. C., I: 187.

It is found that street alterations and fights continue, despite the laws against them, because the fine imposed is so small that quarrelsome persons even joke about it. Therefore, Stuyvesant and the council prohibit anew such misconduct, because it is mischievous and sometimes leads to murder. The new fine imposed is 25 guilders "for a simple blow of the fist." If blood flows, four times the amount, and when perpetrated in the presence of an officer, burgomaster, or schout, a double fine.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 343; Rec. N. Am., I: 35-36, where the date is Dec. 25, an error.

Nicolas de Sille received a municipal brief from the four south-west corner of Pearl and Whitehall Sts.—See Castello Plan, C. PIs. 82, 83, Vol. II, and II: 279; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 390.

Because it appears that Stuyvesant has "presented some lots to some people," and the same lots have also been given by the city authorities to others, through inadvertence, the burgomasters resolve, in order to prevent future mistakes, to ask Stuyvesant "to grant them an Acte giving them the disposal of the lots, . . . not mentioned in the ground titles;" also those "still ungranted and of those disposed of," to concede them as he might think best.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 186-96.

Jacob Strycker is granted a lot (for his brother) on the south side of Wall St., near William St. The building of the Trust Company of America now covers this ground.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87. Vol. II, and II: 392.

The directors at Amsterdam offer to send over to the provincial government of New Netherland 1,000 lbs. of powder and a detachment of about 50 soldiers, as reinforcements to withstand Indian depredations. They also say "that henceforth the said savage tribes" should not be "insulted in such liberties and freedoms, as they have now thereof," but that they are only emboldened by it and made to respect our people less, who, to gain an advantage in trade one over the other, care and cajole them, even have armed them to their own destruction."—N. T. Col. Disc., XIII: 75.
marriage had to be given by public act three times before solemnization of a marriage could take place. There were some persons who, after the third public act, delayed for weeks and even months to enter the married state. This was in contravention of the laws in force and led to irregularities. The provincial government of New Netherland, therefore, now ordered that marriage, when solemnized by the interpreter, shall be solemnized within the house of the person married, or by a friend if such public act is published or, this being impossible, that the persons in default are to appear in court and state their reasons. For the first week's delay a fine of 10 guilders is imposed, and for every week thereafter the fine is fixed at 20 guilders. Furthermore, no common law marriages are allowed within a mile of the megadyke, to be fined 100 guilders, more or less, according to their station and ability to pay; whilst such persons may be "amened anser theretofor every month."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 328-29; Rec. N. Am., I: 37-38; II: 304.

There were "many spacious and large Lots, even in the best and most convenient part" of New Amsterdam, which lay vacant "without Buildings," and were "kept by their owners either for greater profit, or for pleasure." Ordinances demanded that they be improved, but these were unheeded. There were other people who were depriving sites, especially "burgomasters," who "would be encouraged in case they could procure a Lot at a reasonable price on a suitable location." Such a state of affairs promoted another population not only business, nor did it add to the "embellishment" of the city. It is possible only because no penalty exists for neglect of the orders, and "the propriety owners," are, "for a great many years," the lot of the owners, "on the occasion of greater profit or, using for pleasure, as Orchards and Gardens." The company's profits depend upon population, consumption of materials, and trade.

Because of the above-mentioned conditions, Stuyvesant and the council had "lastly caused the vacant and unimproved Lots" to be surveyed (see April 19, 1667) by the "sworn Surveyor [Jacques Cortelyou] in the presence of the Burgomasters" of New Amsterdam, and had "found some hundreds of Lots inside the walls," south of the present Wall St., that were "not built on."

To encourage the use of these sites for building purposes, they now amplify former edicts (see, for example, Oct. 1, 1657), by requiring that all lots that "were lately measured and laid out by the Surveyor" shall, "immediately after the publication and posting" of the new act, be "assessed and appraised, first and foremost by the owners in possession, themselves," to the end that they may not thereafter "complain of under valuation," and that the owners, so long as they retain the lots or allow them to "remain without proper and habitable houses built thereon," shall "pay for the same yearly the 15th penny in two installments, the one half on May Day," and the other half before theFast day of the city; the proceeds to be devoted "to the fortification" of the city and the repairs thereof."
The burgomasters are directed "to summon the Owners of the Lots without regard of persons before them" at the city hall; "to cause the Assessment to be made," and "to have it recorded by their Secretary in due form," and the city treasurer is to receive the proceeds for the city's use. Should anyone prove stubborn and refuse compliance, he is to be fined and his lots are to be appraised "according to the value and the situation of the locality." He may retain them by payment of the tax rate on the new assessed valuation, otherwise he shall be obliged to part with them "for that price to the Burgomasters for the benefit of the City." Also, the burgomasters are empowered to condemn unimproved lots at the owner's appraised value, "for the account of the City, and to convey them to others" who will improve them. At the same time, the director-general and council, "in order to promote the great building, settlement, beauty, strength and prosperity" of New Amsterdam, command that henceforth "no Dwelling-houses" shall "be built near or under the Walls or Gates" of the city, "before or until the Lots" found by the surveyor are "properly built upon."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 335-27; Rec. N. Am., I: 35-37; II: 301-354. Publication was made of these regulations on the 6th of this month. Jan. 17. The third translation of the act, while substantially the same in the main premises, varies in other respects. See further on this matter under March 14, 1659.

The burgomasters and schepen, "at least the major part of them," unable to obtain their yearly honoraria, ask Stuyvesant and the council "for that part of their salary" which they shall "not allow them to keep."—Rec. N. Am., I: 308. They are referred back to a decision of
The burgomasters petition Stuyvesant and the council for a grant of either the whole or a part of the revenue of the weigh-scales, and also for the regal fees, after having observed that it is insufficient to provide for their salaries or "the many necessary repairs to the city works," and saying that, if the grant is made, they will, "according to the usage of the city of Amsterdam, cause a new scale to be erected or repair the old [one] and bring it" wherever the director-general and council shall "please to order and find it most proper."—Rec. N. Am., II: 208-09; VII: 167-68. On Jan. 25 (q.v.), Stuyvesant and the council declared they could not "conceded to grant the aforesaid petition without the advice of the directors at Amsterdam, "because the Weighscales is a domain or regale exclusive of the burgomasters’ direction," and the city’s public works ought to be paid for by its inhabitants without recourse to the general revenues of the company. They said the city government did not always administer its revenues as wisely as should be done, and emphasized the change of the hands of the Avery family from 1653 to the year 1665. None the less, to relieve the city from "the old and new debts," they consented, subject to ratification by the directors at Amsterdam, "that hereafter a just fourth of the Scales should go to the city’s treasurer or receiver, but subject to an accounting."—Ibid., II: 312-14; VII: 169-71. That was not done, and that all the revenues of the weigh-scales continued to go into the treasury of the company, we know, because the directors were opposed to the concession to the city.—N. Y. Col. Deed., XIV: 441, 449, 470. See also Nov. 7, 1658; Feb. 13, 1659.

Residents of the "Brouwer Street" (Brewers’, later Stone Street) requested permission of the city court, on March 17, 1659 (q.v.), to have their street paved with the usual cobblestones. Nothing, however, was done at that time. On Jan. 4, 1668, the matter was revived. In view of the wretched state of the street from the bad wintry weather, the city authorities "declined to wait, and the laying, regulation, and paving thereof, and discussed with them ways and means for carrying out the work."—Rec. N. Am., II: 299; VII: 166. No conclusion was arrived at then. Now, on the 24th, the burgomasters appoint Isaac de Forest and Jeronimus Ebbingh as special overseers to make a contract during the winter for beginning the paving work. Thereafter they are to give a proportionate assessment on "each house standing in the street," and when the work is finished, to pay the expenses incurred for the improvement.—Ibid., II: 309-10; VII: 166-67.

On March 28, De Forest complained to the court that the inhabitants on the street were unwilling to pay the levied assessments, and requested an order.—Ibid., II: 366; VII: 181. The court thereupon (April 15) authorized its messenger, Claes van Elandt, Jr., "to speak to the neighbours" on the street in regard to their assessments and report the results to the burgomasters.—Ibid., II: 377-78. He reported (April 26) that some had the money ready, whilst others would "pay on the earliest opportunity."—Ibid., VII: 185-86. The overseers, De Forest and Ebbingh, at the same time asked for their discharge from the superintendence of the street, as they wished to go to Fort Orange (Albany), and Henrich Khy said he was not able to remain in the stead. However, on June 13, they were again restored to their previous office.—Ibid., II: 185, 189. On Aug. 8, the paving was suspended until the arrival of De Forest, because Ebbingh had again expressed his intention of going to Fort Orange and obtained his discharge, laying over to Burgomaster Offef Stevensen van Cortlandt "the money in his possession and the account remaining with him."—Ibid., VII: 192.

Stuyvesant and the council make a provisional grant of one fourth of the revenue of the public weigh-scales to the city treasury, subject to the ratification of the directors at Amsterdam.—See summary, page 1676, and Jan. 22, 1658. For the answer of the directors, see Feb. 11, 1659.

Because "some Secretaries, Notaries, Clerks and other licensed persons" are exacting excessively large fees, Stuyvesant and the council order that nobody in New Netherland shall be allowed to draw up or write any public instruments, except those who are duly licensed and sworn by the director-general and council on Feb. 5 that their fees are fixed upon in great detail. Licensed scriveners are obliged to keep a register of licenses, and are prohibited from accepting gratuities or receiving money in advance for services; nor are they to compound with anybody "about a Fee and pay for writing" that is as yet unsecured. However, they may receive a fee before or after a suit, on rendering a bill of particulars. Violation of the ordinance shall result in forfeiture of the license, and a fine of 50 guilders. All instruments are required to be signed by the licensed scrivener in the presence of the person executing the same, and are to be sealed, a fee of six stuivers being allowed for the sealing. Poor or indigent people are to be served gratis. In September following, the notaries, who had petitioned the provincial government for a modification of the fee ordinance, were granted their fees by payment in beaver or wampum.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 329-33; Rec. N. Am., II: 314-15; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 200.

To settle the disputes of the country on the west side of the North River, and quiet doubts respecting title, Stuyvesant formally purchased from the Indians all the territory now known as Bergen, in New Jersey, beginning from the great rock above Weehawken, and from there through the land, until absorbed by the island Stuyvesant to the eastward of Col., and so along to the Constable’s Hook, and thence again to the rock above Weehawken." The farmers at ‘Gamoepa,’ or Communipaw, who had been forced to desert their settlements in 1655, now petitioned to be restored to their former homes. The director promptly complied with their request; but, to guard against future danger from the savages, required them to concentrate their dwellings, so that a village might eventually be incorporated there."—Broadhead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 624, and authorities there cited.

A double set of nominations is made by the burgomasters and scheepen for their successors, and is referred to Stuyvesant and the council for choice of a single set therefrom. The latter, while having no objection to the personnel of the list, refuse to give their approval, because the nominations were "not made in the presence of the Schout" (Nicaus de Sille), who, they say, as "head of the bench, moderator and collector of the votes," has "a double voice in case of equality of votes." It is also charged that the nominations have not been made in conformity with a previous order, of Jan. 18, 1656 (q. v.), by which the designation was "left to the Bench," on condition that it be made "in the presence of the Deputy to the Director General and Council," and that irregularities exist in the papers. The city court agreed, on the 31st, to leave this matter to Stuyvesant. The nominations were again made in Stuyvesant and the council, revised in form to meet the aforesaid objections. A dispute arose as to the right of any of the servants of the West India Co. to be chosen as members of the city court, but this matter was settled amicably, and, on Feb. 2, a new board of burgomasters and scheepen was duly elected and confirmed.—Rec. N. Am., II: 319-25.

"I Mackell[y]" is mentioned in a conveyance recorded in Liber Deeds, A: 124 (New York). This was the later Whitehall St.—See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 1007.

Frederick Phillipsen receives a ground-brief for a lot for a house and garden at the north-east corner of Stone and Whitehall Sts., a part of the present site of the New York Produce Exchange.—See Castello Plan, C. Pls. 8a, 8e, Vol. II, and II: 49; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 8, Vol. I, and II: 170.

Petrus Stuyvesant petitions the provincial council of New Netherland and the burgomasters of New Amsterdam for a ground-brief or patent and a transport or deed of the lots on the East River (now Pearl St., at the foot of the present Whitehall St.), upon which he has erected a coach and handcarpenter’s building known in later years as "Whitehall." See "Stuyvesant’s Great House" in Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 917. The circumstances of this transaction were as follows:—The right of granting ground-briefs resided with the director-general and council as supreme representatives of the directors at Amsterdam, who were the lords proprietors of Manhattan Island, but issuing a grant of conveyance rested with the burgomasters, because that right... had been surrendered to the city by the company. Stuyvesant, as director-general, could not give himself a valid patent. Therefore, he petitioned those who had the authority to secure him and his heirs in the possession of these lots, through regular processes. Stuyvesant said they of their own knowledge knew that he had "fenced, recovered and raised up, at great cost and labour, out of the hands of the council and certain bodies, the lots of this year 1647" by Kieft to Jan Pietersen, who had conveyed them "to one Thomas Baxter," subsequently "a bankrupt and fugitive from the Province," and the same person who in the English troubles had turned pirate and plundered inhabitants in the Dutch province. Stuyvesant'sacious and failing to appear when summoned by ringing of the bell, his lots were forfeited and reverted to the company. Stuyvesant asked for the annulment of Kieft's ground-brief, which, however, he said, could not be "found on the Register," and for a new ground-brief, etc., to him and his heirs, so that they might "enjoy in peace the fruits of the great expense incurred and still to be incurred" on the property. The council allowed the ground-brief, "after proper survey be made," and the burgomaster gave "due conveyance thereof according to the survey," because the object was considered laudable, and the request could not well be refused. - Rec. N. Am., II: 329; VII: 172-73.

19. Jochem Kiersted, brother of Dr. Hans Kiersted, obtained a patent from Kieft, on April 12, 1647, for land on the East River (now Pearl Street) at the foot of Whitehall St. - Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 374. Jochem was one of those who opposed with Kieft in the council in 1647. His claim was made on the granted lot as heir. Now (1692) Stuyvesant complains that this land, which is south of his own "swept and fenced ground," lies not only unbuilt on, but also "unsheeted, unfenced and unwated." He says that if the claimant is to continue in possession, he ought to be ordered "to clear, raise and fence in the lot," so that he, the next door neighbour, as well as others, may not "suffer any loss or damage thereby," also that it is the common custom for neighbours "to erect together the common sheet piling or contribute to the expense thereof." The burgomasters order the heir to attend to its sheeting and raising or, in default, to surrender the lot. - Rec. N. Am., II: 330-31; VII: 172-73.

20. Jacob van Corlaer, whose name survives in Corlaser's Hook (Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 965), was at this time a school teacher in New Amsterdam. He is ordered by the director-general "to cease holding school, until he has asked for and obtained the consent in proper form." - N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 442. For the remonstrance of his patrons, see March 5.

21. Jacob Leendertsen van Grint is elected and confirmed by Stuyvesant and the council as "sworn measurer in matters of receipt and delivery of any grain, lime or whatever is measured by the same," in New Amsterdam, for a term of three years. - Rec. N. Am., II: 357.

Claes van Elsland, Sr., petitions the city court for the post of "hal knecht," or attendant at the shambles or meat market of New Amsterdam, because "both English and strangers" have asked that a person be appointed who shall "keep black, scales and weights in the shambles," to serve them when they come there with their meat, etc. The request was denied, on Mar. 7, "for certain reasons" not revealed in the records. - Rec. N. Am., II: 356, 349; VII: 173-74, 177.

Allard Anthony is ordered by the burgomasters "to make an inventory of all the papers remaining with him regarding the City; also the a/c of the Great and Small Burgher right." On the 28th, he exhibited all of the papers in the city court. - Rec. N. Am., II: 337, 343; VII: 174, 175.

Silbou, the daughter of the council and certain bodies, is ordered to take the sheet-piling of his lot on the East River. - Rec. N. Am., II: 336; VII: 175. His lot ran through from "Hoogh Street" (now Stone Street) to the East River (now Pearl Street), just above the "gracht" or canal (now Broad Street).

Warnar Wescue is "allowed the gaging of the barrell for all his life, but the braging for one year." - Rec. N. Am., II: 336; VII: 174. See March 19.

The city court directs that all fines shall be applied as follows: 25-third for the officer, one-third for the city, and one-sixth, each, for the church and for the poor of the city. - Rec. N. Am., II: 340.

Upon some of the burgomaster's affairs, Stuyvesant and the council now elect and confirm Willem Beeckman as an orphan-master and Hendrick Jansen van der Vin as a churchwarden of New Amsterdam. They were accepted by the city on the 28th, and the secretary of the city was, on March 21, ordered to furnish them their commissions. - Rec. N. Am., II: 336, 340-42, 357; VII: 174, 175, 178; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 191.

Albert Jansen receives the grant of a lot. His widow, Elke van Jansen, receives the lot on Oct. 19, 1660. The property is now the north-west corner of William St. and Exchange Pl. - See Castello Plan, C. Pls. 82-82e, Vol. II and III: 287-88; Map of Dutch Grants, II: 393, and C. Pls. 82, 82e, and 87; Rec. N. Am., II: 343; VII: 176.

New origins for the village of the New Harlem on Manhattan Island is related in a provincial ordinance of this date. Stuyvesant and his council have contemplated the insecurity of the northern portion of the island, as Indian raids have demonstrated in recent years. To promote agricultural pursuits, the raising of cattle, and the security of Manhattan, "as well as for the greater recreation and amusement of this City of Amsterdam in New Netherland," they now resolve "to form a New Village or Settlement at the end of the Island, and about the lands of Jochem Pietersen [Kuyter], deceased," and those adjoining. This proposed new village is "favored by the Director General and Council with the following Privileges," to wit: Each settler to receive 18 to 20 morgens of arable land and 6 to 8 morgens of flats, to be exempted from the customary payment of "tenth" for a period of 15 years, beginning with May, 1665, but "on condition" that the grantee pay in instalments eight guilders for each tillable morgen of land within three years. Also, John Han, the first settler, is driven off the lands by Indian calamities or otherwise. The provincial government promises the new inhabitants protection in their possession, "to maintain them with all their Power, and, when notified and required, to assist them with 12 to 15 Soldiers on the monthly pay of the West India Co., the Village providing quarters and rations." When as many as 20 to 25 families are settled in the village, there is to be erected an inferior court of justice, the membership thereof is to be chosen at first from a double number of nominees named by the inhabitants, and annually thereafter in the same manner, but on recommendation of the village magistrates in office. Also, when this stage of organization is reached, the village is to be "accommodated with a good, pious orthodox Minister, toward whose maintenance" the provincial government promises "to pay half the Salary; the other half to be supplied by the Inhabitants in the best and easiest manner, with the advice of the Magistrates of the aforesaid Village, at the most convenient time." The provincial government promises to assist the inhabitants at a convenient time in constructing, with the help of "the City's Negroes, a good wagon road" from New Amsterdam "to the Village aforesaid, so that people..." travel "hitherto and these negotiations are made...". Until the village has a chance to get started, no other villages or settlements are to be allowed by the director-general and council, and "certainly not until the aforesaid number of Inhabitants" in Harlem is completed. To encourage intercourse "with the English of the North," a "Ferry and a suitable Snow" are contemplated, as well as "a Cattle and Horse Market." - Laws & Ord. N. Neh., 335-37. See Nov. 27, 1665. See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 987.

The burgomasters and schepmen refer to the director-general and council a petition demanding against the order to Jacob van Corlaer to close his school (see Feb. 19). The petitioners "find themselves greatly interested thereby, inasmuch as their children forget what the above named Jacob van Corlaar had to their great satisfaction previously taught them in reading, writing and ciphering, which it was much more the wish of many other inhabitants...". The burgomasters and schepmen join with the petitioners in requesting "that your Hon* may be pleased to permit the abovenamed Corlaar again to keep school." - Rec. N. Am., II: 348. - Kilpatrick, op. cit., 115. The request was denied on March 19 (q.v.).

The council of New Netherland is to give notice to the burgomaster of New Amsterdam to lodge as many married soldiers as they can conveniently in their domiciles, at a certain rate. - Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 192.

This day was set apart by proclamation of Stuyvesant and the council as a day of general fasting, prayer, and thanksgiving in New Netherland. Feb. 21, 1661-62, Sex. 9, T. 3. — See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 987.
1668 New Amsterdam “from the City Hall after the usual ringing of the bell,” on March 4. Among the “signs of God’s just judgment and certain forrunners of severe punishment,” the proclamation recited the “raising up and propagating a new, unheard of, abominable Heresy” and “seeking to seduce many, yeas, were it possible, even the true believers.” All amusements and hilarity were forbidden on this day.—Rec. N. Am., II: 345-51; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 190. Cf. Broodhead, I: 538-39.

19 A provincial ordinance is passed to prevent fraud in the shipping of tobacco to Holland. It requires the shipper to make a declaratory to the fiscal of the company at New Amsterdam of the number of cases and the exact weight of each case.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 337.

The provincial council resolves to rent the ferry at New Amsterdam (Dover and Pearl Sts.) to the highest bidder.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 192. See May 28, 1668.

The provincial council resolves to farm out the wind-mill of the West India Co. in New Amsterdam.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 192.

Bartholomeus van Schel and the two masons recently arrived from Holland to complete the stone wall around the fort obtain from the council an increase in pay for board money.—See summer Dec. 19, 1666.

The burgomasters make regulations for the branding of barrels, and choose Jan Jansen van Brestee (or Breestede), cooper, as brander for one year. All barrels are required to be branded anew in May of each year with the year mark.—Rec. N. Am., II: 336, 345-346; 174, 182-183; 374, 375; 392, 393. See also Flushing, 1660; 357; 358.

Pieter Schaafbaek (or Schabanck), the city jailer at the city hall, requests the burgomasters to allow him to “lay in beer for the prisoners, also, wine and liquors, free of excise, likewise fire and light gratis,” which is granted on condition that he will “not allow any parties directly or indirectly,” that is associated drinking.—Rec. N. Am., II: 355.

Replying to the communication of Mar. 5 (q.v.) from the burgomasters and schepens, Stuyvesant says: “School teaching and the induction of School Masters depends absolutely from the just Praises, by virtue of which the Director-General and Council for pregnant reasons interdicted Jacob van Corlaar, he having presumed to take such on himself without their Order.” To which order and resolution “they still adhere.”—Rec. N. Am., II: 348.

“The school, which was also a religious institution, was likewise under the direct control of the colonial government. The presumption of Jacob van Corlaar to teach in a school without the order of the Director-General and Council brought a very clear assertion of the powers of the government, which then refused to grant the requisite permission even in spite of the humble supplication of the Burgurers and inhabitants and the intercession of the Burgomasters and the Schepens.”—Zwolena, Religion in New Neth., 46. See March 16.

The president of the city court states that several of the inhabitants who have purchased their burgheeright “for a year and a day” have failed to pay, and even scoffed at the burgomasters when asked of Wall St., which they reached for collection. On the next day (16th), the burgomasters decreed that henceforth all burgheerights must be paid promptly into the treasury of the city, and that those persons who had already procured the right must pay within 24 hours, or be subject to an execution.—Rec. N. Am., II: 359, 365; VII: 130.

The burgomasters and schepens renew their system of fines for non-attendance of their members at the sessions of the city court.—Rec. N. Am., II: 364-65.

To Jacob van Corlaar’s petition for permission “to keep a school in this City for the instruction of children in reading, writing, etc.” the brief reply is: “For weighty reasons the Director-General and Council decree: Nihilt.”—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 415. The petitioner’s school had previously been ordered closed because of his presuming to teach without proper authorization (see March 9).

The burgomasters offer to pay half of an account for planks delivered to that part of Water St. which stretches from Van Corlaan to the tenement of the Cooper, known as “the lane which is a benefit for the city and for the fort, the latter pertaining to the expenses of the company.”—Rec. N. Am., II: 366; VII: 181-82.

It is ordered by the burgomasters that the street or lane running from the South St. bridge (now South St. between Pearl St. and Stein St.), the bridge over the lots of Charles Bridges (called Carol van Brugge by the Dutch) and Somolien La Chair, be left open provisionally “for the use of the City until further order.”—Rec. N. Am., II: 366; VII: 181.

This line divided the original grants of 1635 to Thomas Willet and Richard Smith, and lay between the Stadt Huys Lane (Coenties Alley) and the Burgghers Path beyond. See New Amsterdam petition, the city court for payment of 935 florins, “together with all lost, money and interest, which arising from planks and nails delivered in the time of the English troubles [1653] for erecting the entrenchments of this City.” He is referred to Stuyvesant and the council in the matter.—Rec. N. Am., II: 360-69. They gave him an order, on the next day, to the burgomasters and schepens for payment of the account.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 193. See also July 2, 1659.

John Denman asks the city court for permission to tap, but is refused, “the principal reason” being “that there is so great noise and racket” at his place “that the whole neighbourhood is kept awake.” He says this happened while he was absent at Boston. The court advises him to “pay attention to his conduct, and that such disposition shall be made as circumstances permit.”—Rec. N. Am., II: 364, 365.

The provincial council resolves to summon the principal merchants of New Amsterdam, for consultation on proposed changes in the customs.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 194.

Abraham Pietersen, who has been the miller of the company at New Amsterdam, is granted a permit by the provincial government to erect a water-mill on the Fresh Water.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 165. Innes says that it was a tide-mill, and stood near the present James and Cherry Sts., on the brook of the Fresh Water.—Rec. N. Am. and Its People, 346. Regarding Pietersen, see Castello Plan, II: 231-232; and Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 961-62, where the mill is situated at Water St. near James Slip.

Certain laws are renewed, relating to the prohibition against importing munitions of war, unseasoonable and unloading of ships, and carrying persons away from New Netherland without a pass. These laws were apparently drawn up in Holland and sent printed to New Netherland for execution.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 344.

Cornelis van Ruyven, the provincial secretary, is ordered to make an abstract of the principal ordinances in force, in order that they may be renewed. This first revised edition of the laws, consisting of 24 sections, is approved by Stuyvesant and the council on this day.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 342-46.

The burgomasters conclude, in compliance with a placard of the director-general and council, to authorize the city treasurer “to collect and take up from each house one beaver or eight guilders in seawant according to the rating of the Treasury.” Those who cannot pay are to be listed and reported to the burgomasters, and the treasurer is required to collect the amount “from the inhabitants of the houses, and the tenement or dwelling half the sum from his landlord.”—Rec. N. Am., II: 182.

Some persons are observed cutting sods “between the wall of this City and the Fresh Water,” approximately between the present Wall St. and Pearl St., as well as on the Highway (Broadway), south of Wall St., protesting against “the damages and unserviceableness of the road,” and makes sods scarce when needed for mending and repairing the city’s fortifications. Stuyvesant and the council therefore forbid “all persons, of what quality soever, from attempting to cut or causing to be cut any sods on the Common Pastures,” between the city’s palisades and the Fresh Water, as well as “on the Highway,” without their permit, subject to a fine for infraction of the law.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 347. See also description of “A Plan of the Communs [1785],” in III: 369.

As to “further granting of lots,” the burgomasters resolve “to proceed no further before a map thereof be made,” and they decide to ask Stuyvesant “to order the surveyor to draw as soon as possible a map of the lots within this City.”—Rec. N. Am., VII: 182-83. See June 13.

The burgomasters authorize the city schout, Nicasius de Sille, “to notify all who lie along the North River to level their buildings to the General’s [Stuyvesant’s] plan.”—Rec. N. Am., VII: 183.

Nicasius de Sille, city schout, is directed “to tell every one having vacant unseasooned lots” to fence them within six weeks.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 183.

The city is ordered to send the messenger of the city court around to notify the tavernkeepers to renew their licenses and “bring in their old or last license.”—Rec. N. Am., VII: 183.

All persons are forbidden to “dig or dredge any Oyster shells” on the East River or on the North River," between the palisades of the city and the Fresh Water.——

As Stuyvesant and the council have been asked to define what duty shall be paid for goods imported into New Netherland from Virginia, "the North [New England] or elsewhere," which are and which are not subject to import duties, they have laid "that all merchandises imported . . . outside this Province" shall pay ten per cent. ad valorem, "except Provisions, Malt, Tobacco and Sugar," which shall continue to come in duty free. In the category of "Merchandises" are included "all Wines, Beer, Vinegar and Oil."——

The provincial council by order extends the time for covering Willem Pietersen de Groot's house in New Amsterdam with tiles, until he receives them from Holland or Fort Orange (Albany).——

The council of New Netherland approves of Stuyvesant's leave to go on official business to the South (Delaware) River. He returned to New Amsterdam on Monday, May 13, and reported to the council on the 15th concerning the affairs in the Delaware country.——

In an act continuing the ordinance of April 27, 1666 (p. 514), and further regulating the duties payable on imported and exported goods, is passed by the provincial government of New Netherland. To prevent persons from pleading ignorance of the law, it is ordered that the "true French and English, so that the facts may be disseminated by posters in these languages as well as in Dutch."——

A provincial law is passed for regulating court practice, particularly with respect to court messengers. Plaintiffs are required to procure through a court messenger at least one day before trial, except in cases arising between strangers; the court messenger is required to make a written return of service, together with the Answer, to the Court. "All Judgments, interlocutory or definitive, whereby anyone is "condemned to pay money, or deposit it in Court," must be "put in execution within ten days," if no appeal has been lodged in cases that admit of an appeal. The method of carrying out the judgment by the court messenger is prescribed, as to attachment of furniture or movables, or even seizure of real estate and ejectments. For the delivery of summonses and arrests, fixed fees are established for court messengers. Such fees are fixed for a single summons to a single summons twelve stuivers, of which six stuivers are to be paid the secretary for entering the action; for an arrest twelve stuivers; for committing a person one guilder and four stuivers; for keeping a prisoner over night two guilders, and for serving a mandamus one guilder and ten stuivers. Court messengers are not allowed fees for services in cases wherein the company is concerned, but are obliged to serve under the regular salary allowance.——

In a letter to Stuyvesant and the council, the directors at Amsterdam say: "Domine Drisius has repeatedly expressed to us his opinion [see Feb. 12, 1654] that he thought it advisable, to establish there [New Amsterdam] a Latin school for the instruction and education of the young people, offering thereto his own services." The council, on motion of Drisius, increase his board allowance to $300 ($120) per year, and grant him besides a house rent free in the city of New Amsterdam, with which the provincial authorities carried on.——

In his latter days, Drisius suffered from "weakness" and "a failure of memory," which "disabled him from serving," and he died June 4.——

At an earlier Latin school, see April 14, 1652.

A resolution in the provincial council provides that the city of New Amsterdam be enclosed with palisades, having two or three openings or gates, in order to prevent smuggling.——

The council further ordered to set up in the city of New Amsterdam, for the benefit of the citizens, a map of the city of New Amsterdam, to be enclosed with palisades, and for completing the stone wall of the fort.——

The constitution of smuggling led the directors at Amsterdam to approve of Stuyvesant's plan of 1666; and they thought it necessary to stop the practice.——

The provincial council resolves that Stuyvesant shall proceed at once to the Esopus, now Kingston, Ulster County, outlaws having been committed there by Indians, and the colonists having demanded soldiers for defense. Stuyvesant departed with several private yachts, accompanied by Govert Loockermans and 50 soldiers, and arrived the following day. It was during this visit that he advised concentration of the settlers in a stockaded village, which was formed under the name of Willets. Stuyvesant remained until June 24, and returned to Manhattan on the 28th; but, owing to renewed troubles by the Indians during the summer, he again visited Esopus in October (see Oct. 9). Each time he left a garrison to guard the place.——

The provincial council resolves, since "the lease of the ferry from this Island of Manhattan [Dover and Pearl Sts.] to Long Island [Fulton St., Brooklyn] expires on the last of this month," to lease it again for a term of three years. As they "have ascertained, that the ferry cannot be let on the condition proposed" by them, "namely, that the lessee shall be bound to build or buy, within four or not longer than five months, a scow, large enough for the transport of animals and other goods: because the majority of the persons, who wish to lease the ferry, are people of small means, if not poor," and so heavy an expense cannot be incurred by "such persons," they therefore, to endeavour to induce the present ferry-man, Egbert van Borsum, to continue "without public competition, for a fair equivalent . . . for the term of three years, on condition" that he shall have a scow built within four or five months. They appoint a committee of council to "bring about an agreement."——

Just two months have gone by (see April 11) since the burgomasters decided not to grant any more lots until a map had been made, and since they asked Stuyvesant to order Jacques Cortelyou, the surveyor, "to draw as soon as possible a map of the lots within this City,"——

The "Land Poort" (land gate) is mentioned in a deed of this date, in which Christiana Barents conveys to Hendrick Hendricksen (Liber Deeds, A: 150); also in a mortgage of the same date on a lot in the "Heere Wegh" (Broadway, near the county's office, Municipal building). This was the gate at about the present Broadway and Wall St., and these mentions of it are the earliest we have met with. It is also mentioned, under date of Dec. 12, this year, in Min. of Orph. Cty., I: 59. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 945.

Early in May, one Herman Jacobsen Bamboes, who had been killed by the Indians, was buried in New Amsterdam. His estate was by his widow "kicked away with the foot," and she "laid the key on the coffin,"—that is to say, surrendered his estate for the benefit of his creditors. Curators for the administration of the estate were appointed by the court, among them Hendrick Jansen van Vin. He now asks the court to prevent "the skipper of the sloop sailing for Canada" from taking with him Dirck Chessen, before the latter has given security for the payment of what he owes the estate of the deceased, which is granted.—Rec. N. Am., II: 406; VII: 187-88.

The inception of intercolonial trade between the Dutch at Manhattan and the French of Canada is interesting. In the autumn of 1657, Father Simon Le Moyne, the Jesuit missionary among the Mohawks, visited Manhattan. "He remained here eight days, and then returned to Fort Orange, and thence by land to Canada."—Eccles. Rec., I: 434. He bore with him to Canada an expressed wish of the Dutch to open trade relations with the Canadians. On Feb. 18, 1658, Louis d'Ailleboeuf de Coulouge, acting on the wishes of his countrymen, left Manhattan with a Dutch vessel. Acting as French and were allies, he and the principal persons of Canada saw no reason why the Dutch should not be allowed to trade with Canada, and he therefore gave them consent to "come when they please under the condition that they submit to the same customs as French vessels, forbidding trade with the savages and the public exercise on land of their religion." Father Le Moyne transmitted this letter to Stuyvesant, with his own of April 7, in which he said of the proposed intercourse: "May it therefore bring happy, beneficial and fortunate results. Dear friends of the Manhattan, draw your burrows through the sea to our Quebec, and some time hereafter our Canadians will understand with God's guidance safely reach your shores."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 415. On July 2, Jean de Pré (also written Jean De Pré, Jan Peri or Perier), a native of "Commene [Commens] in Flanders," who received the small burghership of New Amsterdam in April, 1657, and is now aged 29 years, petitions the provincial council of New Netherland for permission of duties on a cargo of sugar and tobacco in the sloop "Jean Baptiste," which is granted because it is the first trading voyage to Canada.—Rec. N. Am., II: 412; VIII: 230 (note); VII: 172; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 19. He left some beer and tobacco on the ship there to be sold; also some books and papers, sawing them in court litigation, and impoverished her. He never returned, his ship having been wrecked on the Island of Anticosti. His widow was married to Cornelis Andriessen Hooghiel.—Rec. N. Am., III: 139; 74-75, 78, 81; IV: 230.

At some time prior to this date, Pieter Wolkertsen van Couwenhoven received a lot from the burghmasters, for which he was given a deed, Nov. 18/28, 1664. The property was on the present west side of Broad St., covered by the building of the Commercial Cable Co.—See Castello Plan, C. Pl. 88, 82e, Vol. II, and II: 229-30; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 567.

The burghmasters having decided to regulate the working hours of the labouring classes of the city, and to determine when they shall "go to their work and come from their work, as well also their recess for meals," the city court resolves "to draft a petition to the Director General and Council to establish Guilds."—Rec. N. Am., II: 410; VII: 187-90. For examples of the operations of local craftsmen in opposition to the introduction of workmen from other provinces, who undertook to perform the same services at less pay, see April 2, 1747; Aug. 24, 1769.

From a court proceeding before the burghmasters and scheepen, held at the city hall on this date, we know that the court met upstairs, that the prisoners were confined "below."—Rec. N. Am., II: 411.

The burghmasters resolve "to set off the City with a wall."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 190. For an account of the commencement of this movement for the city's protection, and to stop smuggling, see March 28, 1657.

The burghmasters of the city resolve "to communicate with the General [Stuyvesant] relative to having a public Well made in the Heere Straat" (Broadway).—Rec. N. Am., VIII: 190. As July is the only reference to this well in the records of the Dutch régime, it cannot be determined whether it was dug as proposed, or, if so, exactly in what part of the street it was situated.

The city court, of which the burghmasters, and scheepen, resolves "to petition Stuyvesant "to communicate to the inferior Bench of Justice the privilege of the Great Burgher-right."—Rec. N. Am., II: 410.

The council makes appointments of officers in the city military companies under the orange flag and under the blue flag.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 195.

Allard Anthony, as treasurer of the city, makes a demand on Isaac de Forrest, scheepen, for the payment of fl. 104, "for a shed purchased from the City," but De Forrest, alleging "that he paid Frans: Clazen fl. 50. and again fl. 100 to Juffit Weissen," requests 12 days delay in the matter.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 190.

The name of "Brugh Straat" (the present Bridge Street) appears thus early in a deed, in which Johannes Nevius conveys to Cornelis Steenwyck the property situated at the present 29 Pearl St., running through to Bridge St.—Liber Deed., A: 156-7 (regis- terer's office, N. Y. County). See also Feb. 11, 1651; May 3 and 9, 1688; June 26, 1809. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 995.

Stuyvesant and the council address a missive to the directors at Amsterdam, which accompanies a large number of official papers. A liberal contemporary extract from this lot of papers, giving most important data, many of which have not been known hitherto, is contained among the written matters, as the latter is not in the handwriting of any of the officers of the city, and is written in Dutch. A partial answer from the directors, of Feb. 11, 1659, is printed in N. Y. Col. Doc., XII: 232-33; XIII: 98; XIV: 477-54. A digest of the chief contents of the enclosures is given here, 421: A statement from Jan de Becker, in June, 1658, concerning finances, sent over in the ship "Oitter," which left the Texel on Jan. 6, 1658, and arrived in New Netherland on March 13 or 14: books lonely kept in the province, but new receiver (Van Ruyven) an honest man with good experience, his instructions; the late Fiscal Van Tiemenhoven's accounts, reporting thereon too slow; inventory showing last state of magazine, stores, ammunition, etc.; evidence of debts; proof of number of houses of the company; old bookkeeper unfit, new one needed; fort must be repaired and made fit; company's slaves must be taught trades; ships' names and instructions for sending them over. Letter from Domine Deibus in regard to money. Ordinance changing value of beaver and wampum, beaver at eight guilders, wampum at three to four black and six to eight while the stuiver. Order to regard to trains, bands, powder, and lead, with cost; excise on wine, beer, and distilled liquors in tapsters houses at New Amsterdam, 10,500 guilders, and for Long Island, 75 guilders; report on what Stuyvesant and his people have done to receive the license to done to use it or have it, and what the citizens of Esopus to whom he has given 60 to 70 Christians at Esopus, who have in rich soil some 900 sheeps of corn, and all the Christians have been concentrated in a palaide; Indians there promise to deliver up murderers when they find any. Report of Stuyvesant on occurrences at "Nieuwe Amstel," at the Delaware; various settlers in that country to go within environs of Fort Altena, in district of the company, to settle and build there; order concerning Swedes on the Delaware; smuggling to be punished; Domine Welius and Director Africh; colonists and Africh; various items about Swedes on the Delaware; wages of masons at Manhattan or New Amsterdam increased; Francois de Bruyn and tobacco coming from Curacao. Declaration of Pieter Plovier about skipper of ship "De Wasblikcker." Copy of confiscated goods of Meyla; pieces and papers relating to Jan (Juan) Gallardo, a Spanish pilot. Resolutions of Stuyvesant and council in New Netherland: La Montagne made vice director at Fort Orange; Fiscal Van Tiemenhoven demoted; Pieter Tonnez named, provisionally, by the council, Jan. 3, 1657. Ordinance, Jan. 16, 1657 (p. 5), requiring everyone to have lands recorded and built upon or used, also in regard to cutting wood on other property; Jacques Cortelyou made surveyor-general New Amsterdam, traders (chasseurs) and merchants, the staple right, burgher-right and conditions for accepting same; Jan and John van Tienhoven and small burgher rights defaced, Feb. 4, 1657; income to be employed for fortifying the city, Feb. 6, 1657; retiring burghmaster to be city's treasurer, March 6, 1657; commission chosen to revise the disordered books of former Fiscal Van Tiemenhoven; Commander John de Graeff trading in Manhattan and New York, Apr. 26, 1657; Rev. Johannes Megapodens allowed for house hire and firewood, 500 guilders yearly, April 7, 1657 Fort Casemier,
On the 21st he reported that he had gone around as ordered, but Aug.
that the people "made fun of him" when he told them what was required of them. He asked the magistrates to fix a penalty on those who were "unwilling to obey the order."—Rec. N. Am., III:434.

The director-general and council act favourably on a petition from Jan Lubbertsen (Lubberts) to be allowed "to open a school for instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic." He must behave himself as such a person ought to behave."—N. Y. Col.
Docs., XIV:421; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 195. Lubbertsen had been a clerk in the employ of the Company.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 141.

Until this time the city court held its regular sessions on Mondays. The provincial council now orders that in future the sessions shall be held on Tuesdays. Compliance with this requirement began on the 20th of this month.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 195; Rec. N. Am., II:419.

The proposals of the director-general (see summary under May 25) to enclose the city at the river side with palisades, and to complete the stone wall of the fort, are heard by the provincial council.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 141.

Megaaspeld and Driisius, the two Dutch clergymen of New Amsterdam, allege that the Lutherans of the city are misrepresent-

Jacob Alrichs writes to Stuyvesant from New Amstel, Del.:
"I learn with regret, that at the Mannsahants your Honor has been 8 The burgomasters agree to "propose" to Stuyvesant: "the paving of the Wincelk [Market or Shop] Street, and to make one of the Burgers Overseer of the Ward (Baurmeister) on behalf of the Company."—Rec. N. Am., VII:191. This street, now closed, was east of and parallel to Whitehall St., and extended from the present Stone to Bridge St. Its easterly side was occupied by the five large stone houses, or shops, of the West India Co. On the 15th, the burgomasters resolved to "communicate" to Stuyvesant

"the grading of the Wincelk Street and Bridge lane."—Ibid., VII:194. The Brugh Steegh or Bridge Lane, no longer in existence, was at first merely a short passage running from the present Stone St.
to the rear of the lot of Abraham Planck or Verplanck, which was on Brugh Street (Bridge St.), about midway between the Marckveldt (Whitehall St.) and the grant or canal (Broad St.). Eventually it was extended through the Planck lot to Bridge St. and had a more contracted outlet through the next block to the shore of the East River; a short cut to the brick and weigh-house. See also Because it is found that "considerable brady" is being sold by the burgurers of the city to Indians, the president of the city court asks his colleagues if it is "not prudent to establish strict regulations" by a fine of 2 d. per unit. Ibid., VII:194.

The city court directs the "Officer" or schout to warn all persons in the city who have "placed thached roofs on their houses," or who have plastered chimneys, "to remove them."

On the 25th, it is ordered that the city hall, where the court agrees to sit "from 9 to 11 o. c. A. M. and to 5 o. C. P. M. to mark the measures and weights brought," for which marking or stamping fees are established for the benefit of the city. Anybody who is caught using unmarked measures or weights, after the day set, is to suffer fines for the first and second offenses, and to have his store closed for the third violation. The enforcement of the ordinance is reposed in the schout, who has authority "to make visits of inspection and carry it out." An inspector of weights and measures is also created; his rates for stamping and his general duties are clearly mentioned. Andries de Has was named as "town inspector" in December, and Jan Jansens van Breestede was named official gauger of barrels.—Rec. N. Am., I:397; II:190, 202, 205-5, 211.

The city court orders "that some notice be affixed concerning the farming of the excise on slaughtered cattle."—Rec. N. Am., III:194.

A remonstrance relative to foreign trade, "signed by some of the Burgurers and inhabitants," is handed to the burgomasters of New Amsterdam (Rec. N. Am., III:13). The latter sent it to The council on the 17th (ibid., 8-9), who, on the same day, adjudged it necessary to have the matter considered by the directors at Amsterdam (ibid., 15).

In the month of November, three prominent and influential persons met in conference with the directors, in which they spoke of "the tother condition of the trade" and "the high price of goods," referring therein also to "a certain humble remonstrance on the subject of foreign trade," which had been placed in their hands by "many of the Commonalty," and of which they enclosed a copy. Because of its intricacy, they delegated Schepen Cornelis Steenwyck, about to depart for Hol­land, to further elucidate the subject to the directors.—Ibid., 13-15.

The merchants of New Amsterdam sought for permission to trade directly with foreign countries that were within the limits of the West India Company, rather than to trade through the directors, which appeal from the people of this "early budding place," beyond "the Lords Majors as Patrons of this Province," to the directors at Amsterdam, shows the successive stages of this procedure under the conditions of Governmental control then prevailing.—Rec. N. Neth., III: 8-9, 15.

In a letter of Feb. 13, 1659 (p. vi), the directors at Amsterdam granted greater liberty to the people of New Netherland in foreign trade.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 431; Rec. N. Am., VII: 245-26. For an account of its operation in the first direct trade with France, see Sept. 17, 1679.

Oliver Cromwell dies. The next day, his son, Richard Cromwell, was proclaimed "Protector."[14] Macaulay said of Oliver Cromwell that he "was laid among the ancient sovereigns of England with funeral pomp such as England had never before seen; and that he was succeeded by his son, Richard, as quietly as any king had ever been succeeded by any Prince of Wales."[15]

Stuyvesant and the council on the 17th (ibid., 8-9), who, on the same day, adjudged it necessary to have the matter considered by the directors at Amsterdam (ibid., 15).

THE

The burgomasters of New Amsterdam decide to write a letter to the directors at Amsterdam, conveying it by Cornelis Steenwyck, in which a request is to be made for the right of sale of all real estate in the city. — Rec. N. Am., VII: 195. For the grant thereof, see Feb. 13, 1659.

1859: Amsterdam. The successful bidder for the farm.

The successful bidder being Egbert Meindersen, and Daniel Tournear and Jan Hendricksca Stillman acting as securities.

The term was from Sept. 26, 1659, to Sept. 26, 1666, inclusive. Meindersen paid 50 dols. for the "Landport" or land gate, which was at what is now Broadway and Wall St. — Rec. N. Am., III: 58-60. Cf. with ibid., I: 44.

A provincial proclamation for a day of general fasting and prayer is issued. A few days later, Stuyvesant went to the Esopus country (now Kingston) to parley with the Indians which had suffered from Indian depredations during the summer. — Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 201; N. Y. Col. Dict., XIII: 91.

The burgomasters of New Amsterdam decide to establish a watch at New Amsterdam. They name nine men who have applied for the posts, as well as 24 stewards for the watch, four of them to be on watch duty nightly. They are also "promised one or two beavers for candles and two to three hundred pieces of fire wood." — Rec. N. Am., VII: 195. This was the origin of the city police. Cf. the "corporal's guard," March 3, 1658.

On the 12th of this month, the burgomasters provided articles for defining the duties of the Rattle Watch. Among the provisions were these: All watchmen were obliged to go on watch at the usual hour, "before bell ring, on pain of forfeiting six stivers." If reasonable business detained them, they had to provide a substitute, and failing therein to suffer a fine of two guilders for each omission, the proceeds being set aside "for the benefit of the general watch." They were subjected to a fine of a guilder for every time they were drunk on duty, or insolent, or committed nuisance in going the rounds; if "found asleep on the street," a fine of ten stivers for each offense was to be paid, and, if through sleeping on post, or negligence, any arms were taken or stolen, the guilty watchman was required to pay for the loss. Profanity and blasphemy against God were punishable by a fine of ten stivers; threatenings and fighting were penalized; leaving the watch without permission involved a fine of two guilders for each offense. The watchmen were required to take an oath of obedience before a burgomaster. Regulations were made for the lock-up, money, fines, etc. When the watchmen went on their rounds, they were obliged "to call out how late it is, at all the corners of the streets, from nine O'Clock in the evening until reveille beat in the morning," for which purposes it was granted 18 guilders to cover the cost. "There was a captain of the rattle watch."— Ibid., VII: 196-98. See also Nov. 15, 1658; Jan. 7, 1661. Regarding the proposed organization of a rattle-watch or night police at an earlier date, see Nov. 16, 1654.

The provincial council issues an order "declaring that Wampum, in settlements between Man and Man," that is in private transactions, "shall pass at Eight White and Four Black beads for one stiver, on condition that six weeks be allowed to Debtors to pay outstanding debts," at the old rate of six white and three black beads. — Laws & Ord. N. Y., 120, note. The city bench promulgated this order the next day. — Rec. N. Am., I: 39-40. But on Nov. 7, the city fathers sent another remonstrance to Stuyvesant and the council relative to the value of wampum, and on the 11th of this month, Councillor De Decker submitted reasons and arguments in council on the subject, which led at once to the provision of another ordinance by that body. — Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 202. See Nov. 29, 1657; and Nov. 11, 1658.

Stuyvesant sails from New Amsterdam to Esopus, now Kings- too, "with about 50 men . . . to see whether the Indians had made good the bases caused by them, according to their promises," given when he was there in May-June. — N. Y. Col. Dict., XIII: 93. See also May 28, 1658.

The burgomasters and shepens petition the council for leave to erect a pier (hoof, erroneously translated "hoist") by Valentine in Man. Comm. Coun., 1850, 447-48. On the 14th, the council by order gave permission for the construction of the desired pier and for collecting wharfage. — Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 202 (where the date is erroneously given as 1657). See also in Rec. N. Yeth., VIII: 1635, State Library. Thus, the first footprint of Manhattan Island, with the exception of the little dock built by Stuyvesant in 1648-9 (see July 4, 1647; 1648) at Schreyer's Hook, stood at the foot of the present Moore St. on Pearl St. Actual construction began on April 21, 1659 (see April 18, 1659). It was completed on or about July 19, 1659 (Lot No.), and was extended in November, 1660 (see Nov. 3, 1660), and several times thereafter. It was known as the Wijnbruch (wine-bridge, or wine-dock) or weigh-house pier. — See Castello Plan, II: 214. See also Nov. 28 and Dec. 22, 1659.

Resulting from a remonstrance of the burgomasters and the scheepers (see oct. 9, 1658), the provincial government now promulgates another ordinance on the rates of wampum in New Netherland. The former reduction from six to eight white, and three to four black beads to a stiver has not reduced prices in "needful commodities and family necessities, arising, among other causes, from the abundance and uncertain condition of the Wampum, which in barter for Beaver, has risen to 16 guilders and more for one Beaver," resulting in a rise of 80 to 100 per cent, in the cost of daily necessities. It is found that "the more Beads the Traders receive for a day's work night, or wage, are given to the Beaver, and consequently, the dearness of wares and even of the most necessary articles, such as Beer and Bread, will continue and he exercised on the ground of the still too great disproportion between the Wampum and Beaver." It is again declared that wampum is "an absolute article of Merchandize, to be, according to its value and quality, bought and sold, bartered and exchanged by measure or guider, as parties—buyer and seller—can agree; and that payment in Wampum above 24 guilders shall not be valid in law, unless it appear otherwise to the Court, by written contract or acknowledgment of parties." As wampum is "a means to procure family supplies for daily use," it is now deemed necessary "to reduce, not Wampum, but the most necessary articles, such as Bread, Beer and Wine, and to raise or lower the prices of them according to the value of Beavers, as the general market rate shall require."

An interesting table of prices for commodities, as fixed by law, forms part of this ordinance, which provides that prices are to be regulated "by the Director General and Council themselves, or by the respective subaltern Magistrates, each in his jurisdiction, with knowledge of the Director General and Council." The exchange is according to three rates of prices for each commodity named, to wit: silver money the equable price; wampum, as it is; and wampum, proportionally reduced everywhere throughout this Province, namely, eight white and four black beads to a stiver.

Wampum had approximately half the value of silver and two-thirds the value of Beaver in the price fixing when this law was written. — Laws & Ord. N. Y., 391-393. See also Nov. 29, 1657; Dec. 22, 1659; and April 21, 1660.

The burgomasters determine to commission the provost or captain of the rattle watch (see Oct. 4), "from now henceforth," to "collect and receive every month from each housekeeper for the support of the Rattle Watch, fifteen stivers, except those whose husbands" are absent from home, and "widows, preachers," and those who are "in somebody's service," according to a list provided. The next day Lodewyk Pos was "authorized and qualified" to collect the subscriptions. — Rec. N. Am., VII: 198-99. On Nov. 29, Johannes Nevisius, the city's secretary, was ordered by the burgomasters "to receive the money" which Pos had collected in his house- to-house visitations. — Ibid., VII: 201-2. In his rounds Pos found there were persons whose names had been omitted from "the roll for the support of the Watch," to other names were ordered entered, in December. — Ibid., VII: 202, 203. In January, 1659, when Pos appeared before the burgomasters under interrogation, he told them that some 50 persons had not paid the watch tax: on Feb. 28, they ordered the treasurer of the city "to allow the Under Schout Revolveit Waldron" to go with Pos "to collect the watch money and to take a pledge" from unwilling persons. — Ibid., VII: 208, 210, 407-417.

The petition of Johannes Nevisius, secretary of the city, to the burgomasters, for permission to "plant the garden behind the City Hall," is granted to him, "together with the Court Messenger" (Pieter Schaafman). — Rec. N. Am., VII: 198.
CHRONOLOGY: THE DUTCH PERIOD: 1626–1664

1658 Martin Cregier and Joannes Pietersen Verbruggen are elected and confirmed as members of the court of orphan-masters of New Amsterdam.

21 Amsterdam. These two additions to this court are made necessary because one of the old members, Pieter Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven, was captured by the Dutch on the business of the West India Co. on the South (Delaware) River, and because an epidemic of "hot fevers" has been raging during the year, "whereof many died." These deaths greatly increased the business of the court "in the regulating of estates."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 158, 199; Min. of Orph. Court, I: 56; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 203.

25 The earliest mention which we have found of "Magaal Paatje" (Maiden Lane) occurs in a mortgage of this date, from Anthony Moore to the heirs of Adrienne Cuvelie (or Cuvelie), late widow of Jan Jansen Dammen, and mother of the Vigne family, on the "Brewery & lot on the Maagle Paatje, bounded E.S. & W. by the land of S9 heires & conveyed to S9 Moore this date."—Book of Mortgages, 1654–1660, 115. On March 3, 1659, the property was transferred to, and a mortgage accepted by, Jan Jansen, the Younger. —Ibid., 117.

Another mention of the name is of record in a conveyance of Nov. 25, 1659, in Liber Deeds, A: 141 (New York); and later one dated Feb. 25, 1656, when Pieter Jansen, ship carpenter, asked the burgomasters "for permission to build a house in the Maagle Paatje, alongside of Cornelis the smith, back of the wharf," which was granted.—Min. of Orph. Court, I: 77. This is the lot adjoining the corner lot of Cornelis Jansen Clepper, at the present Maiden Lane and Pearl St. In another record, of March 18, 1661, the Maagle Paatje is mentioned as the utmost northern limit to which the ratelwatch or night patrol was obliged to make the rounds in "bad weather."—Ibid., II: 89.

All of these references, showing the Dutch origin of the name of this street, are earlier than any hitherto pointed out (cf. article on Maiden Lane, in Sixteenth Annual Report of Amer. Scenic and Hist. Preservation Society, 1911, app. K).

In a city court proceeding of Nov. 8, 1661, the lane is mentioned again. The case was one of the just enacted in "a quantity of cabbage at the house of one Pieter Jansen, ship carpenter, residing at the entrance" of the lane, which shows that Jansen's house had been built sometime between February and October. The accused party was Mersack Martensen, a former master in the employ of the West India Co., who had been "caught and taken over by the Watch" in the act, and then released by the officer, only to be caught again and placed on trial. He was condemned "to stand in the pillory with cabbages on the head" at "the usual place of execution," and there to be "banished five years" from the city's jurisdiction.—Rec. N. Am., III: 405; Min. of Orph. Court, I: 114; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 312.

27 All persons who have "obtained Lots or Plantations in the newly begun Village of Haerlem" are required to take possession and begin to fence and plant there within six weeks' time, "on pain of having the Lots and Plantations not so cared for granted to others."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 561. On the origin of Harlem, see March 1675.

The burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam having petitioned the provincial government for the establishment of two cattle fries annually in the city, it is granted to them by an ordinance of this date. Two "Markets or Fairs," are authorized, "one for Lean cattle, to commence on the first of May and to continue until the end of said month; the other for Fat cattle, to commence on the 20th of October and to terminate on the last of November of each year, during which several periods no Stranger within the City or its jurisdiction" is to "be subject to arrest or loss."—Ibid., 561.

The city court, "in regard to Forriage," proposes that "in place of twenty stivers a ton" the sum of "twenty-five stivers a head" should be charged for the cattle brought over, on condition that the cattle remaining unsold should be carried back free of charge, if the ferry-man agrees to it.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 295; Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 562.

The privilege was promulgated by the city in due form on Jan. 7, 1659, according to a placard which the secretary of the city had been directed, on the 13th of the preceding month, to draw up, in which the burgurers were warned "not to go to meet any one for the purpose of buying Cattle, except only at the place appointed, under a penalty" of fines for disobedience. The city court also directed that "conveyance for the market of everybody bringing cattle to the market" should be "put up."—Ibid., 562.

In April, 1659, the burgomasters made clear their intention, when they decided to give notice that "the Market for lean cattle" should be located "beside the Church Yard, where some stales were to be fixed." Here these cattle were to be for sale. The location was the neighbourhood of the present Broadway and Morris Street, the site of the old "kerkhof" shown on the Castello Plan (see C. Pl. 82b, Vol. II).—Rec. N. Am., I: 421; II: 202–203, 220–221. See also description of Castello Redraft (Frontispiece, Vol. II), II: 344. See also Dec. 15, 1659; Jan. 7, March 7, and April 18, 1659.

It has been discovered that persons, under pretence of keeping boarders, are selling wine, beer, and liquors, "to the prejudice of the general Revenue and of the Tavern keepers," who are publicly licensed to sell, therefore a new law is passed requiring all boarding-houses to pay half the tavern excise on stock and consumption of intoxicants.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 564.

Matheus de Vos, as attorney for Francois Fyn, patente of Varkens (now Blackwell's) Island, is granted an attachment against whatever property on the island may belong to the burgomasters of Harlem, who, at the time, are working on Jonas Bronck and first worked on a plantation belonging to Bronck in 1659. For his default on his lease, see Rec. N. Am., II: 257. Days was punished and banished from the province for selling his wife into immoral slavery, and for gross immorality committed by himself. —Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 207.

Forage Zach Hendrickens Varrevanger petitions the provincial council that a hospital be established for sick soldiers and negroes in the employ of the West India Co. at New Amsterdam. He is requested to look about for a suitable location and for a steward or nurse, and then report thereon to the council.

On the 24th of the month, the council appointed Wilhelte Jansen, a Midwife, as matron of the proposed hospital, which must have been erected before July 10, 1660, as it is included in De Sille's list of that date (C. Pl. 8a, Vol. II) as the "Gasthuis," or "Bruch [Bridge] Street," at the corner of the old brewery plot, behind the five stone houses of the company, then the corner of Brugh Street and Hackensack. This building was later the residence of Van Buren, and is shown on the Castello Plan (C. Pl. 82e, Vol. II). See also pp. 263, 351, Vol. II; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 987. It had been demolished prior to May 24, 1674.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 204; and of Historic New York, II: 297–98. This was probably the first hospital building erected on Manhattan Island. A reference to a hospital in September, 1658, occurs in Rec. N. Am., III: 20–21.

The secretary of the city court "is ordered to draw up a placard of the Cattle Market, Ordering the Burgurers not to go to meet any one for the purpose of buying Cattle, except only at the place appointed" by law, subject to penalties for violations.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 202–203. See Nov. 28, 1658, and Jan. 7, 1659.

Aris Otto buys a house from Michiel Paulusen, the site of the present No. 51 Stone St. Here Otto conducted a tavern.—See Castello Plan, II: 310, 402.

Daniel Litchfield, having resigned as fire inspector on account of "his bad sight and other inconveniences," and "the late Fire Warden, Cristiand Barents" (or Barents), having gone to the South (Delaware) River and died there, the burgomasters propose nominations to Stayveaut and the council, from whom the latter, on the 25th, confirmed Jan Jansen, Jr. and Joannes La Montage, Jan. 26, 1662. —Rec. N. Am., VIII: 207; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 204. On Jan. 4, 1659, the new wardens were informed of their election, and the president of the city court handed them their commission and instructions. Hendrick Hendriksens Kip held over as the third warden.—Rec. N. Am., VIII: 205–7.

The provincial ordinance is noted, prohibiting firing of guns, planting of May-poles, beating of drums, or selling of intoxicants, on May-day or on New-Year's day.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 566. See also Dec. 31, 1655.
.payments to the west india co. for ships' recognizances, for goods to and from new netherland, for the year 1659, amounted to 71,637 florins. in this year, there was sent to new netherland, for the behoof of soldiers, in the year, to "mouss," and "bever," the sum of 3,099.13:8 florins. — n. neth. papers, no. 1220, in n. y. pub. library.

during this year, greiseliers and radisson explored lake superior. — winsor, nar. & crit. hist. of am., iv: 168.

Edward Godfrey, a miller, residing in new amsterdam, and Edward Rigby, with others, patentees and inhabitants of "the provinces of Mayence, and liconia [ly-genia] in new-england," petitioned "the right honourable the parliament of the common-wealth of england" with respect to their alleged rights and possessions, of which they had been deprived; the fifth article of their petition read: "fifthly, the dutch, or new netherlands, their intrusion, insulting, unjust claim, the center heart and bowels, of the country Hudsons river, this year the mouth, Deleware bay, and Canada river to be theirs, and grant sway, patients (their proceedings he hath at larger) 55 years we have beat them, and with the Dutch the bird." the original printed petition broadside, with manuscript additions, is in the public record office, London. photographs, made in October, 1920, are in the n. y. pub. library, carter brown library, mass. hist. soc. library, library of congress, etc.

Cornelis van de Veen, the burgomaster of amsterdam, in order to aid the appeal to Holland to send over labourers for the farms in this province, as well as to invite immigration in general, invoked his muse in the cause, and sent to Amsterdam the first attempt in verse to new netherlands of which we have any knowledge. it is entitled "the complaint of Castello, the mayor's mother," an allegory in which new Amsterdam is personified as the daughter of the old city of Amsterdam, deserted by her mother and left to the kindness of her sponsors (the west india co.), but nevertheless grown to be handsome and with rich property upon which her curious neighbours (the English) have allowed their swine to roam. the poem (translated), in part, recites:

"for, i venture to proclaim,
no one can a maiden name who with richer land is blessed than th' estate by me possessed.

see! two streams my garden bind, from the East and North they wind,— Rivers pouring in the sea,
Rich in fish, beyond degree.

Milk and butter; fruits to eat
No one can enumerate;
Every vegetable known;
Grain the best that 'er was grown.

"all the blessings man 'er knew, Here does our great giver strew..."

The poem was published by henry c. murphy in the anthology of new netherland (1865), 37-45. see also the "memor of Steendam" in ibid., 28-29. for his second poem, "the praise of new netherland," see 1661. see also addenda, 1669.

in a record of what it cost the west india co. during this year for transporting persons to new netherlands, with the loan of ammunition, etc., is an item for writing-materials for the school at new amsterdam, amounting to 290.5 florins. — n. neth. papers, no. 1220, in n. y. pub. library.

in this year, martin creigier erected a tavern at what is now no. 3 broadway. — liber deeds, a: 177, New York. it was re-built in 1664 (liber III, ii: 155, albany), and sold to Peter Bayard in 1689 (liber Deeds, XIII: 185). see castello plan, ii: 217; lambertsburg map. ref. key, iii: 977.

in this year, the new bridge at Hendrikvan de Veen's (bridge at bridge st.) was constructed. — rec. n. am., III: 38. shown on C. pl. 82, vol. II.

during this year grants of land were made to divers negroes near stuyvesant's bouwery. — cal. hist. MPX, dutch, 260. several of these negroes were daughter of the burgomasters who had failed to "bake any coarse bread," about which "the poor commonalty" had made complaint. They reply that it was because grain is dear and they have to "pay beavers for the grain," but get only "sewet [wampum] in return," leaving them no profit. The burgomasters resolve to lay the complaint and defense before stuyvesant. — rec. n. am., VII: 206. this led to the promulgation of a new bread assizes, and the prohibition against the city butchers baking "cakes and sugarcones." — ibid., I: 43-44. see also march 7.

allard Anthony, the city treasurer, reports to the burgomasters that there is not a stayer in the treasury, and that he is unable to get any money. — rec. n. am., VII: 206.

the provincial law and penalties with respect to stealing fence posts, resulting in the destruction of gardens, is now again renewed, as it was on Dec. 30, 1658. — rec. n. am., I: 42-43. for earlier promulgations of this ordinance, see summary of Dec. 31, 1654. also oct. 9, 1655.

the city authorities issue a placard or public notice concerning the establishment of two market days for the sale of lean and fat cattle in new amsterdam. — rec. n. am., I: 42. see Nov. 28, 1658; March 7, 1659.

fire-buckets are delivered at the city hall, and regulations are made for their distribution. see under dec. 15, 1657.

claes van edele, the burgomaster, asks the burgomasters for an appointment as Hal Knegt, or keeper of the shambles; but his request is deferred. there is no record showing any further action until April 18 (p. v.), when Andries de haas was given the appointment, provisionally. — rec. n. am., VII: 207.

the city council grants the burgomasters a lottery for the sale of three thousand bibs to meet the money. — rec. n. am., VII: 207.

cloudy day is ordered by the burgomasters to "put the arms of Amsterdam in new netherlands on the windows of the city hall." — rec. n. am., VII: 208. on Sept. 25, 1664, having done some glazing, he asked the burgomasters where he was to "receive his pay for making the windows for the city." — min. of orph. court, I: 161.

stuyvesant and the council receive an indian grant of lands on the north river in east jersey above Weehawken, including those sold to Michael pauw in 1670. the Dutch from new amsterdam made the first settlement at Bergen in 1618.—n. j. hist. soc. collections, I: 16, 20 et. seq.

some time prior to this date, Cornelis Hendrickse (tambour) received a lot at the south-west corner of William and Wall st., now covered by the Atlantic building. — see castello plan, C. pls. 82, 82e, vol. II and II: 287; map of Dutch grants, C. pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 392.

creyo Jacobsen receives a grant from the burgomasters for a lot on the west side of william st., just south of Wall st., the ground being now in the site of the Atlantic building. — see map of Dutch grants, C. pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 392. rec. n. am., VII: 210.

teunis Kreye (or Craje) petitions the burgomasters "to be harbor master; also tally master of the bricks and tiles imported from Patria [holland] and elsewhere, and that his wife may superintend the market to keep it clean." Upon his petition is endorsed: "Nothing will be done about the market for the present time, respecting the tiles and bricks it is postponed to further order, and regarding the newly made canal (gracht) if he require that, he can draw up a separate petition." — rec. n. am., VII: 209-10. on March 7, he was informed that no harbour-master would be appointed for the time being; yet, on that day (p. v.), the care of the canal, etc. was given over toResolved Waldron. — ibid., 214-15.

two court messengers of the city ask the burgomasters to appoint them "door keepers of the orphan chamber" (orphans' court), which is granted to them. — rec. n. am., VII: 210.

Martin creigier, having just been elevated to the office of a burgomaster, and his new duties precluding his giving time to the court of orphan-masters of which he is a member, the burgomasters nominate Paulus Colecordtse van griff and Allard Anthony as candidates. from them, stuyvesant and the council, on the 10th, elected Anthony as successor, and on the 19th, Paulus Leendertse van griff and Joannes Pietersen were elected, receiving their commissions on the 14th. Anthony,
The directors at Amsterdam find fault with Stuyvesant and his council because, on Jan. 25, 1658 (see summary of Nov. 7, 1656), they granted a fourth part of the revenue of the public weigh-house at New Amsterdam to the city without first obtaining their approval. The provincial authorities replied, on July 23, 1659 (q. v.), that the proceeds had not as yet been paid over to the city treasury, on account of this complaint, and would not be before further orders were received from Amsterdam. In December, the directors made their displeasure again known, because their representatives gave away the company's income without warrant of an authority promised upon "the reasons and necessity for such a measure." They were "sure that the revenues and expenses of the city," and asked for a bill of particulars "by the first opportunity," ordering meanwhile that the city fathers be obliged to "give without fail a detailed account every year of the revenues already granted to the city," so that the directors might be able to determine "whether these revenues were "properly administered."—*N. Y. Col. Docs., X IV: 435, 441, 449; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 189.

In a very important letter of this date, the directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant and the council, among other things, about "an enlarged freedom of foreign trade for the inhabitants," which had been asked for. They find it fraught with dangers of an increase in smuggling and a deprivation of the country's revenues. They have, however, "after mature deliberation," concluded that the "experiment" of the provincial government should be undertaken on their ratification, "provisionally," but with the proviso that the ships which go "thence to France, Spain, Italy, the Caribbean Islands and other countries to vend and sell their cargoes of the produce of the country, salted fish, wares and mercantiles," shall be "bound to return directly with the freights" they obtain therefrom to Amsterdam in Holland, or again to New Netherland at the same prices they paid there, except as the West India Co. derives from them in Holland. It is also "declared that no beavers, otters or other peltries" shall be "exported, except in ships" which come directly over to Holland. The directors say that whatever relates "to the duties to be fixed on the exported agricultural products of the country, timber, wares, salted or dried fish, and whatever else," they would "rather refer" to Stuyvesant and his council for fixing thereon "such reasonable duties, provisionally," with their approval, as may be "considered proper." The directors come to this decision because, as they write: "We are ignorant here what your English neighbours have enacted hereupon in their own regard, and being fearful of committing herein some error through ignorance."—*Rec. N. Am., VII: 235-256. There is another translation in *N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 431.

The directors at Amsterdam, writing to Stuyvesant and the council, state that they have considered a recommendation made in Holland at the request of the burgomasters of New Amsterdam and some of its principal inhabitants for "some feasible relief ... from the duty (Pagoht) on the N. Netherland tobacco," and that they have "earnestly tried all possible means to exempt it entirely," but have met with "difficulties and obstacles," which they believe resulting from their hopefulness for a psychological occasion, when they will press the matter again, and, if successful, communicate the fact to New Netherland.—*Rec. N. Am., VII: 256-275. There is another translation in *N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 431-432.

The burgomasters deny the request of the burgomasters of New Amsterdam for an additional six per cent, at the public weigh-house, as they perceive "great objections" to such a change. They write: "The merchants there on purchasing tobacco and other wares, on which the English do not allow any rebate or discount, can make sufficient calculation, without any danger, thereupon, as they doubtless do; for everyone is sufficiently knowing [as] to his own interest and is therefore sufficiently alive and aware thereof."—*Rec. N. Am., VII: 214, 217. There is another translation in *N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 432. See also Sept. 22, 1664.

On Oct. 4, 1658 (q. v.), the burgomasters of New Amsterdam decided to ask the directors of the West India Co. at Amsterdam for supervision of all auction sales of real estate in the city. These sales were always conducted by the provincial secretary, who received a commission of five per cent, on all real estate sold, and paid the highest bidder at public venue. He had to attend the sales, and make all arrangements for carrying them out, collect the purchase money, and, "in case of bad debts, make up and pay the defect," as well as pay the provincial court messenger, who acted as the auctioneer. The arguments put forth by the city, why the office of auctioneer and the sale of real estate within the City should be committed to the charge of the commomalty or its Secretary, are so convincing that the directors at Amsterdam now grant the request and relieve Cornelis van Ruyven, the provincial secretary, from these duties. Hereafter, there is required to "he paid for sales of real estate into the Company's treasury in cases of voluntary sales the 50th penny, one half by the seller, the other by the purchaser," and on sales by the auction, in the nature of sheriff's sales, "the 80th penny by the purchaser alone, together" to the Company. The directors also "gives his office fees."—*Rec. N. Am., VIII: 195, 227; *N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 435, 442, 450. See also Aug. 8, 1659.

The directors at Amsterdam, in a letter to Stuyvesant and his council, say: "The arguments brought forward [see Sept. 19, 1658], why for the establishment of a Latin school there it is necessary to send from here [Holland] a fit and honest man, to instruct the children in the elements and foundations of the language, have induced us to decide, that such a teacher shall be sought for, care being taken, that he writes a good hand, to teach the children also calligraphy; you may expect him by the ships sailing from here [Holland]."—*Rec. N. Am., VIII: 440. Under Carolus Curtius was the teacher chosen (see Apr. 10, 1659).

Salt, as a commodity, is proposed as a special monopoly of the West India Co. in New Netherland. The directors at Amsterdam order that the stock shall "be stored in the Company's Warehouse [at New Amsterdam] and not be sold by anyone except by the Company at a fair and honest price."—*N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 439. On this, very strong criticisms were drawn up by Stuyvesant and the council, in their letter of July 23, showing in detail that the execution of this mandate would be an infringement of the company's charter and general interest, and at least obstruct, the commerce of New Netherland to the embarrassments and injury of the province and the company.—*Rec. N. Am., XIV: 439-440. These arguments were convincing, and, on Dec. 22, the directors wrote: "We withdraw our former orders for the present, so that the salt trade may be carried with perfect freedom as formerly," subject to the usual rule of delivery of "one fourth part of the cargo ... to the Company free of all expenses."—*Rec. N. Am., XIV: 449.

Cornelis van Ruyven, as receiver-general of the finances of the company in New Netherland, is given "an advisory and conclusive vote ... on questions concerning the finances," by authority of the directors at Amsterdam.—*N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 449. The burgomasters resolve to "demand of the Church Wardens [a] correct acct of the property of the Church." On the following day (23d), they handed to Stuyvesant and the council nominations for new church-wardens.—*Rec. N. Am., VII: 213.

The burgomasters deliver their list of "masters," of the year 1655, "for furnishing money to the City Treasury." On the 26th, he repeated his delivery of the assessment list, accompanied by "an obligation passed by Pieter Jansen *Emilicus, first of Nov' 1655."—*Rec. N. Am., VII: 213. This is the assessment of October, 1655, the first of which we have a list in the records.—*Rec. N. Am., VII: 213. The burgomasters prepare a draft of a certificate for granting the great burgerright in New Amsterdam, according to the privileges conferred on the city, on Feb. 2, 1657. At the same time they authorize the secretary of the city to receive fees, "for the writing of the great Burgerr certificate in New Amsterdam," and for a substitute Burgerr certificate twelve stivers. The certificates are issued by the presiding burgomaster, who affixes the city's seal.—*Rec. N. Am., VII: 214.
On March 9, the burgomasters resolved to summon before themselves, the schout, and the presiding schepen, on the 14th, "some Burgers" who have "lots lying vacant, in order to have them apprised either by themselves or by the Burgomasters," in case they will "not build on them according to the Placard published from the City Hall by the Director General and Council and by the Burgomaster, and to have them destroyed by the Secretary" of the city.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 214-15.

The ordinance alluded to, see Jan. 15, 1658.

The directors at Amsterdam select as Latin schoolmaster for Apr.
New Amsterdam Alexander Carolus Curius (or Curtius), who has appeared before them as an applicant. He is engaged "at a yearly salary of 300 flor., of which one quarter shall be paid him in advance, that he may procure what books he requires.

The Board further grants him a gratuity of 100 flor., which the Company will lay out in available merchandise to be used by him upon his arrival in New Netherland, where a piece of land convenient for a garden or orchard shall be allotted to him by the Director-General.

He shall also be allowed to give private instructions, as far as this can be done without prejudice to the duties, for which he is engaged.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 436-37. Curtius sailed on the 25th. (p. 3.)

During Jansen Niemegh (or Niemeg) promises the burgomasters 18 "to go to work next Monday [April 21] at the commenced pier (hoef) and further to complete it."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 219. This was the new pier or bridge on Pearl St., at the foot of the present Moore St. See also July 4, 1647; Nov. 9, 1658; July 11, 1659; and Nov. 3, 1666. Your Honor to be pleased to make the same known to your subjects, so that if any proprietor be among them, who may be inclined to repair hither with their Cattle at the time fixed in the enclosed, they may regulate themselves accordingly.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 215-16. See also Nov. 28.

The burgomasters resolve "to post some notices, that the Market for lean cattle shall be also in the Court of the Old Church (kerck, the cemetery on Broadway), where some stalls shall be set up, in order that those, who bring any cattle to Market for sale, shall offer them there."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 220-21, revised with original manuscript in office of city clerk, New York. This indicates only a cattle market-place, for the sale of live cattle. See Nov. 28, 1668.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant and his council: "We have lately been shown a small piece of mineral, which is said to have come from New-Netherland and which we found to be good and pure copper, so that we have thought it worth while to have it brought to Amsterdam "(vlees haal) the baker," who is given "charge thereof," provisionally. Rec. N. Am., VII: 219. It stood at the present Whitehall and Bridge Sts. and was the first meat market in New Amsterdam. See Castellano Plan, II: 345; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 958. See Jan. 10, 1659.

The burgomasters resolve "to post some notices, that the Market for lean cattle shall be also in the Court of the Old Church (kerck, the cemetery on Broadway), where some stalls shall be set up, in order that those, who bring any cattle to Market for sale, shall offer them there."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 220-21.
The directors at Amsterdam send over "tweezele copies of a little book, called 'Ordinances and Code of Procedure before the Courts of the City of Amsterdam,' which they ask to have distributed among the burgomasters and schepens, to be put into practice."

On November 20, 1657, Richard Cromwell resigns the Protectorate.

The Luthers of New Amsterdam write to the consistory at Amsterdam, Holland, of the departure of the Rev. Johannes Ernestus Goetwater, and request the consistory to obtain consent from the state generals and directors at Amsterdam of the West India Co. to have another Lutheran minister. From archives of Evangelical Luth. Church, Amsterdam. See also Aug. 14, 1657.

The directors-general and council have favored the city with one fourth of the proceeds of the beaver or public weigh-scales, for its own benefit. The burgomasters now authorize the city treasurer, Paulus Leendertsen vander Grift, to arrange with 'the [provincial] Secretary Cornelis van Ruyven for the proceeds and income of the beam, and to receive the money.'—Rec. N. Am., VII: 225. See also July 23, 1659.

Among those appearing before the burgomasters and requesting the small bargerright, "is Carel Beauvois of Leiden, intending to keep school here."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 225. Beauvois was engaged subsequently (July, 1661) as "reader, preceptor, schoolmaster and sexton of the village of Breuckelen."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 56. Cf. Kilpatrick, op. cit., p. 91.

July

A few weeks prior to this date, Alexander Carolus Curtius opened his Latin school, on the site of the present 26 Broad St. (Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 94). For this purpose he had been dispatched from Holland, on April 25 (q.v.), by the directors at Amsterdam. He has but few pupils, less than 25. In addition to the salary received from the directors (see Apr. 10, 1658), he is informed on this day, at a meeting of the burgomasters and schepens, "that fl. 200 are allowed him as a yearly present from the city;" an order on the city treasurer is also handed him "for fl. 50 over and above, which he thankfully accepts; but requests as he has but few scholars as yet, that his salary may be somewhat increased, as the beginning entails great expense, saying whenever he gets 25 to 50 children to the school he shall serve for less salary."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 223-24. The tuition fixed for boys at the school was six guilders per quarter.—Ibid., VII: 257. In a letter to the directors, dated July 23, Stuyvesant informed them officially of the arrival of Curtius, and added: "We hope and trust, that the community shall reap the desired fruits through their children, to God may give his blessing; the state of the school shall be reported to you in due time."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 106. See also Aug. 6, 1659.

Govr. Lookerman requests permission from the burgomasters "to lay a drain to carry off the water from his lot." They decide to have an examination made of the conditions, and then "dispose of the matter according to circumstances."—Rec. N. Am., VIII: 242.

The secretary of the city, Joannet Nevius, is ordered to inform the skipers "lying in the roadstead" before New Amsterdam that the burgomasters and schepens have secured from the provincial government "authority to take from traders and skipers, for the erection of a Pier, and for the benefit thereof, 6 stivers per last for loading and discharging at the aforesaid Pier [on Pearl St., at the foot of the present Moore St.]; the smaller merchandize and goods in proportion," of which the skipers are to pay one-third and the owners or receivers two-thirds. Each skiper then "lying in the road [of the East River], or in the North River above to discharge," is "ordered by the directors to his duty owing to the Treasurer" of the city "before his departure," for the benefit of the city, "on account of the accommodation received . . . through the above-mentioned Pier."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 225. See also July 4, 1647; Nov. 9, 1658; April 18, and Dec. 12, 1659; and Nov. 5, 1660.

Stuyvesant and the council write to the directors at Amsterdam at this time, "If the workman may make the masons go as fast as it does now, we may hope to have the fort [at New Amsterdam] completed by next summer; then it will be necessary to build new carriages for the guns, for which we shall require also wheels."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 445.

The Secretary of the City of Amsterdam maintains that one of the reasons why they cannot at this time undertake to build a blockhouse at Oyster Bay is because "the few negroes of the Company" are required for the quarrying and hauling of stone, lime, and other materials intended "for the walls of this [New Amsterdam] fort."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 441.

On the same date they inform the directors at Amsterdam that the burgomasters of New Amsterdam have been allowed the "fourth of the revenue of the beam" or public weigh-scales "only subject to . . . ratification" by the directors; that nothing has yet been paid over, and that payment will be suspended until the directors give further advice in the premises.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 230. See also June 27, 1659, and Aug. 8, 1659.

Cornelis Barens, baker, is given, by the burgomasters, the post of measurer of "all grain and lime coming from without, and to receive as fee from one Burgher delivering to the other, according to the regulation to be given him thereof."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 227.

Michiel Cornelisz. Siperus (Sipperus, Zippers, or Zyperus), Aug., who was "for a long while at Curacaó," and "preached there, but who was sent away," now proceeds to New Netherland in the hope of receiving a call in the province. His reputation among the clergy in Alkmaar and Amsterdam is that he has been, "from his youth up, a good for nothing person." While in the high school (Gymnasium) at Alkmaar, he was chastised before the entire body of students "for many wicked acts," especially for fraudulent purchases at stores, made in the name of the rector, and then thrown in his own behalf.

Siperus united with the Dutch church at New Amsterdam in January, 1660, as a student in divinity. On Dec. 14, 1660, the deputies of the classis of Alkmaar warned Rev. Samuel Drissius against him, fearing that he might be allowed to preach in New Netherlands; but he never received ecclesiastical permission to officiate, so far as the records reveal. Drissius accused him of most shameless conduct, "drinking, cheating and forgery other people's writings." He left New Amsterdam about 1664 for Virginia, where he joined the Church of England.—Col. Hist. Miss., Dutch, 331; Eclere, Rec., I: 492, 506, 507, 514; Drissius to the classis, Aug. 5, 1664, in Jameson's Narr. N. Am., 415; N. Y. Gen. & Bioj. Rec., 1274; Corwin's Mem. IV: 574.

As we have seen, the city of New Amsterdam was granted, on Jan. 25, 1658 (q.v.), the fourth part of the income of the beam or public weigh-scales, from which to relieve itself of old and new debts; and the directors at Amsterdam made objection to the privilege, so that Stuyvesant and the council agreed to hold up the paying over of any proceeds until further instructed by their superiors in Holland. Now the burgomasters of the city address the provincial government in regard to a letter of the preceding Feb. 13, in which the directors at Amsterdam denied the city's request for an additional part of the revenue of the beam. The burgomasters, therefore, fall back on their grant of the fourth part; remind the provincial authorities that the time for payment has "long since expired;" and that the city treasurer has indeed been sent to the company's receiver of revenues for the city's part, but that he found him non-committal, although stating that, as yet, he has "no order to pay anything to the City on account of the Beam." The burgomasters ask Stuyvesant and the council to "give orders to the Receiver, to count out" to the city treasurer such moneys as are allowed the city "from the proceeds of the Beam." On Aug. 21, they were again referred to the decision made by the directors at Amsterdam in the letter of Feb. 15, 1659 (q.v.).—Rec. N. Am., VII: 229-30.

The city of New Amsterdam was granted by the directors at Amsterdam, on Feb. 13 of this year (q.v.), the right to control all public sales of real estate in the city. There was some uncertainty as to the interpretation, with respect to fees and expenses. The burgomasters, therefore, now wish to have the matter clarified, and write to Stuyvesant and the council for an explanation, especially because "some sales of real estate" are about to take place and a house has "been offered for sale," but has not been disposed of, wherefore the vendee-master or auctioneer does not know that he is entitled to receive "both from the writing, lose time whether sold or not; also the emoluments appertaining thereto; and also whether the Court Messenger must be paid out of the 10 stivers for his crying," as has heretofore been done before the city was in control. Stuyvesant and the council gave answer, on Aug. 21, in these words: "From the real estate, which shall henceforth be by the City's Secretary in quality as Vendu Master, shall be taken and received to stive: per C1 from what is offered but not sold, half so much,
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

The supplying of the provisional authorities, was finally arrested, by order of Stuyvesant, "in his own house," and, "last spring [1669], 10 was sent by the ship De Bruynswich [Porpoise] back to Holland"—Eccles. Rec., i. 449. For full particulars concerning the Lutheran controversy, see Oct. 4, 1653.

Cornelis Steerwyck is chosen a schepen of the city, in place of Jeronimus Ebbigho, who has departed for Holland in the ship "Moersman."—Rec. N. Am., iii: 45.

Twenty of the principal men of New Amsterdam address a remonstrance to the burgomasters, who, they declare, are "sufficiently acquainted with the low condition and pleasures of his hearers," and whom Stuyvesant has hoped to accompany to Esopus. He says, however: "I have suffered almost daily from a violent fever, which still continues, so that my indisposition does not allow me to go from home now." Instead, he sends Dominie Megapolonis to accompany Bloom, and trusts the people at Esopus will find Bloom an acceptable candidate as a minister to them.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 102; see also 105.

Augustine Heerman (or Heermons) requests the burgomasters by a petition for permission "to lay out his garden" (at the present Beaver and William Sts.), and they declare he shall "first satisfy Allard Anthony for costs incurred on the garden," and, when that is done, he may "lay out and sell the garden."—Rec. N. Am., vii: 271.

September

Cornelis Steerwyck produces in the court his account against the city, and requests "that something now and again be paid and delivered, and also an order on the Weighmaster." On Nov. 18, his colleagues in the court voted him an order on the city treasurer for 500 guilders in partial payment of his claim.—Rec. N. Am., iii: 57-58, 78; see also April 1, 1668. The very interesting account relates to the financing of the city's works in 1653, 5, stockading at present Wall Street and sharing of the East River bank; improvements on the City Hall, and, more recently, materials furnished for the new pier or bridge at Pearl St. at the foot of the present Moore St. This statement, dated Sept. 1, 1659, is of record, viz:

"Amsterdam, in N. Netherland, 1659. tits, 7per

"Was Signed"

"Lower Stood"

"At Worshipful, I request now payment herewith, and remain Your W's humble servant."

"Cornelis Steerwyck."

—Ibid., III: 37-38.

Stuyvesant complains to the directors at Amsterdam that the "free people" sent over by the company and at its expense, proved, upon their arrival, "to be mostly traders and hence persons accustomed to labor," who quickly became "a charge of the Poor-masters," whilst others, "more honest," entered the military service. He tells them that what the country needs is "farmers or farmalaborers, foreigners and exiles, used to labor and poverty."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 444.

"Stuyvesant informs the directors at Amsterdam that he has been ill during the past four weeks, with a sickness and a hot internal fever" (perhaps typhoid fever), and indicates his convalescence under medical treatment, adding that he has now been upon his feet "for two or three days," but remains "still very sick and weak."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 444. See Aug. 5, 1668.

Megapolonis and Driicius, writing to the classic of Amsterdam, say that Gustavus first Lutheran clergyman in New Amsterdam, who was banned by Stuyvesant and the council, but who evaded deportation for several years and preached in defiance of Stuyvesant writes to the directors: "The Latin schoolmaster or rector, lately sent over, complains of his salary, because he says it is impossible to support himself decently with it, as you may see by his enclosed letter to us. Your repeated instructions do not prevent the Turk, to rake up every possible item of the "distrustful knowledge." We have therefore referred him to you, promising him our favorable recommendation: we now request your Honor's advice, whether a reasonable sum may not be granted him for board money. As to his services and his diligence, we must truly testify, that his industry is astonishing and the progress of the young people promising. The directors further requested to send over "some medicinal seeds and plants" from the "Botanical Garden at Leyden" for cultivation in New Amsterdam.

—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 445. For the directors' reply, see Dec. 22.

In a letter of Feb. 17, the directors at Amsterdam granted greater liberty to the people of New Netherland in foreign trade—

N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 431; Rec. N. Am., VII: 225-26; see also Sept. 11, 1658. As a result, Stuyvesant and the council now inform them, "several prominent bargers" of New Amsterdam freighted a flyboat, named the "Meulen" or "Gleie Meulen," despatching her "directly to France," "with boards and other lumber...to be exchanged for wine and other goods." It was "the first attempt" to introduce direct commerce to France from New Netherland.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 445. On this account, some special committee of the directors thought that these "should be urged, that whilst these undertakers clamored for more, because they were "the first to attempt this channel of trade," these persons would "deny to have been accessories to the first fraud, committed by this ship or by her crew in bringing over, against special order, a quantity of beavers and other furs sold by them in France," as the supercargo himself had informed them. This was smuggling, which had to be stopped, or they would withdraw the liberty and privileges, provisionally granted for this foreign trade.—Ibid., XIV: 452.

Owing to the very grave state of affairs in the colony of New Amstel, on the Delaware, Stuyvesant imprisoned Cornelia van Ruyven, provincial secretary, and Capt. Marten Cregier, first burgomaster of New Amstel, to proceed there with reinforcements and to regulate the affairs of the colony. They embark and sail from New Amstel on this day in three vessels, "with their demi-lieutenants," under Cregier's command, arriving at Fort Altena on the 26th.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XII: 260-65.

Augustine Heerman andResolved Waldron are commissioned by Stuyvesant as envoys from New Netherland to Gov. Jonas Fendall, of Maryland, to negotiate for the remittance and return of freemen and servants who have decamped from the Dutch settlements to the British colonies, and to impress taxes and duties upon them, to promise like service on the part of the Dutch government to the province of Maryland; also to protest against the conduct of Col. Nathaniel Utie in regard to the colony of New Amstel, on the Delaware, as a contravention of the articles of peace between the mother countries, in 1664, and to demand, therefore, from the government and council of Maryland, "right and justice against the said Colonel Nathaniel Utie with compensation of the expenses, already had through his frivolous demand and bloody threats."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XII: 261-62. Heerman kept a daily journal from their setting out from New Amstel, on Sept. 30, until Waldron's return from Maryland, overland, on Oct. 21. This important journal has been printed.—Ibid., II: 88-98. Although the embassy was immediately unsuccessful, its work had far-reaching consequences. Fendall and his council treated contemptuously the exceptions advanced by the Dutch envoy to Lord Baltimore's patent. Nevertheless, those exceptions formed the ground upon which the English committee of trade and plantations decided, in 1685, that Delaware did not belong to Maryland.—Broadhead, Hist. State of N. T., I: 665 (note).

A peace conference between the Dutch and Mohawks is held at Fort Castle, Kughanwe, on the Mohawk River. While there, the Dutch commissioners received "a package with letters, brought by a Maquaes of the third Castle from Trois Rivières. It was directed to Mr. Jacob de Hison, who being present," the package was opened, and found to contain, among other letters, one to Stuyvesant from Simon van Sprang, a French Jesuit missionary.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 115-14.

Stuyvesant rides to Breuckelen, Midwout, and Amersfoort to reassure the people, who are in great fear of Indian depredations.

Stuyvesant calls together "the Burgomasters, Scheepen and the Captains of the trainbands" of New Amsterdam and tells them, "in the name of His Highness [Kingston, and that succor and relief] are needed, which can only be secured with the assistance of the citizens." An effort is made to secure volunteers by the captains of the city militia. In two days, "not more than 6 or 8 made their appearance," because "terror and fear" had "taken hold of the citizens." In the meantime, Lieut. Bryan Neavice was sent to the English and Dutch villages, and Stuyvesant "called together the six soldiers of New-Haerlem, 3 from Staten-Island, the train-men down to the clerks" in the company's office, to whom he joined four of his house-servants, three from his bouwery, and 3 or 6 newly enlisted men, making up a company of 35 men. Enlistments went on slowly, because of the unwillingness of the citizens to serve, who even "encouraged and instigated each other not to let themselves be employed for the expedition to Esopus, while some were held enough to say they were not obliged to jeopardize themselves 'against barbarous savages,'" being "bound only to defend their own place."

On account of Indian depredations, Stuyvesant and the council issue a notice in which they instruct everyone who is able and willing "to serve for the protection of the country and destruction of the Indians, whether on monthly wages or as Volunteers for six months," to apply to appointed authorities, in order to be granted the commission of Captains and lieutenants, under the orders of Lieut.-Governor, or to Captain-Lieutenant Brian Nation [Bryan Newton], who shall give correct information to all.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 252.

Stuyvesant, in this hour of extremity, again "conveyed the magistrates and captains of the trainbands" on Oct. 2, when he told them he had "36 to 40 men soldiers as train-men ready and hoped that 20 or 30 Englishmen would join from the villages." He "directed them to assemble under arms the three companies of citizens early next day," in order that he might, "by reminding of their honour and duty," ascertain how many would volunteer, and, if this proved a failure, to "detail one of the three companies, by lot and prize time, who would oppose them," according to their merits. This purpose was carried out the next day. The three companies were called out under arms, but when Stuyvesant asked who would go with him, although he was still weak from his sickness, as he reminded them, "not more than 24 or 25 men came forward, "which number was thought to be insufficient. Therefore one of the three companies was designated by lot and "ordered to be ready for embarkation the next Sunday after divine service, under a penalty of 50 guilders" for dereliction. He told the members of this company that if any were "faint-hearted or afraid" they "could find a sufficient place for them elsewhere."

"The citizens, their wives, their children, their friends," he tells the company of freeholders that if any were "faint-hearted or afraid they could find a sufficient place for them elsewhere." To the company of freeholders he tells the citizens, their wives, their children, their friends, "it is not the business of the government to decide this, but to let them make up their minds for the service of the country."

On Sunday, after sermon, "the aforesaid company of citizens numbering about one hundred, embarked with the few officers and clerks and train-men, to whom came late in the evening 24 or 26 Englishmen and hardly as many savages from Long Island, who embarked the next morning." About noon of Oct. 6, they sailed from Manhattan, and the 10th, on account of contrary wind and tide, landed "about a quarter of a mile below the Kill [Esopus River] in order not to lose any time and not to show any discouragement."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 124-25. See Oct. 9, 1669.

Augustine Heerman and Resolved Waldron, delegates from New Netherland, address the governor and council of Maryland in vindication of the Dutch title to the Delaware River. They allege such an apportionment of America as gave "the Dutch the Maryland, from 36 to 42 degrees north latitude. These "Dutch plantations," they say, were "then called by the general name of Manhattans, after the name of the Indians, who first inhabited the same. And here 'tis to be noted that they commit a grave mistake who will confine the general name of Manhattans aforesaid to the particular city," which is only built on the little island, "but the name of the whole Province, as it is frequent, with many, still at this day, to say—go to the Manhattans, or to come from the Manhattans—when they mean the whole Province, as they do by the name of Virginia or Maryland, for the particular town or city is never called the Manhattans, but New Amsterdam."—N. Y. Col. Docs., II: 80-81.

By proclamation, on Sept. 30, Stuyvesant set apart this day 15

THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

1659. as a day of general fasting and prayer. The reasons were an Oct. epidemic during this summer of a "painful and long, lingering sickness," and the "devastating Indian war" at the Esopus and other parts of the province.—N. Y. Col. Docs., III: 78-79.

29. Stuyvesant sends an important letter to the directors at Amsterdam, under cover to Edward Man, a merchant: 14th of the month.
"It is seen," by a circuitous route over New-England as well as over Virginia," in the hope that one of the copies will reach its destination "before the sailing of the summer ships" from Holland.
He tells them of "the very precarious and dangerous condition of the country," which, "according to the judgment of the most serious and best minded people," has not been so dangerous for years. His expectation is that "sucor and assistance" will be speedily sent to him from Holland "for the maintenance and protection of this weak province and its inhabitants." He narrates to the directors what has transpired recently at Esopus (Kingston), the measures he has taken, with the cooperation of the officials of New Amsterdam, for defending Esopus against Indian besiegers, and his arrival with reinforcements near the Esopus River on Oct. 10. He particularly emphasizes the cowardice of the citizens who were to have accompanied him on the expedition, and states that he sees no hope in dependence upon any unarmed 30, and Nov. 28, 1654. See also Addenda.

The schout, burgomasters, and city treasurer accept bids for farming out "the Burghe Excise of Wine and Beer to be consmumed within the jurisdiction of this City of New Amsterdam, continuing to the Fresh Water." The farmer is required to pay his "promised rent in good current pay" to the treasurer of the city in quarterly sums. He is obliged to have office hours—in winter, from 8 till 11 a. m., and 2 till 5 p. m.; in summer, from 7 till 10 a. m., and 2 till 6 p. m. He is also bound to give the rent by two bondsmen for the payment of his rent. Ralphus vander Breek was the successful bidder, and Jaanes de La Montagne, Jr and Thomas Verdon were his sureties, on Oct. 31.—Rec. N. A., III: 68-69.

30. The directors at Amsterdam order that skippers sailing to New Netherlands shall not privately bring letters to Amsterdam from there; but that letters are to be carried in sealed mail-bags; and that failure to obey the order shall subject the skipper to a fine of 100 carobs guilders for each offense.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV:
Issue; Laws & Ord. N. Y., 379; see also summary of Aug. 6, 1652.
Stuyvesant promulgated the order on June 3, 1660.—Laws & Ord.
N. Y., 380.

Nov. Nominations are made to fill a vacancy of church-warden in 14 New Amsterdam, caused by the absence of Pieter Tonnenman, who has gone to Holland.—Rec. N. A., VII: 237.

21 The New Amsterdam Council of New Amsterdam decide to send an order to Jacques Cortelyou, the official surveyor, to furnish them with "a memorandum of the breadth of each lot situated on each side of the Heere Graff [present Broad Street] as far as it extends," which lots he has already "measured" in their presence.

They again asked him for "a list of the measurement[s] of the lots" on Feb. 7, 1660; and, on Feb. 13, a record was made of 21 names of the persons taxed for the Heere Graff or canal. At the same time, they directed the city treasurer "to collect and recieve" from those residents the amounts assessed on each "in payment of the expenses incurred in making up and sheet piling the Canal."—Ibid., 245, 246-47. On the 27th of the month, several of the residents appeared before the burgomasters to seek release from the assessment, alleging that they derived no benefit from the improvement. They were ordered, however, to pay their share, and if they had to do so, one tenth part thereof being due within a month.—Ibid., VII: 248-49.

This did not settle the matter. A general petition was put into circulation by the residents in June, 1660, requesting the burgomasters to "designate those who have derived most benefit from the construction of the aforementioned Canal to help pay the expenses with them," and they asked for a delay of eight days, which was granted on June 18. Stuyvesant was also invited to take a hand in the matter.

The collection of this assessment was resisted by several persons, among whom Willemsen, perhaps the most prominent baker in town, was removed to the prison chamber of the city hall for refusing to pay his quota. Hans Dreiper alleged he had been exempted by Stuyvesant; he was let off with an assessment of 40 guilders because he had to sell both in front and at the side of the canal, his property being at the outlet at the East River, now Pearl Street. Jogiam Beeckman objected to payment because he knew "no reason for it," but acknowledged "he must bear what the Magistrates do." If the mayor did not order him to pay his quota in three instalments, one being payable each half year.
He said he could not do it, so was "ordered to be removed to the prison chamber." Coenraet ten Eyck, when ordered to pay, demurred, on the ground that he had "more dirt than before" at his place and derived no profit from the canal. He was told to pay up or expect summary action. Fredrick Lubbertsen complained of "the taking away his lot &., by which he suffered great loss," and "he was allowed to pay his assessed quota in four instalments." Willemsen, the baker, was brought again into court, and told he might pay in three instalments, to which he replied defiantly that he could not do it, "and that the Magistrates can do what they please about it. The court then (June 28) decided that all who were assessed should pay, "to wit—those who have heavy payments, in four instalments, and the lighter in three; and that the Treasurer should "send a note to each house and cause them to be notified three times by Jan Gille and Koeck, and after three refusals, have execution levied by the Officer [schout], P. Tonne-

The old canal in the present Broad Street is referred to in the records of 1644 and 1646 as "the Dutch" or "Common Dutch," and in 1652 as "the New-England Ships," which was filled up and the street paved in 1676. The street was called Broad Street in 1658.—See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 1002.

Stuyvesant is again at Esopus (Kingston). He left there on Dec. 5, taking with him "the grain which had been threshed."—

The burgomasters order notice to be given, on Dec. 5, that all persons who claim either the small or great burghehright, and who have "no freedom of the City," shall "procure and receive the same within fourteen days," namely on Dec. 19 and 20, when the burgomasters sit at the city hall from noon to three o'clock for that purpose. Persons who fail therein are to be prohibited from carrying on any business whatsoever in the city. On the above designated days, numerous persons took out their certificates of denization, and others did the same on the 21st, the papers being signed by the presiding burgomaster.—Rec. N. A., VII: 248, 249, 251.

The burgomasters order the weigh-house porters "to keep the Bridge clean, and that notices be affixed" showing what will have to be paid by persons "who lay wood on the Bridge." The porters are also allowed "to do what" (other service is "asked of them, who are engaged with works in the Beam," but they are required "to be found at the Beam," or, when they go from their post, "to leave word" where they may be found.—Ibid., VII: 239-40.
The reference is to the weigh-house (see May 4, 1654) and new pier on the East River, at the present Pearl and Moore Sts. (see Nov.

Isaac Allerton, Jr, appears before the court of burgomasters Dec. and schepens, and requests that the court "appoint curators to the residiary estate in this country, of his father dec'd, and regarding the papers remaining at New Haven in the hands of the Court there, he requests that they be written to, to send the same here." The curators appointed by the court are Paul Leendertsen vander Grift, Govert Loockermans, Jan Lauwerens (John Lawtecue), and George Woolsey—the last named being the agent of the deceased Allerton.—Rec. N. A., III: 90. These persons, "after much conversation," accepted the designation as curators, on the 16th, in the presence of the Heere Graff. It was at the Ibid., III: 92.

The burgomasters order the following notice regarding the Bridge to be affixed to the Beam, viz: "Whereas the Pier or Bridge must be kept clean, each and every one, who brings fire wood or any other thing there, is hereby notified to pay to the Weigh-house Porter for the aforesaid Canal to help pay the expenses with them," and they asked for a delay of eight days, which was granted on June 18. Stuyvesant was also invited to take a hand in the matter.

The court at a meeting of the under-shout of the city against Thomas Verdon, "the hill" beyond the weigh-scales (at present

The city schout, Nicolas de Sill, asks the city court to confer upon him, and the under-shout, Resolved Waldron, authority to 1659  "seize the cart whenever they find any carters sitting riding on their carts along the streets," which request the court grants.

This action is particularly the result of charges made by Waldoon to de Alrichs in the previous year and six weeks to driving their carts along the Strand (East River, now Pearl Street) without disconnecting, for which they were fined.—Rev. N. Am., III: 91.

20 An impression of the city seal of New Amsterdam is placed on a small burgerright certificate for the behalf of Cornelis Jansen van Hoorn, issued to him by Burgemaster Martin Cregier. This document is owned by the Title Guarantee and Trust Co., New York City, and, so far as known, is the only impression of this city seal extant. See facsimile and description in Wilde, Civic Ancestry of New York, 42-43, and Pl. XI; also Frontispiece, Vol. V.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant and the council: "You are specially charged with the supervision of the city's financial administration and we direct you generally, to take care, that the finances of the Company there are well and properly managed."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 449.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant as follows: "Your order concerning the payment of the soldiers and other servants of the Company in wampum has our approval, as it will have the tendency of placing all on the same footing and thereby giving satisfaction; but as it has the value of Holland money, we have desired to direct and authorize you, to calculate wampum at that rate and for the same reason we reduce the currency value of a beaver from 8 to 7 guilders ... You will strictly conform to this rule." They tell him that "this special reduction of wampum must necessarily be followed by a second, more general one, if we desire to prevent the complete debasement, caused by the abundant importation of wampum by the people of New England, which make their payments with it and take out of the country not only the best goods sent from here [Holland], but also many beavers and other furs to the detriment of the Company's revenues." They request him to this villagio in order that losses may be prevented to the inhabitants of New Netherland, they deem it necessary that the people "be previously warned ... by public notices to be given in March and June," concerning the reduction of rate which is to take place "the following year" (1660).—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 450-51. See Nov. 11, 1659; and April 21, and Sept. 20, 1660.

In reply to Stuyvesant's letter of Sept. 17 (p. 19), the directors say they believe "the complaints made by the Latin schoolmaster or rector about the insufficiency of his salary are almost answered by the payment of all salaries there [New Amsterdam] at Holland valuation, as now ordered by this Company in which, with respect to his pupils [see May 25, 1660] every single man; with the increase of young people in the school his income will increase daily, for the parents of his pupils will not hesitate to remunerate him, if he does his duty. You can assist him in this matter according to circumstance." Such "medicinal seeds" as were requested, they say, will be ordered from Leyden.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 452. See April 16, 1660.

The burgemasters decide to "write a letter to Jacob Afric to send back the bell which DP [Everardus] Weluus had borrowed provisionally from the city of New Amsterdam.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 243. Weluus had died on the 9th or 10th of this month.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XII: 286, 287. On the 9th, the very day on which Vice-Director Afric himself died at New Amstel, on the Delaware (N. Y. Col. Docs., XII: 289), the secretary of the city, in the name of the burgemasters, wrote to Afric, as follows: "Whereas a bell was given to Don't Weluus by form of a loan and for the accommodation of the Colony of New-Amstel, to use the same there provisionally, until it be asked back, and this City having again need for it, we request you, Honor, to send it back to us by the first opportunity,"—Rec. N. Am., VII: 243. Nothing received from this correspondence, and, on Feb. 27, 1660, the burgemasters renewed their request in a letter to Alexander d' Hinoyosa, Afric's successor.—Ibid., VII: 247-48.

Allard Anthony is requested by the burgemasters to deliver to them "with the least possible delay the accλ of the Treasurership in the business of tappings," as it is prepared for them on Jan. 31, 1660, and presented "an accλ of his administration in quality as Treasurer of the Cities [sic] domains," which they examined.—Ibid., VII: 245. On Feb. 2, Anthony succeeded Olof Stevensen van Cortlandt as one of the burgemasters, and, on the 7th, Paulus Loendertse van Drift delivered the treasury papers to Van Cortlandt, the new city treasurer.—Ibid., VII: 245.

Prior to this year, a half-moon was erected before the water-gate, on the East River (present Wall St., west of Water St.). See Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82, Vol. II. This form, which wasdemolished in 1668, is indicated by a recitation in Liber Bills, VIII: IV—173. It was, however, rebuilt before 1665, as such a battery is shown on the Miller Plan of that year, Pl. 23-a, Vol. I. It had disappeared by 1717.—See Pl. 25, Vol. I. See also Landmark Map Rel. Key, III: 945.

Fring to this year, the two great stone bastions of the wall, situated, respectively, at Wall St., west of William St., and at Wall St., east of Broadway, were erected, as they appear on the Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82, Vol. II. See also Pl. 25-a, Vol. I, and Landmark Map Rel. Key, III: 944. They were referred to as 5th Bastion Zealandia" and 5th Bastion Hollandia in the "Court of Lieutenants" papers in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections, (1880), 403-6. See March 28, 1691. These bastions were demolished in 1699 (p. 79), and the stones were employed in building the new city hall at Wall and Broad Sts.—Col. Hist., MSS., Eng., 2731; M. C., II: 82.

Prior to this year, the Island monopoly passed to the so-called "Oyster Pastry Mount" in 1657.—Liber Deeds, XXXI: 212 (New York). It is shown on the Miller Plan of 1693 (Pl. 25-a, Vol. I) as "The works on the west side of the City." See 1750. The canal which ran through the present Broad Street had been spanned, prior to this year, by three small bridges at its upper end, and two "firm timber bridges with rails on each side" near the outlet.—See Castello Plan, Vol. II, and Description of the Town of Mannadens, Vol. I.

The statement in the description of the Castello Plan, in Vol. II, p. 214, that only two small bridges are shown, is erroneous, for three bridges plainly appear. The argument there presented, that the third bridge was built between October, 1660, and September, 1661, is consequently based upon a wrong premise. The Castello Plan should be associated with the first Cortelyou survey, of 1660, and not with the second survey, of 1661, as is stated in the historical summary in I: 91. The reference in the same connection to Appendix III should be to Vol. II. Through carelessness, street names have been omitted from the Castello Plan key (C. Pl. 82). These will be found on the Map of Dutch Grants (C. Pl. 87, Vol. II) Zelandia.

From about this year, Andries Rees, who was a cadet in the service of the West India Co. in 1657, conducted a tavern on "Smeer Street" (now William St. below Wall St.). On Jan. 30, 1656, he was charged by Schout Tennisman in the city court with failure to notify him of his arrival at his tavern, during which Pieter Janse, a mason, was stabbed by Denys Issacsen. On June 26 of the same year, the schout charged that he and his deputy went to the house of Rees "on Sunday last upon hearing noise and found there eight @ ten persons playing at ninepins and two at backgammon and so many as fifteen @ twenty persons drinking, in direct violation of the ordinances and placards of the RI House Director General and Council of New Netherland, recently renewed by the Court of this City from the Public Stand of this City Hall." The schout demanded that Rees be "condemned in a fine of ninety guilders and forbidden to tap for a year and six weeks to follow the cost of the action. Rees, in extenuation, said he tapped "two hours after the afternoon's preaching and he did no business during the week." The court

From 1660 to 1669, Samuel Pepys wrote his Diary.

The houses in New Amsterdam, which numbered 120 in 1666 when surveyed by Capt. de Koningh, had increased to about 350 in 1666. —See Hallaghin, Hist. of New Neth., II: 330, citing Albany Records, XVIII: 135; Holland Doc., XVI: 221. Cf. De Sille List, II: 349 et seq.

In this year, 1660, the fiscal, Jan van Cleef and his friend, bought of Jacob Wolters of Van Couwenhoven, for the use of the inhabitants of the town of Utrecht, a Horse Mill with the appurtenances which had been used for grinding flour in Manhattan. The mill stones and the mill work were brought and set up in the Village of Utrecht. The friend of Jan van Cleef without the knowledge of the Fiscal sold out his third part to Jan van Cleef, the Fiscal being security for both of them, and having paid out already more than 400 guilders (Stg 6) on account of the mill. The Fiscal seeing that Jan van Cleef did not prosper, and that the last day of payment was near at hand, threatened to prosecute and compel him to act justly. On this Jan van Cleef sought a buyer to sell the mill to, at the same time the people desired the Fiscal to buy the mill, but he refused, neither would he sell this third part, having to view the benefit of the Town and the conveniance of the inhabitants. In consequence of this Jan van Cleef was under the necessity of selling his two thirds to Albert Albersz and the mill remained in the town of Utrecht, the Fiscal remaining unwilling to sell his third part, quoted in Doc. Hist. N. Y. (Sve. ed.), I: 650. The mill stones and appurtenances alluded to were those belonging to the mill of Van Couwenhoven on the Syck Steegh in New Amsterdam. See Dec. 26, 1666. See also, Castello Plan, II: 308-9.

In this year, Stuyvesant erected a stone on his bowery, near what is now the west side of Second Ave. At 10th St., for the use of his neighbours and tenants (Corwin, Man. of the Ref. Ch. in Am., 906). It was demolished in 1687. —See Sibley, Hist. of the Bowery Now covers this site. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 933, 936. Granufs of land near here were made to free negroes in 1659 and 1660. —Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 269.

In this year, Pierre Pia, was recorded as keeping a tavern at what is now the north-east corner of Market and New Sts.—See Laker Days, At: 215. He was a tapster here at least as late as 1665. —Rec. N. Am., IV: 175, 179, 186, 249. By 1677, the place was called "ye Swan," and was conducted by "Samuel Davies." —M. C. G., I: 60. See Castello Plan, II: 355 and Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 980. See also Jan. 9, 1665.

Jan. 15 Hendrick Jansen Claarbout, from ter Goos, "commonly called the bull bowyer," (i.e., the bull bowyer), is indicted in the city court, a felon for theft, and abuse of the public officers. The case is important in the criminal jurisprudence of the city. As the burgomasters and schepens do not find themselves qualified by their Instructions to sentence and execute capital punishment, they request Nicasius de Sille, in his capacity of city schout, "to demand of the Director General and Council further and more ample qualification," or, in his capacity as fiscal of the company, to "enter the demand" before the provincial authorities. —Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 205, 206; Rec. N. Am., III: 161-2. On the 20th, Schout De Sille requested the city magistrates "to take into consideration the renvoi to the Director General and Council relative to the felon, ... so as to conclude the case; but they instructed him "to prosecute the case of the prisoner ... before the Supreme Council." —Rec. N. Am., III: 103. On the following day (21st), De Sille having presented the demand, Stuyvesant and the council granted and conceded to the burgomaster and schepens the authority desired by them, with the proviso that, if they found "the offence of the aforesaid prisoner" to be one to "be adjudged by them to be capital in majori gradu, they demand the Director General and Council's approveth thereof." —Ibid., III: 102. Returning to the city council with the petition and De Sille reported that the supreme body had referred the case back to their inferior bench, wherefore he, as prosecuting officer, demanded a sentence against the prisoner, who was therupon brought into court. —Ibid., III: 106. Sentence was deferred until the next day (23rd), when and during the next day's sitting, the defendant was condemned as described, "he brought to the place where justice is usually executed and, with the rope around his neck, whipped, branded and banished the country, and condemned in the costs and fines of justice." —Ibid., Jan. III: 110-11. The supreme body assented to the sentence of banishment imposed by the court, not only beyond the city's juridiction, "but also beyond the Province of N. Netherland," and likewise permitted the city to erect a half-gallows before the city hall, "in order that he may be there imprisoned, and sentenced, and the sentence executed, without any other effect." —Ibid., III: 111-12. Claarbout, his wife, and his children were, on the 27th, ordered deported by ship "to the Virginias." —Ibid., III: 114.

Van Hoboken, the schoolmaster, is not rendering satisfactory service, as appears from a report of the time of this date. He has petitioned for "an Amsterdam school in Manhattans." Van Hoboken's petition apparently contradicts a conclusion reached by Prof. Kilpatrick that "it was the duty of the people [in New Netherland] to furnish school quarrters and of the company to provide the master's salary." His argument that the words "allowance" and "salary," as used in the petition, were to be annual appropriation of 100 guilders for a schoolhouse is not very convincing. —Kilpatrick, op. cit., 90-93. It is more probable that the local authorities were occasionally pleased to grant to a master compensation over and above the salary fixed by the company, as in the case of Cortius (see July 4, 1659). Disatisfaction, on the other hand, could be expressed feelingly by discontinuing the allowance (see Aug. 9, 1660).

There being several city ordinances in force which have "not been renewed for many years," and are "unknown to many Burgers and inhabitants," who through ignorance fail to observe them, Schout De Sille is therefore "ordered and charged by the Burgomasters and Schepens yearly at proper seasons to renew such placards as occasion demands," so that observance may be assured and ignorance may not be justly pleaded in extenuation of infractions. —Rec. N. Am., III: 168.

John Pynchon writes from Springfield to Gov. John Winthrop of Connecticut: "Major Hawthorne & Mr Richards Go to yt Monhats y* first opportunity to treat wth y* dutch Governour, of Company purposing to carry on their designe of Trade vp y* River [Hudson] if fairly they may." —Winthrop Papers, XVI: 156 (Mass. Hist. Soc.).

Stuyvesant's request that only persons who are "friendly and not opponents" be nominated as burgomasters and schepens is related to the city court. —Rec. N. Am., III: 120. The following day (Feb. 1) was a Sunday, and on that afternoon the burgomasters and schepens met in the city hall, under the sign of the Cow, to draw a ticket in writing, "in presence of Mr. Nicasius de Sille, Delegate from the Director General and Council." After several ballots had been taken, a double set of names was fixed upon and sent to Stuyvesant and the council, from which to elect a single set. The supreme body, on Feb. 10, sent in an approved list, which contained some substitutions of names not among the original nominees. The new board was duly sworn in and installed by Nicasius de Sille, in his capacity of fiscal and as a member of the council, and by Cornelis van Ruyven, as provincial secretary, both of whom had been duly delegated for the purpose. The instructions were read to the court elect, the oath of allegiance was taken and, "after ringing the three times," announcement was made to the burghers and inhabitants of the city to "hold the aforesaid persons in due respect and consideration." —Ibid., III: 122-26.

The burgomasters nominate Oluff Stevensen van Cortlandt and Jan van Cortlandt jr. as burgomasters and Johannes Buttern as an orphan-master in place of Allard Anthony, whose withdrawal has become imperative through his elevation to a burgomastership. Stuyvesant and the council appointed van Cortlandt on the 9th. —Rec. N. Am., VII: 245; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 266.

Stuyvesant and the council renewed the commercial ordinance of Jan. 18, 1666 (q. v.), regarding the forming of villages or hamlets as a protection against the Indians. The isolated farmers of the province are required, on pain of confiscation of their goods, and without any distinction of persons, "to remove their houses, barns & all their cattle before the last of March, or at latest the middle of April, and convey them to the Village or settlement, nearest and most convenient to them or, with the previous knowledge and approval of the Director General and Council, to a favorably situated and defensible spot in a new palisaded Village to be hereafter formed," where suitable lots will be granted to the applicants, and they are to reside with their families with their 50 free men as soon as will be practicable.
Hence the Council were compelled to issue a new order on the 12th of March, which was accepted by the negroes, hence another order was issued, on April 12, and a notice, on May 18, to cause their removal or concentration.— Cal. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 208, 111. See also May 3 and 18, of this year.

17 Stuyvesant writes to the vice-director of the West India Co. at Curacao, as follows: "The negroes, whom the Lords-Directors ordered to send hither, must be clever and strong men so that they can immediately be put to work here [New Amsterdam] at the Fort or at other places, also if they are fit for it, in the war against the wild barbarians either to pursue them, when they run away or to carry the soldiers' baggage, for it is quite evident, that in order to possess this country in peace and revenge the frequent affronts and murders we shall be forced into a lawful offensive war against them. An important service would be done to the Company, to us and to the country, if among the expected negroes some experienced men, who have some time in Curacao, were sent to us."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 142-43. Stuyvesant also requests for the cavalry at Manhattan, in the service of the comppany, "some good and well trained horses, strong stallions or geldings, the latter being preferable as of greater service," and he asks the company to equip the army with "bridles. Among them he wants "three or four good mares; all for account of the Company."—Ibld., XIII: 143.

18 The court of burgomasters and schepen petitions Stuyvesant, and the council that it be obligatory on parties applying for revision of any judgment of that court to deposit a certain sum.
This was granted on February 27.—Cal. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 207.

23 A proclamation is published by Stuyvesant and the council for "a day of general fasting and prayer, which shall be kept throughout this province on Wednesday before Easter, being the 24th of March" (p. 14). It is due to the fact that the crops were kept very low in many "with hot fevers, heavy colds, giddiness of the head and many other diseases," and on account of "threatened invasions by our neighbors [New England] on the territories, streams and rivers, long possessed by us, with rumors of war and its immediate consequences, murder and arson by the savage barbarous natives committed here [Manhattan and environs] as well as principally . . . on the Esopus" (Kingston). These declarations are intended to be God's punishments, because the people have desecrated the Sabbath, used profane language, neglected divine service, and indulged in "drunkenness, feasting, voluptuousness, adultery, deception and other heinous sins." On the fast day, during divine service, it is forbidden to play tennis or ball, hunt, fish, drive, plough, sow or mow, or to engage in "all illicit amusements as dicing and hard drinking."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 144-45.

24 It was customary to lead cows to the common pasture upon signal given by "the blowing of the horn," as is shown in a suit before the city court of this date.—Rec. N. Am., III: 137.

25 Commissary Nicolas Varleth (Varlet or Verlet), in a petition (to Stuyvesant and the council, says he "is interested deeply in the (estate of the) lately deceased Governor of Virginia" (Samuel Matthews), and that he is "exceedingly anxious to go there in person," which can be done by him "best during the present season of winter." As there is now "no suitable ship" in port, Varleth requests them "to grant or hire thereto the Hon'ble Company's yacht," on their own conditions, and he offers also to be of any service to them in Virginia. They agree to let the vessel in "a reasonable hire, certainly not less than six guilders each day." Varleth is "summoned," and, appearing before them, the agreement is consummated, one condition being that he give "free passage both ways to the Captain-Lieutenants, who shall be appointed to see him there, and that if the said Captain-Lieutenant should get some men there, he shall take as many abroad as he conveniently can", without charge.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 144.

27 On the 27th, Varleth, and Bryan Newton, the captain-lieutenants of the ships, were ordered by the governor to take cognizance on account of the death of Gov. Matthews, and to "renew not only the former old friendship, correspondence and neighborly intimacy, but also to propose a closer union, offensive and defensive, against the barbarous Indian natives, the enemies of both our nations, some further and surer footing in regard to commerce and trade," and to seek permission "to enlist there a detachment of 50 men, 30 men as soldiers, and 20 as freemen," for "New Netherland. This 100 men and soldiers would not allow.—Ibld., XIII: 144, 145-47, 163. They were given particular instructions on March 1, and at the same time the council issued a proclamation offering protection against all prosecutions for debt, for three or four years, to such fugitives as would return from Virginia and Maryland to New Netherland. The envoys were well-received in Virginia and negotiated an intercolonial treaty of amity and commerce; they returned to Manhattan in April. On May 18, Sir William Berkeley and Theodore Bland, respectively governor and speaker of the assembly of Virginia, wrote to Stuyvesant and the council, empowering Sir Henry Moody as special envoy to receive their signatures to the treaty concluded by the Dutch envos in Virginia. Moody appeared before the Dutch provincial authorities, 04 June 21; the treaty was deliberated, and presently was completed; it received the hearty assent of the directors at Amsterdam.—Cal. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 207, 213, 217; N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 295; XIV: 48; Brodhead,

The burgomasters direct an order to be made "instructing each one residing along the beach of the East River to build up and raise their sheet piling higher within the space of six weeks; under a penalty of five and equipment of ships. —Rec. N. Am., VIII: 248.
On May 4, the schout was directed "to warn and order for the last time those residing on the East and North Rivers" to "build up their sheet piling, within three weeks' time." He was required to "cite those in default to the City Hall," and make complaint against them.—Ibld., VII:

Jan Jansen Hageman, city carpenter, having appeared before the burgomasters for further instructions for work to be done, is ordered "to look up the City ladders and to make a shed, to keep the ladders under."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 248. From a later record of the burgomasters (June 5, 1665, p. 14), we know that the fire-ladder "was kept locked up "at the prescribed place back of the City Hall."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 176.

Clues Jansen Ruyter is appointed Indian interpreter by Stuyvesant and the council.—Cal. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 207.

A treaty of peace is made at the city hall of New Amsterdam by Stuyvesant, his council, and the burgomasters of the city, with a delegation of sachems representing Indians of Long Island, Staten Island, Hackensack, N. J., Haverstraw, and Westchester County.
These Indians declare that they will keep the peace, but do not speak for the Kariants or those of Esopus, with whom they have no desire to have intercourse. It is agreed that, to prevent murder of any kind, that no Indian shall "come with his arms " into Fort Amsterdam or the villages, but that they "must deliver them at the gate or at the first house of the village or settlement," to be returned to them again when they leave. To obviate disagreements when the Indians bring peltries, fish, and other wares to market in New Amsterdam, it is provided that hereafter they shall come to barter at "no other places, than near the former bead-vaer at the North River landing, at the Battery Pl. and Greenwich St", and to the neck near the weigh-house," on the East River, except that firewood may be taken anywhere by them. Another promise of the Dutch is that there will be built at the two trading places "suitable houses." Other agreements provide for doing away with the provocations of war, arranging for the apprehension and punishment of willful murderers, either Indian or Dutch, and the education of Indian children. The interpreters of these Indians of Algonquin linguistic stock were Claes Ruyter, Clues de Norman, and Waringh, an Indian who understood and spoke

A placard is prepared by the burgomasters and schepens informning the community that the directors at Amsterdam have been "pleased to favour this Province with a foreign trade, the rather to encourage some to the cultivation of land, on the prosecution and promotion of which the prosperity and advancement of this state depends; but under express condition, that the ships, which shall proceed from here to France, Spain, Italy, the Caribbean Islands and other countries, to trade or sell the goods of our friends and for whatever trade they shall be, shall be bound and helden to steer right to the City of Amsterdam in Europe with the returns they may obtain [the

THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

While r and war, the city has been involved in several significant events. The city was founded by the Dutch in 1624 and was originally called New Amsterdam. It was later renamed New York City in 1664.

The Dutch were the first Europeans to settle in the area and established a thriving community. They built a fort and established a city government. The city grew rapidly and soon became a major trading center.

The city was taken over by the British during the Revolutionary War in 1776. It was returned to the Dutch in 1783 by the Treaty of Paris.

The city continued to grow and expand, and by the late 18th century, it had become an important city in its own right. It was the capital of the state of New York from 1785 to 1897.

The city has been the site of many significant events throughout its history. It was the site of the signing of the United States Constitution in 1787 and was the home of many important figures in American history.

The city has been a center of commerce and industry for centuries. It has been home to many of the world's largest corporations and is one of the most important financial centers in the world.

The city has also been the site of many cultural and artistic achievements. It has been home to many of the world's most famous authors, musicians, and artists.

Today, New York City is one of the most important cities in the world. It is a center of commerce, culture, and innovation, and continues to be a symbol of the United States and its values.

The city is a testament to the resilience and spirit of the American people. It has been through many challenges, but it has always come out stronger and more vibrant.

New York City is a city of contrasts. It is a place of luxury and grandeur, but also a place of poverty and inequality. It is a place of cultural diversity and richness, but also a place of homogenization.

The city is a place of both progress and stagnation. It is a place of hope and aspiration, but also a place of despair and frustration.

Despite these contradictions, New York City remains a place of great beauty and wonder. It is a city that has captured the imagination of people around the world, and it continues to be a symbol of the American Dream.

The city is a testament to the power of human ingenuity and creativity. It is a place where anything is possible, and it is a place where the impossible is made possible.

New York City is a city of dreams. It is a city that has inspired people from all over the world to work hard, to dream big, and to never give up. It is a city that has shown us that anything is possible if we work together and never lose faith in our dreams.
other places." He is appointed, provisionally, and allowed a fee of "four stivers [eight cents] per thousand" bricks or tiles, to be paid him half each by purchaser and seller.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 250-51.
On April 13, 1665, he appealed for an increase of the fee of 6 stuivers: that a large sum is due them for counting each thousand, "the skipper or the importer" paying them therefor.

An order is issued by Stuyvesant to Under-Schout Reservoir Waldron and the court messenger, Claes van Eldibint, directing them
"to warn once more the outlying settlers, each separately that in accordance with orders and a certain placent made and communicated to them [see Feb. 9, 1669], they must abandon their isolated places within a given time and move into the settlements," that is, the concentrated centers.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 160.

By the Declaration of Breda, issued by Charles II at Breda, the Netherlands, he promises a general pardon, religious toleration, satisfaction to the army, and the settlement of confiscated estates on their present possessors.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant and the council.
"As we are told, that Rector Curius practices medicine there and there fore asked to have a barber-surge to him [see Sept. 12, 1669], we have been willing to provide him with one herewith, you will band it to him with the understanding, that it shall not cease to be property of the company."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 462.

Stuyvesant writes to the general court of Massachusetts, vindicating the Dutch title to New Netherland, and of Hudson River, reply in to a letter from Secretary Rawson, of Nov. 13, 1669, in which Massachusetts claimed the Hudson River north of 42°

Stuyvesant's original reply are in Hist. Arch., II: Colonial Stuyvesant writes to the directors at Amsterdam: "The dis-trusting situation of the country had compellus us, before we received your Houros' preperatty order, to draw the out-lying farmers together in settlements, to be at once delivered, as far as possible, from murder of single persons, as sull as any possible danger from the enclosed placat No. 5, which is now [being] daily carried out."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 165. See the ordinance, Feb. 9, 1666.

Stuyvesant and the council write to the directors at Amsterdam that, owing to the "troublesome times" occasioned by the danger of an invasion by New Englanders, the Dutch provincial government is compelled to be economical with its depleted treasury, and that the dangers of an expected invasion compel the maintaining at New Amsterdam of "more than 200 soldiers, the officers

Stuyvesant and the council write to the directors at Amsterdam: "We wish, that what you say so clearly regarding the reduction of wampum to the value of silver or at least of beavers and your arguments for it, could be put into practice without any trouble and without diverting our trade into other channels.
We believe, it cannot be done without considerable risk, for wampum is the source and the mother of the beaver trade, and for goods only, without wampum, we cannot obtain beavers from the savages.
If we receive no wampum from outside—we have none in our country—this would certainly cause a diversion of the beaver trade.

"To your further statement, that the special reduction of the wampum must be followed by another and general one, if we desire to prevent its total depreciation in consequence of super-abundant importation, we must say, under correction, that we do not quite understand, what you mean by the special reduction of the wampum. The reduction affects man and man, seller and buyer, generally, who pursuant to the placat count 8 pieces for a stiver, instead of 6, unless they have agreed upon another rate by written or verbal contract. If, as we understand it, you mean by special reduction, that wampum is received at our offices at the rate of 6, whereas it was counted at 8, you will have to account for the consequences of a previous contract or stipulation in letting, selling or farming out some of the Company's demesne and that descriptive to officers of the Company it is not issued to individuals for either days' wages or commodities at any other rate, than the one estab-ilished and subsequent to the one which was called for by previous stipulation, when the one is calculated with the other, as the receipts and disbursements in the ledgers show. If, as we presume and conclude from what follows, you intend to have the wampum once more reduced by a general reduction from 8 to 6, then we think that under present circumstances it would be premature, because the reduction from 6 to 8, made last year, has been such an obstinate impediment, that wampum is somewhat scarce now.
Should the importation of it increase with the beaver-trade during the summer, then we shall consider your order for the best of the Company as well as we can, and carry it out, giving you information by every chance. Before we leave this matter, we have to say, under correction, that it matters little, whether 8 or 10 pieces are paid for a stiver, whether the beavers are marks, or sells his goods, according the abundance of wampum and the price, he has to give for beavers. It would be desirable therefore, as we have repeatedly stated to you, that wampum and beavers, as well as tobacco, should be declared an absolute commodoty or merchandise and that the importation of no other small currency, than silver, should be allowed here, which we believe can be done when beavers, tobacco and other things are brought and kept here under the Dutch market."—N. Y. Col. Docs.,

The old burgomaster, Olof Steenenssen van Cortlandt, exhibits to the city court his appointment by Stuyvesant and the council of the previous day as presiding burgomaster, pro tem, during the absence of the two ruling burgomasters from the city.—Rec. N. Am.,

The name of Jacob Leister (Leysdier), of Frankfort, Germany, appears on a roll of soldiers sent to New Netherland in this year.—
This seems to be the earliest mention of him in connection with the Dutch province. For a sketch of his life and execution for treason, see May 16, 1669, to May 16, 1671, inclusive.

Cornelis Steenwyck and others, merchants of New Amsterdam,

Thomas Hall and others, farmers and proprietors north of and adjoining the Fresh Water on Manhattan Island, petition Stuyvesant and the council to allow their houses there to stand, and that other interested parties may be permitted to build near them, in order that a village can be formed. On the same day, a council order gives Wolphert Webber and Hall permission to let their houses stand, and also allows a village or hamlet to be formed near the bouuyery of Augustine Heerman, or near that of This appears to be the earliest official act suggesting the Bowery Village.

The burgomasters order the court messenger not to presume "to serve any attachment on any person or property without first communicating with the burgomaster or Officer [incharge], on pain

The schout requests the burgomasters "that the gate [of the fence] in the rear [of the lot] of the City Hall leading to the High Street (Hoogh-Strat now Stone St.) may be made, and that the Jailer be ordered not to bring any planks or other goods on [to] the lot behind the City Hall, without having the previous consent of the presiding Burgomaster and to remove what lies there." Pieter Schalabank, the jailer, is accordingly ordered "to notify and direct the owners of the bricks, planks or other goods" that encumber the rear lot "to have the same removed," or, failing to comply, the removal will be done by the city at the expense of the owners.
He also charges not to allow anyone "any property, of what sort tsoever it may be," to be brought on to the lot, unless he has first obtained leave from the presiding burgomaster.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 252.

In a court proceeding of this date, mention is made of "the square" before the house of Burgomaster Marten Cregier.—Rec.
N. Am., III: 179. Then to the northeast space before the fort on the Heere Weg (Broadway), which later became the Bowling Green.

A contract is made between Stuyvesant and the council on the one part and Nicholas Vanlet (or Verlet), Stuyvesant's brother-in-law, as agent of the duties of importers and exporters from and to New England and Virginia.—Cal. Hist. MSS.,

The House of the Stuarts is restored. Charles II is proclaimed King of England, Scotland, and Ireland by both houses of parliament.—Winson, op. cit., III: 149. See further, May 25/June 4.

24 An Indian conference is held in Fort Amsterdam between three chiefs of the Mohicans and Stuyvesant, at which these chiefs seek a peace with the Esopus Indians. Presents are interchanged. Claes de Ruyter and Jan Darche (usually spelled Daret) act as interpreters. But on the next day, the provincial authorities concluded that "it is quite evident" from the conference that "a firm and stable peace with the Esopus savages" is not likely "unless the captured Esopus Indians," eleven at New Amsterdam and others in prison at Esopus, who are the boldest of the tribe, are either released, who would then make more causes for trouble, or put where they cannot get back, and so that the remainder of the Esopus Indians may be "forced to a solid peace by force of arms." It is concluded "to send the aforesaid captives to Curacao by the first good opportunity and at the expense of the Company, to be employed there or at Bonayo in the negroes in the service of the Company," and meanwhile "to continue a defensive and offensive war against the Esopus savages."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 168-69.

"The Restoration in England," Charles II, having sailed from England, May 13, 1660, and having been by the court, "without such having been revised, as they should have been, or submitted for the signature of the President," which has resulted in instruments not being "drawn up according to the real intent and meaning" of the court. Therefore, the supreme court of directors-general and council now orders the city's secretary "not to execute any extracts of any Judgments, Decisions or any other Acts of importance," unless first "revised and signed in the Register . . . by the Court or at least by the President."—Lovens & Ord. N. Neth., 386-87.

The burgomasters of New Amsterdam are appointed by the provincial council to assist the director-general in deciding certain cases on appeal before the council, and to which the company's fiscal is a party.—N. Y. Col. MSS., Dutch, 213.

Jacques Cortelyou, surveyor-general of New Netherland, is directed by the provincial government to survey and make a map of the lots within the city of New Amsterdam.—N. Y. Col. MSS., Dutch, 213. This plan of the city was completed by Oct. 6 (q.v.). Th Castello Plan can, almost without doubt, be identified as a copy of this survey or of a drawing made from it. See Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82, and pp. 209 et seq., Vol. II; as well as Chronology, Oct. 6 and Dec. 24, 1660.

Charles II enters London. With the king, Edward Hyde, afterward Earl of Clarendon, returns from exile. He was made Lord Chancellor, and in September (q.v.) became closely connected with the royal family by the marriage of his daughter, Anne Hyde, with James, Duke of York.

The Esopus officials request Stuyvesant to come to them "by the first opportunity, bringing along a good interpreter . . . in order then to conclude . . . a firm, inviolable and eternal peace" with the Indians. On June 21, the provincial council agreed that Stuyvesant "should go there, as soon as the ship de Trew has sailed, in order to conclude, if possible, a peace," on terms already fixed upon.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 174. On July 5, the council appointed Maren Cregier and Oloff Stevensen van Cortlandt, representing New Amsterdam, to assist Stuyvesant at Esopus "in any difficulty with their advice and counsel."—Ibid., XIII: 178-79. They left for Esopus on July 7 and returned to New Amsterdam on the 31st.—Ibid., XIII: 181-84. See May 24, June 3, and July 15, 1660.

Stuyvesant and the council inform the directors at Amsterdam that only 27 out of 50 horses shipped from Curacao in the flyboat "Eyenboom" have arrived at New Amsterdam, the rest having died from want of good fodder, and that most of those which survive are so weak they can "neither walk nor stand;" they have to be "carried in carts and sold on sledges from the scow" and the shore." This also caused the capture of 19 negroes from New Amsterdam.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 477.

The city's revenues for payment of ever increasing expenses have been found to be insufficient, the burgomasters petition Stuyvesant and the council for authority "to impose some chimney tax" as a subsidy, from which they may "derive from each chimney or fireplace" as much as the director-general and council may deem proper, the tax so imposed "to be collected every three months by the Treasurer" of the city.—Rec. Am., VII: 255-56.

A provincial ordinance is passed for the regulation of shipping on the North (Hudson) and South (Delaware) Rivers. It is the result of evasions of the old ordinance of March 10, 1648. Skippers are forbidden, without first obtaining a proper commission, "to resort to [and navigate] these rivers" and "the places situate between both," and passes are not to be granted to them by the fiscal if they first exhibit a proper commission to him.—Lovens & Ord. N. Neth., 386.

Schout Niciaius de Sille informs the burgomasters that when he goes around "at night and at unreasonable hours to make examination," dangerous attacks are made on him by the dogs in the city, and he requests an order for preventing these attacks.—Rec. Am., VII: 256.

The burgomasters, together with Schout Niciaius de Sille, resolve "to draft a Placard respecting the hooting after Indians in Pearl Street, and the cutting of the Knoocks [Knoech-hacken], a game still indulged in, country fairs in Holland, and consisting in trying to cut a tough piece of maltose cake in two with a hammer, and a given number of strokes[1] which is done by boys."—Rec. Am., VII: 256.
An important census of the houses in New Amsterdam is prepared by Nicolas de Sille. For a facsimile, first printing, and interpretation of it, see C. Plts. 33-84, Vol. II, and De Sille List, II: 349-31. The original manuscript is in N. Neth. Papers, No. 10, New York, Library, Vol. II: 209.

At Selyns, Andries Andriesen receives a ground-brief for a lot on the west side of William St., south of Wall St., the ground now included in the site of the Atlantic building. See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Plt. 87, Vol. II, and p. 392.

Albert Cornelissen Wenthman receives a ground-brief for a lot on the south side of Wall St., 29 feet east of the corner of William St.; the ground is now included in the site of the National City Bank. See Castello Plan, C. Plts. 82, 82e, Vol. II and p. 324; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Plt. 87, Vol. II, and p. 406.

Articles of peace are concluded by Stuyvesant with the sachems of the Esopus Indians. He returned to New Amsterdam with his associates on the 31st, and on Aug. 5 made a full report to the provincial council.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 179-84. See May 24, June 3, and June 12, 1660.

Stuyvesant having concluded peace at Eupora, on the 15th of this month (p. 21), now goes to Orange (Alb) and holds a conference with the Senecas.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 182-86. Aug.

Prior to this, the Red Lion brewery was built on what is now Beaver St., the buildings Nos. 47, 49, and 51 covering its site. Isaac de Forest and Joannes Verveelen conducted the brewing business here after the death of De Forest, owning the property by a deed from Joannes de la Montagne, recorded Dec. 29, 1661. Ibid., A: 253. The buildings were used as a brewery by Joannes and Daniel Verveelen until 1663, and by Daniel Verveelen probably until their demolition in July, 1675.—Original Book N. Y. Deeds, in N. Y. Hist. Collections (1917), 54-55, 56-57. See Castello Plan, II: 288-89; C. Plts. 82 and 82e, Vol. II; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 965.

Pieter Tonneeman is sworn in as the first independent schout of New Amsterdam. See summary under April 9. See also Feb. 1, 1661.

July—Two of the captive judges of Charles I, (regicides), Edward Whalley and William Goffe, are welcomed at Boston and escorted from officers of the crown. They were also sheltered by New Haven.—Winson, III: 374. See also 1661.

The burgomasters hear that Rector Curius of the Latin school "of his own pleasure takes no beaver per quarter from each boy," instead of the stipulated tuition of six guilders. They give the schoolmaster "warning and notice, not to take any more, than what is fixed upon," on pain of losing "his Yearly Stipend" and receiving "no further allowance."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 257. See Feb. 1661.

An "Inferior Court of Justice" is established by Stuyvesant and the council in the "newly commenced Village of Haerlem," consisting of three commissioners—Jan Pietersen, Daniel Tourneur, and Peter Cresson, before whom all minor actions between man and man are to be tried, and the senior commissioner is empowered to represent the schout in all criminal actions. Appeals are possible from their decisions, in actions exceeding 50 guilders, to the supreme court of director-general and council. They are also specifically commissioned to enact ordinances providing "that the arable Lands and Gardens" may be "carefully fenced, kept inclosed, and the broken fences properly repaired."—Laws of Ord., N. Eth., p. 366-7.

Stuyvesant offers to pay 250 guilders annually toward the support of Rev. Henricus Selyns, provided he will preach the Sunday evening sermon at Stuyvesant's bouwery.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 479. On the same day, Selyns is appointed to be minister of the Dutch church (see Sep. 24, New York). His formal induction at Breuckelen took place on Sept. 3.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 217; Eccles. Rec., I: 479-81. In a letter in the classis of Amsterdam, on Oct. 4, he says, the bouwery: "I serve on Sundays, in the evenings only, at the General's Bouwery, at his expense.... Catechizing will not be held here [Breuckelen] before the winter, but we will hold it at the Bouwery, and at the Bouwery, at the time of week days, or when there is no preaching service there.... I preach at Breuckelen in the morning; and at the Bouwery at the end of the catechetical sermon. The Bouwery is a place of relaxation and pleasure, whither people go from the Manhattan, for the evening, but we will not remain in it at any time without the permission of the Bouwery. There is here as yet no Consistory, but the deacons from New Amsterdam provisionally receive the alms; and at least one deacon, if not an elder, Aug. ought to be chosen here."—Eccles. Rec., I: 478-84. Stuyvesant's Bowery chapel was west of Second Ave. near 10th St., the site being now covered by St. Mark's Pk. Church. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 276.

In a controversy between Lord Baltimore and the Dutch sept. respecting the Delaware River, the minutes taken by the deputies of the West India Co., representing the "Assembly of the XIX," at Amsterdam, show on this day the following entry: "It being submitted by the Commissioners from the presiding Chamber of Amsterdam that the English nation in New England are daily usurping and appropriating considerable tracts of land in New Netherland belonging to this State and the Company, so that they have taken to themselves to within 8 or 9 leagues of the Manhatts, the Fresh river there situated, wherein not only the inhabitants of this State [The Netherlands] have heretofore had their Colonies and plantations, but also the Company, a trading house or fortress,...." The minute recites, further, Stuyvesant's agreement to a boundary line on Sept. 19, 1660 (p. 3), to prevent further usurpations; and the further attempts by the English.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XII: 331, 335.

Parliament passes an act of general amnesty for political offenders, except regicides, and it receives the king's assent.

Schout Pieter Tonneeman is ordered by the burgomasters "to direct and charge each and every one dwelling on the East River" of the city, "forthwith", De Forest being "inclosed", of the house and lot, each for his own, and to remove the planks, timbers and other obstructions lying in the way, under the penalty provided therefor, without respect of any person he be who he may."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 257.

Schout Pieter Tonneeman is ordered by the burgomasters "to go with one of the Schepens and inspect all the bakers" of the city, to find out if they weigh the bread in conformity with the assay, and to examine whether the weights they use are stamped regularly as required by ordinances; to impose a penalty upon those who are delinquent, and to take care that nobody keeps an open store in the streets and have there sold the bread with the crown markings thereon, entering a fine of 25 guilders against violators and closing up their places of business.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 257.

James, Duke of York, the king's brother, secretly marries Anne Hyde, daughter of Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon.

The directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant in regard to wampum, as follows: "We will not discuss the arguments and difficulties, raised by you on account of our order [see Dec. 22, 1663] for reducing the wampum, as far as the time to carry it out is concerned, for we perceive by your prolix explanations, that you well understand what we mean and therefore need not repeat it. But about the manner itself we say again and maintain, that it is based upon good reasons, into the explanation of which we have no wish to enter now; we only recommend you most seriously and order, that this reduction be put into practice as soon as time and circumstances are favorable, without fail."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 481. For their previous communication on the subject, see April 24, 1660.

The supreme council of New Netherland resolves to charter the company's sloop to Frederick Phillipse (Folpeys), late the director-general's carpenter, for a voyage to Virginia.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 218.

Schout Pieter Tonneeman appears in the city court against Walewyn van der Veen, notary, for having "insulted and calumniated the Magistrates" of that court, charging that he has called them "blockheads" and "fools and simpletons." Although Van der Veen makes a general denial, the court orders him to "go immediately into confinement." From this judgment Vander Veen appeals to the supreme court of director-general and council. The city court orders him to "to be kept there by a Court Messenger" until he obeys the judgment. At the same time, the city court sends an explanation of the case to the higher court, in which they aver that the "insult" is "destroying the authority and respect" of their council, and declare that "the support of the Supreme government so that similar occurrences" may be prevented.—Rec. N. Am., III: 212-14.
The Iconography of Manhattan Island.

The Dutch colony on the Delaware, says: "At present the Indians keep themselves very quiet; nor, the Manhattan, is quite rich of people, and there are, at present, fully over three hundred and fifty houses, so that it begins to be a brave place, and divers brave villages are rising up which are built in good order."—N. Y. Col. Doc., II: 125.

Oct. 6. By Stuyvesant, the council write to the directors at Amsterdam about wampum, thus: "Whatever orders, rules and reductions may be made and carried out, they do not prevent its depreciation and further losses. The lower it is reduced, the more the trader gives for a beaver, going, as we said before, as far as 15 or 16 fl. To reduce the price of wampum to 10 or 16 for a silver, as we reduced it from 8 to 10 in receiving it at our offices, will remedy the evil only for a brief period; the trader would give the length of one hundred hands, instead of fifty and he, who receives it at so much a guilder, would lose so much more time and have so much more trouble in counting it. To declare it absolutely bullion and not receivable at so much a pion, would endanger the beaver-trade and lead it into other channels; nor can it be done as long as we have no other currency here for the retail trade. On the other side we are taught by experience, that if we let it go, as at present, wampum will depreciate more and more every year, the inhabitants will be cheated, and the state, and the merchants, Scotchmen and traders, be warned to pay their duties for tobacco and beavers at our office here and to make the calculations accordingly."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 485. See Sept. 20.

Stuyvesant, in a letter to the directors at Amsterdam, informs them that the clergy, binnen, and aliens have been placed in conformity with the directions "and their call," and he adds: "In the meantime three or four other villages still need preachers and are deprived of religious services, namely New Utrecht and Gravesend on Long Island, New Haarlem on this [Manhattan] Island and a newly planted village of about thirty families across the North river. Necessity therefore requires, that two pious and learned candidates be sent over besides the desired English preachers."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 495.

That the Dutch Church at Harlem had its origin in this year is indicated by a record of the expiration, on Nov. 30, 1662, of the term of office of Jan la Montaigne, Jr., its first deacon, which office, in accordance with the custom of this church, he doubtless had held for two years.—Riker, Hist. of Harlem (1904), 177-78.

In a postscript to a letter written by Stuyvesant to the directors at Amsterdam, he says: "After closing our letter the Burgomasters have spoken of a charter of this city [New Amsterdam] which they think not worth would be ready before the sailing of this ship. In case you should be inclined to have it engraved and published it, we thought it advisable, to send you also a small sketch of the city, drawn in perspective by Sieur Auguste Heemans three or four years ago, which perhaps you may wish to insert in a corner, i.e., as an inset, in case the directors determined to have the plan engraved. Perau, in his translation in N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 486, erred in his statement regarding the small sketch; the revision is due to a discovery made by Mr. J. J. van Laar in Oct., 1911, while reassembling the salvaged Dutch MSS. after the Capital fire at Albany in that year. See Pl. 6, Vol. 3; June 7 and Dec. 24.

In London, 29 persons are tried and convicted for complicity in the execution of Charles I. Of the regicides, 25 are dead, 19 in exile, 19 imprisoned for life, and 10 executed.

15 Acting on a petition of the neighbors on both sides of the Prince Graafth (Broad St., between Beaver St. and Exchange Pl.), the burgomasters order "each and every one to pave his lot before his door as far as his lot extends," and to do it "this winter so far at least that it can be made use of a-foot." The vacant lots of the orphan Beekman, among the burgomasters offered to make passable.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 258.

The burgomasters resolved, on Sept. 24, "to appoint Sworn Butchers," who should "have the killing of all cattle to be consumed within this City's jurisdiction."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 258. Asser Levy and several others now appear before them and ask to be appointed. They are at once accepted on subscribing to the following articles and oath, viz: (1) Binding themselves "to accommodate each and every one without delay" to the utmost of their power, "and in them their own roads necessary for slaughtering;" (2) not to kill any cattle "before and until a proper permit" has been "exhibited to them from the Pachter [farmer of the excise] for the animal to be killed," as evidence that the excise has been paid; (3) "to kill all cattle which shall be ordered for slaughtering within the city's jurisdiction;" and (4) to abide by the prescribed rate for slaughtering, namely, five guilders for an ox or a cow, one dollar (daeders = 15 guilders) for a hog, one guilder for a sheep, calf, or goat, and proportionately for smaller animals. To these articles they subscribe, but Levy asks "to be excused from killing hogs, as his religion" does "not allow him to do it," which is granted. Nobody, save these butchers, is allowed "to kill or cause to be killed any cattle whatever," under penalty of a fine of 25 guilders for infractions.—Ibid., 258-60.

The burgomasters agree with "Jan Jansen Hagenzaar and his son Jeremiah for the making of four rods of pier" as an addition 3 to the quay at the Weighhouse (on the North River, built on the East River, in 1693, at what is now Pearl and Moore Sts.). The contract is for 255 guilders in wampum "and a half barrel of beer in addition."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 262. The father was drowned accidentally in the East River, on Nov. 22, perhaps in connection with this work, and Jeremia, who was 22 years of age, was ordered by the burgomaster to the Fatherland, Jan. 7, 1662, "to proceed with the making and completing the undertaken Pier," and to get another to work with him "in the place of his deceased father."—Min. of Orph. Court, I: 159, 175; Rec. N. Am., VII: 263. See also July 4, 1647; Nov. 9, 1653; April 18, and July 11 and 23, 1659; and June 9, 1697.

King Charles II, as an Episcopalian, issues a declaration condemning toleration. Stuyvesant goes from New Amsterdam by yacht to Esopus and Fort Orange, principally for grain for the company's use.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 189-90.

Charles II establishes two councils of trade for controlling the commerce of England and her plantations.—Col. State Papers, Colonial, 1574-1660, 496, 499.

In a letter of this date acknowledging the receipt of a map or plan of the city of New Amsterdam (Cortelyou's survey—see Oct. 5) the directors at Amsterdam write to Stuyvesant and his council: we noticed, that according to our opinion too great spaces are as yet without buildings, as for instance between Snee [William] Street and Princes Gracht [Broad St. above Exchange Place] or between Prince Street and Tuyt [Broad] Street, also between, which is about 3 acres, and perhaps between a piece of bridges and gardens; perhaps with the intention of cutting streets through them, when the population increases, although if standing closer together, a defense might be easier. We leave this to your consideration and care."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 489.

The directors at Amsterdam inform Stuyvesant that they are considering a petition of Evert Pietersen to become schoolmaster at New Amsterdam. "We shall communicate the result to your Honour," they say, after they have enquired about "his character, conduct and abilities."—N. Y. Col. MSS., IV: 356 (Albany). Pietersen had been employed by the company previously at New Amstel, on the Delaware, where, in August, 1667, his school contained 25 children.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 17. See May 2, 1661, of the placecard and brick with their own inscribed: "to Bever Gracht [Beaver St.], where the houses apparently are surrounded by excessively large lots and gardens; perhaps with the intention of cutting streets through them, when the population increases, although if standing closer together, a defense might be easier. We leave this to your consideration and care."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIV: 489.

Prior to this year, three small bridges were constructed, two over the Gracht (or canal in Broad Street), and one over the Bever Gracht, (or lesser canal in Beaver St.)—Cf. C. Pl. 82, Vol. II: Pl. 104, Vol. I. The statement made in Vol. II, p. 213, that but two small bridges across the Gracht are shown on the Castello Plan, is erroneous, as three are clearly shown. The reference to ERLIEST EXTANT COURT RECORD OF THE VILLAGE OF NEW HAERLEM, JAN. 13, 1662. SEE P. 217.
Steevewyck's bill for planks for the new bridge (see Sept. 2, 1659) — is also erroneous, as this evidently refers to the pier or bridge at the foot of Moore St., then under construction.

In this year, warrants arrived to New England for the arrest of the "regicides," Edward Whalley, William Goffe, and John Dixwell—who came to New England (see July 27, 1660) and effectually concealed themselves. Whalley and Goffe died at Hadley, Mass., about 1678 and 1679, and Dixwell at New Haven in 1689. —Stiles, Hist. of the Three Judges of King Charles I. (Hartford, 1794).

In this year, Jacob Steendam, the first poet of New Netherland, published at Amsterdam his little quarto volume entitled: 't Lof van Nieuw-Nederland (The Praise of New Netherland), which he dedicated to Cornelis van Ruyven, a councillor and secretary in New Netherland. We quote some portions from Henry C. Murphy's interesting Anthology of New Netherland, 45-67. Steendam is rapturous in his praise, as follows (translated):

New Netherland, thou noblest spot of earth,
Where bounteous Heaven ever pourreth forth
The fulness of His gifts, of greatest worth, Mankind to nourish.

O fruitful Land! heaped up with blessings kind, Who'er your several virtues brings to mind,—
Its proper value to each gift assigned,
Will soon discover.

Air, water, soil, of greatest purity;
And all, combined in sweetest harmony,
Unite, the ploughed up land to fructify,
With strength unerring.

You seem the masterpiece of nature's hand;
Whatever does with breath of life expand,
Or comes from out the sea, or thrives on land,
Oo you conferring.

It is the land where milk and honey flow;
Where plants distilling perfume grow;
Where Aaron's rod with budding blossoms blow;
A very Eden.

Oh happy land while envy you invite,
You soar far over all you thus excite;
And conquer whom by chance you meet in fight;
May God protect and Defend and save you; peace and comfort give;
All strife and discord from your borders drive;
So Netherland your happiness增er.
With joy and pleasure.

In this year, a half-moon of stone was built before the "Stadt Huys" (south side of Pearl St., east of Coenties Alley), mounting three small brass guns. Compare "Descriptions of the Towne of Mannadens, 1661" (see Sept. 1661), wherein this fortification is mentioned, with the Castello Plan of 1660 (C. Pl. 82, Vol. II), wherein no half-moon is shown. —Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 945.

In this year Cornelis Janzen Phuyver was mentioned as a tavern-keeper, at the present Broadway and Rector St., subsequently used as the first Lutheran Church in New York. See Castello Plan, II: 225.

Notice is given that the burgomasters of New Amsterdam intend "to establish again a Rattle Watch," and those who want places are requested to make the fact known to them without delay. On the 10th, Lodowyck Pos, who had been captain of the rattle watch in 1658, asked to be again appointed, but was informed "that complaints were lodged heretofore against him." He returned, however, and was accepted by the burgomasters on a salary of 5 guilders per month, on condition that if a fire broke out he would "repair thereto and attend to it," as well as see that his men came on duty in their turn. Eight men were named on the 10th as watchmen, a few of whom had served under Pos in 1658. The oath of fidelity was the same as that of Oct. 12, 1653, yet with some amplifications with respect to going at once to fires, and they were required to give fourteen days' previous notice if members wished to leave the service.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 261, 264, 265. See also Oct. 4, 1658; and Jan. 14, 1661.

The fire-wardens are ordered by the burgomasters "to go around on the earliest opportunity and inspect all the fireplaces and chimneys" in the city, to see if they are clean, and so ordered the inspections for the week following.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 265. The fire-wardens were Hendrik Kip, Sr., and Jan Jansen de Jongh. One vacancy existed through the removal of Joannes de la Montagne, Jr., to New Haerlem. On the 10th, the burgomasters nominated Burger Jorissen and Evert Durcklingh as candidates, and, on the 20th, Durcklingh was elected and confirmed in that office by Student and the council, receiving his commission on the 24th.—Ibid., VII: 264, 266. The burgomasters, on the following day, renewed their order about inspection, to be begun in three days, and on the 24th communicated the same to the three fire-wardens.—Ibid., VIII: 266.

An act of the British parliament establishes a general postal service.

A Quaker, named George Wilson, had been active in holding conventicles at the house of Henry Townsend, of Jamaica, L.I., and other Quaker meetings were held at Gravesend. This was a violation of the provincial ordinance against conventicles, of Feb. 1, 1661 (q.v.). Persons who were involved were arrested, fined, or banished. Stuyvesant also sent half a dozen soldiers to Rosthord (Jamaica) to restore quiet and prevent Quaker activity. When, a few weeks afterward, the people asked to be relieved from quartering these soldiers, Stuyvesant ordered them to be supported by the persons in Jamaica who had Quaker sympathies. He also deposed some of the magistrates there who had winked at the violations. —From "Council Minutes" in N. Y. Cal. Descs., IV: 489-93. Solomon la Chaerte petitions the supreme court for admission as a notary public; and the court orders first his examination as to fitness. On the 20th, he received the appointment and took the oath.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 240.

Lodowyck, Pos, captain of the rattle watch (see Jan. 7), appears in court with Jan Jolies Koeck, collector of the watch tax, and delivers to the burgomasters "a list of all the inhabitants" of the city. The question arises whether the servants of the West India Co. should be exempt from the watch tax; this is decided in the negative. Pos informs the court that he has made out a list, showing to what streets and corners the watch should go and call out the hours in the night.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 265. On Feb. 23, Koeck produced in court a list of persons who had paid the tax and those who were unwilling. At the same time, the burgomasters exempted the members of the watch from the payment on condition that they would also call the hours "outside of the gates, the Langdage [at Wall St. and Broadway] as well as the Watergate [at Wall and Pearl Sts.], for which the people living there" were to "pay to support the Rattlewatch."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 76-77.

The burgomasters resolve to ask Stuyvesant and the council "whether their Honors" have "exempted the Company's servants from the Burggir excise both of beer and wine as well as the slaughter tax," some being "unwilling to pay." —Rec. N. Am., VII: 266.

Rector Cupitts of the Latin school claims exemption from payment of the excise on the ground that "Professors, Preachers and Rectors are exempt from the excise in Holland," and that the Director General has granted him free excise. The court of burgomasters and schepens decide that the De [Domine] Rector shall pay the excise.—Rec. N. Am., III: 253.

The city court decided, on Jan. 18, to petition the provincial government "relative to the Scotsmen [fellars] travelling thro' and fro," that, if absent four months from New Amsterdam, they should forfeit their burgerright and be obliged, upon their return, to remain a period of a year and six weeks before being again eligible for a renewal.—Rec. N. Am., III: 250. This petition was drafted by the burgomasters on the 24th (ibid., VII: 266), and resulted in an order from Stuyvesant and the council, on the 31st, which directed the forfeiture of the burgerright by persons who, having been absent from the city, did not keep fires and hearth fires for a consecutive period of four months.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 221.

The city court made this order known to the people on Feb. 25. Absentees were required by it to purchase anew their burgerright upon their return. It carried with it also the regulations against traveling to Fort Orange and other parts of the province, conformable to the ordinance of May 25, 1660 (see under March 9, 1660), but so far modified as to allow that trade on payment to the city of New Amsterdam of twenty gilders in beavers, or the real value
At on and for court, given were these declarations inasmuch as the magistrates had any objection to his participation in making the nominations. By vote they decide against it, inasmuch as it manifestly conflicts with the Instruction of the Schout and the laws and customs of the City of Amsterdam in Europe. Stuyvesant interposes at this point, and decides that the schout shall have a vote, "assuring them that the matter would be "so concluded" by him and the council. But the burgomasters and schepens request a postponement of the nominations until an "Acte" thereon be given them. After some debate, the meeting adjourned until the afternoon. Upon reassembling, the schout delivered the "Acte," which declared that the Schout must prescribe in the Court of Burgomasters and Schepens and consequently have opinion and vote in the annual nomination . . . and all other matters, wherein he is not a party. The court declared the document "contrary to the Instruction," and, as Tonneman had not brought his instructions or the papers he said the burgomasters were "deprived of their authority." Then Stuyvesant reads the schout's instructions, and said he understood the "first rank remaining to the schout" to mean "the presidency," whereupon the presiding burgomaster remarked that the instructions of the fiscal also directed that he should preside in court, but that the presidency had, none the less, always remained hitherto with the burgomasters, of which they were "now deprived." Stuyvesant replied that "such was conceived by the Director General and Council;" however, he was content, for the present, that the schout should "desist from the presidency granted to him infernally until a definitive given on the "Acte" by the directors. The presiding burgomaster then announced that the board concluded that the schout should cooperate with them in the nomination "for the present time and desist from any further voting, unless authorized thereto by the directors. Stuyvesant and Tonneman assented and the nominations proceeded. A new board was elected. The names were published to the commonalty, on Feb. 2, "after the usual ringing of the bell three times."—Rec. N. Am., III: 257-61.

The court of schout, burgomasters, and schepens renues the ordinary attendance of the members at the "business of "Ordinary, Extraordinary and other Meetings" of the court, and fixes upon the fines for absences.—Rec. N. Am., III: 265.

Pieter Tonneman, the city schout, appears against Rachel van Tienhoven in the city court, saying he has "twice subjected her to a fine for having neglected, after divers notices, to erect her sheet-piling and to fill the same in with earth." She replies that she cannot do her part before her neighbors, for instance, Isaac de Forest and Tonneman himself, have "arranged their portion;" whereupon the court orders the schout to look after those who are "bound to erect their sheet-piling first."—Rec. N. Am., III: 261. This relates to the shoring on the East River (now Pearl St. between Whitehall and Broad Sts.).

Oloff Stevensen van Corlandt, retiring treasurer of the city, hands in his account-books and other papers to the burgomasters, who turn them over to Marten Cregen, his successor in that office for the following year.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 75.

The provincial council issues an order for summoning those who have neglected to repair their fences at Corlear's Hook.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 221.

At the request of the churchwardens of the city, the burgomasters were authorized to name as ministers Jacobus Nieuwenhuyzen for Claes van Elsadts the elder, the other for Jan Gilliack Knoek, about ringing of the bell and burying the dead.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 75-76.

On the 25th, an order was handed to Knoek, authorizing him "to take care, that the bell be tolled for the dead at the proper time, also to preserve the pall, collect the hire thereof for the church as was the fee for ringing the bell, the rent for the straps, benches and boards; to keep a record of all, who have died and are buried, without concerning himself with anything else in this regard."—Ibid., II: 77-78. At the same time, the younger Feb. van Elsadats was requested to bring his father before the burgomasters, but he reported that his father was engaged with public business. They issued an order, however, directing the father "to take care only of the graves of the dead, dug in the church and in the churchyard, and to look after that bell, which he had brought back to the proper place; to invite, according to old custom, everybody to the funeral, walk decently before the corpse and to demand and receive pay only for his services, without asking for more."—Ibid., II: 77, 81. The elder Van Elsadats appeared before the burgomaster to report, after the bell had been lodged against him for not behaving well "as a gravedigger and when inviting people to a burial" yet, "because of his age and long residence," they merely warned him "to behave better henceforth."—Ibid., II: 80-81.

Rector Curtius of the Latin school appears before the burgomasters, who again charge him with taking from his pupils "one beaver each quarter," contrary to orders (see Aug. 9, 1660). It is charged also that he does not keep strict discipline over the boys in his school, who fight among themselves and tear the clothes from each others bodies, which he should prevent or punish. He answers about the taking beavers, that at the beginning of school the parents of his pupils came to him, urging him to teach the children well, which he promised to do and has done more than usual, but he must therefore also have more than was allowed him, for which they have promised him one beaver; concerning the discipline he says "he and his hands have always wished to have their children punished and he requests, that the Burgomasters would make a rule or law for the school; it is also necessary, that his school [house] should be enlarged."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 76. See July 21, 1661.

The burgomasters, having received the remonstrance of the Churchmasters [wardens] concerning the pew in the church and the vacant seats in them, order "that the vacant seats in the church" be "rented out or sold for the benefit of the Church."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 78.

From these nominations, the burgomasters, on Feb. 25, Marc. Stuyvesant and the council now reappoint Nicatus de Sille as church-warden, and elect Marten Cregen and Cornelis Steeckwycz as orphan-wards, and Hendrick Willemsen and Claes Gangelofsen Viner as fire-wardens.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 78-80, 82-84, 89. Hans Vos is appointed by Stuyvesant and the council as deputy schout of New Amsterdam, to assist Pieter Tonneman, the actual schout.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 222.

A request is made by a miller for the right to use the water of the Kolck with which to operate a mill. O'Callaghan, who made a report of New Amsterdam and its environs, placed the location of this mill at the outlet of the Kolck or Fresh Waters, 50 feet from Pothaker's Hill, now City Hall Place.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 222: L. Chair's Register, In Hol. Soc. Year Book (1900), 146; Rec. N. Am., IV: 2. On the ownership of the mill, as shown in a partnership court case, see Rec. N. Am., IV: 2-3.

Allard (or Allerd) Conick asks the burgomasters to excuse him "from purchasing his small Burgherright, because at the time of the great war [1653] he with others . . . helped to work on the wall," but his request is denied.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 80.

Stuyvesant and the council direct the burgomasters to deliver to the provincial secretary "in due shape the City's accounts of receipts and expenditures" for the year 1660, "and to do so henceforth every year" on Feb. 1, the day before the personnel of the court is changed, in conformity with the system "in the praise-worthy government" of old Amsterdam.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 80-87.

Mete Greveaert being asked by the burgomasters why she does not pay "her money for the Ratte watch [night patrol] and for her Burgherright," answers that she cannot, because she does not earn.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 80.

The wife of Egbert van Borsum is told by the burgomasters that she still owes excise fees for the year 1654. She says she "always paid when the collector came."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 86.

Vermam de la Nay is told by the burgomasters that he still owes the excise fees for the year 1654, which he disproves by his account-book.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 86. Evidently this refers to his connection, as lessee, of the "Stadts Herbergh" or city tavern from Jan. 27, 1652 (q.e.), to the time in May, 1654 (q.e.), when the city occupied it as a town hall. He bought a house on Sept. 1, 1659, the site of which is now in the rear of the building at
No. 88 Stone St.—Jones, New Am. and Its People, 178 & seq.
Maria Pietersen is told by the burgomasters that the books of the former secretary of the city, Jacob Kip, show he still owes the city for excise fees for the year 1654, but he produces a receipt as evidence that he paid in that year.—Min. of Orph.
Court, II: 86. See Oct. 27, 1694.
18.
Albert Pietersen, the bugler, asks the burgomasters to exempt him from paying the tax for his burgheeright, because he is "an old burgher," and they agree "to wink at it," and so inform the city's treasurer.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 88.
21.
The petition by Emanuel Petersen and Dorothy Angola, his wife, both free negroes, prays that a certificate of freedom may be granted for a lad named Anthony Angola, whom they adopted when an infant and have since educated and reared. Petition granted.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 222. This is the earliest record of a colored freedman in America.

The city council establishes a new bread assize for the city, and orders each baker "to mark his baked bread with a particular mark,"
"on pain of forfeiture of the bread" found unmarked and subjection to a fine of 15 guilders besides for dereliction; also, to bring to the office of the secretary of the city, within three days' time, the stamp with which he intends to mark his bread, so that it may be registered. The marks of seven bakers were registered as the result of this order.—Rec. N. Am., I: 46; III: 285. See also Oct. 21.
April. Previous ordinances regulating the fees of the weigh-house are reinaugurated with a few modifications.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 391-

The East India Company is chartered with a capital of £30,000—Annals of E. I. Co., I: 556-58.
The burgomasters contract with Jonas Bartelsen "for cases in the Council-chamber [of the city hall], to place there in the City's papers, books, etc., for work on which he is to be paid four florins per day.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 899-90.
Adriana van Louw receives a ground-brief for a lot on the south side of Wall St., just west of William St., now included in the site of the Atlantic building.—See Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol.

Danie's directors of the West India Co. inform Stuyvesant:
"Upon the good report which we have received about the person of Evert Pietersen, and confiding in his abilities and experience
. . . his pious character and virtues, we have, on your Honor's recommendation, and that of the magistrates of the city of New Amsterdam, appointed the aforesaid person as Collector of the sick, Chorister and Schoolmaster at New Amsterdam in New Netherlands, which charge he shall fulfil there, and conduct himself in these with all diligence and faithfulness; . . . wherefore, we command all persons, without distinction, to acknowledge the aforesaid Evert Pietersen as Conosor, Clerk, Chorister and Schoolmaster, . . . and not to molest, disturb or ridicule him in any of these offices, but rather to offer him every assistance in their power, and deliver him from every painful sensation, by which the will of the Lord and our good intentions shall be accomplished."—Echols, Rec., II: 502-3. A later communication (see May 9) fixed his salary.
Charles II is crowned in London. See also May 8, 25, and 29, 1660.
In a record of this date, the new weigh-house and pier, at what is now Pearl and Moore Sts., are mentioned in connection with some goods carried from New Amsterdam to Fort Orange (Albany), or elsewhere, "to take along any passenger" who has arrived lately by a ship from Holland, or any of the goods brought by a passenger, unless he can "show a written consent" of the burgomasters or city treasurer; a penalty of 150 florins is fixed for infractions.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 91.
The directors at Amsterdam inform Stuyvesant and the council that the terms on which they have engaged Evert Pietersen, the schoolmaster (see May 2), are 36 guilders per month; plus 225 guilders annually "for his board," and that he "is now embarked in the ship the Gilded Beaver." A supply of books and stationery is being sent with him, which is not to be placed "at his disposal at once, but from time to time, when he may be in want of these, when his account ought directly to be charged with its amount."—N. Y.
Col. MSS., IV: 373 (Albany). For a discussion of Pietersen's salary during his entire period of service, see Kilpatrick, op. cit. 67 and footnote. Pietersen had begun his work prior to Aug. 1 (g.v.).
Peter Andriessen, chimney-sweep, receives a ground-brief for a house and garden on the south side of Wall St., between William and Hanover Sts., the ground being now covered by the building of the National City Bank.—See Castello Plan C. Pls. 82, 82a, Vol.

A. Abraham van Nas is commissioned by the provincial council as notary public.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 224. About this time he had the "papers and documents relative to the residuary estate of Isaac Allerton the Elder."—Rec. N. Am., III: 288.
Richard Bullock, a prisoner in the city hall jail, escapes. Hans Vos, recently appointed deputy schout, who had "his residence in the prison room," was confined "on bread and water" by the court for allowing the prisoner to escape; whilst Pieter Schaaf band, the city jailer, was "reprimanded for not having fastened the doors of the prison better." The jailer pleaded, in extenuation, that he could not attend to the prisoners in confinement because Vos resided in the prison room.—Rec. N. Am., III: 290. Vos having petitioned the city court for his "discharge from prison," alleging his innocence, was, on the 24th, "reprimanded for his drunkenness and excused for this time," and Schaaf band was "told that according to his office of jailer "he must take charge of the prison, keeping the prisoners confined." Petitions, legal hand and facile, defined in the case of Bullock, he was bound to make good the loss.—
Ibid., III: 315.
Cornelis Medyn is asked by the council of New Netherland if he has "in his care any records or documents" concerning Staten Island. He denies having any such records, but cautions the city from the years 1649-2, of which a list is made, and he says
"he has no others concerning the aforesaid island."—N. Y.
Bartholomew van Schel and other masons who have been engaged in building the walls of the fort of stone are discharged from the public service. Evidently, this work, which had been in progress for the last three years, was now completed.—See summary under Dec. 19, 1666.

Parliament notes that every member shall receive the sacrament according to the forms of the Anglican Church. On May 22, the "Solemn League and Covenant" was burned by the common hangman. On Dec. 13, Episcopacy was restored in Scotland, when three bishops were consecrated there by the Bishop of London.

June 15, Johan de Decket petitions the supreme court of director-general and council, appealing from a judgment pronounced against him by the city court of New Amsterdam, alleging that because he is a member of the higher court he is not amenable to a court of inferior jurisdiction.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 225; cf. also Rec. N. Am., III: 708. The case was taken up by the supreme court.

The fiscal complains to the provincial council that the merchants are making false entries of their goods, and requests that provision be made to stop the frauds.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 225. On the same day, therefore, Stuyvesant and the council pass an ordinance to prevent false entries being made at the custom-house, by demanding of "all Merchants, Factors and Traders not to ship off or send away any Pelties, either in case or package, unless the same" are "first brought into the Honble Company's store, and there inspected and appraised," as well as "marked with the [Holland] Hides and these must be dealt with similarly," and "shipped off only from the Pier [present Pearl and Moore St.], and from no other place."—Laws & Ord. N. Y., 404-2.

In the city court, a female defendant threatened to poison a man on pain of death in order to elicit true testimony from her.—Rec. N. Am., III: 327. Another example of the rack is found in ibid., III: 500.

The provincial council issues an order requiring the tavern-keepers of New Amsterdam to acknowledge and respect the fiscal and his deputy in their respective offices.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 226.

Hendrick Assuerus, tavern-keeper of New Amsterdam, is fined by the provincial council for having sold liquor to sundry persons and permitted them to play at naucpuns during divine service.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 226. He lived on Hooghe (Stone) St. in 1665.

July 31, Pieterje Jan, widow of Claes Jansen Ruyter, is charged in the city court by Schout Tonnenman with having an unstamped beer measure on her premises, contrary to law. She alleges it is the property of Willem Bogardus, therefore she has not the right to use it, or be punished, and that she has no other measure, having "heretofore sold by her cup." She is fined 10 guilders.—Rec. N. Am., V: 81.

The council refuses to grant the request of Jan de la Montagne, Jr., and others, proprietors of the plantation called "Vredesael" (West of Peace), near the newly erected village of New Haarlem, to settle a hamlet of some families on the point of the flandt, near where a water-mill is about to be erected.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 226. There are no records showing that the projected mill was built.

The members of the rattle-watch (or night patrol) are ordered by the burgomasters not to call before daybreak: "Rise up from bed etc." They ask for light and are promised two pounds of candles.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 93. See Oct. 7, 1661.

Sybrant Janss (also called Galma) and Tomas Lambertzsen, carpenters, are requested by the burgomasters to make "the pew of Foundation and Schepens" larger, for which purpose they are to fetch "the wainscot from Mr. [Nicauis] de Sille and the City paying for it."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 93.

Joost Goderijs (or Goderius) is appointed foreman of the porters at the weigh-house of New Amsterdam by their own vote.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 95. He had been appointed weighmaster on April 26, 1667.

The burgomasters remind Stuyvesant and the council of their order to them, on Dec. 15, 1667, "to collect from each chimney for the purchase and maintenance of fire buckets and ladders one florin," but as there are in the city "many poor inhabitants" who have "only one small chimney," yet pay "as much for taxes as well-to-do persons" who have "two to three fire places for one chimney," they think it unfair, and ask the provincial authorities to July 8 put such a tax on each fire place" as they deem fit. To this Stuyvesant and the council assented on July 15, by making the rate one florin annually for each fireplace.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 97-98.

This settled, the burgomasters on the same day ordered Schout Tonnenman, Secretary Nevius, and Court Messengers Claes van Eijslandt, Jr. and Jan Gillissen Koeck to "visit all the houses" in the city and to "examine the fireplaces in them, making a complete list of them," including the Bies, and to make also a "note of all wooden or plastered chimneys." Then, on the 21st, the treasurer was instructed to send Koeck on Aug. 1 to collect one florin "for each fireplace . . . according to the test thereof;" and on Aug. 5, he was again ordered to send Koeck "to collect the outstanding dues for each fireplace," accompanied by the schout, who was to assist him "in cases of refusal, first warning the recusants to guard against loss and then levying the dues by distress, charging for the visit 3 fl."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 94, 96, 102. For early history of this tax, see Dec. 15, 1667.

Rector Curtius of the Latin school writes to inquire if the burgomasters and schepens will contribute to him 60 guilders a year (they had been giving him 200—see July 4, 1665) in behoof on condition of his receiving no contribution from the youth. He was referred to the director-general and council for an answer.—Rec. N. Am., III: 345. Prof. Kilpatrick computes that the rector's annual income from the salary paid him by company and city together, "together with the receipts from the sale of guilders, ... considerably more than the elementary master received" (see May 9), showing that "the rector of a Latin school was on a distinctly higher plane, much more nearly equal to the position of the clergyman."—Kilpatrick, op. cit., 103. Curtius was informed a few days later (see July 21) that he was dismissed.

A city ordinance concerning bakers is issued by the burgomasters, requiring them, after Aug. 1, to obtain a license to bake, to be renewed every three months, and for which they are "to pay each time" one pound Flemish ($1.45).—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 95. On Sept. 23, the bakers petitioned the burgomasters for relief from these rules and fees, but the petition was, on the 26th, referred to the provincial authorities, who had been responsible for the issue of the original order.—Ibid., II: 108.

Lodowycz Pos, captain of the rattle-watch, is reprimanded by the burgomasters for being "at night at the house of the Blue Dove," a tavern, where he engaged in quarrelling, even "allowing his sword to be taken from him." They charge him to look after his command, "inspect their attention to duty and appearance and then go to bed, rise again now and then at midnight," to see if his men do their duty.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 95-96. This is not only money, but of the utmost importance to the city; and to give a tavern in the records. It stood at what are now Nos. 10 and 12 Pearl St. The tavern-keeper was Claes Jansen, from Naerlen, who was also known as De Ruyter. See Castello Plan, II: 28; Landmark Map Ref. Key, II: 977.

A letter from Stuyvesant and his council to the directors at Amsterdam says: "The English and French colonies are continued and populated by their own nation and countrymen and consequently bound together more firmly and united, while your Honors' colonies in New-Netherland are only gradually and slowly peopled by the scrapping of all sorts of nationalities (few excepted), who consequently have the least interest in the welfare and maintenance of the commonwealth."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 205.

Stuyvesant addresses the directors at Amsterdam in regard to wampum, as follows: "We are not less, than formerly, troubled in regard to your order about the reduction of wampum, for our daily experience convinces us more and more of how little use the former reduction from 6 to 8 [white bead] has been. We have already told you, that in the trade wampum is handled by the handful or length of string and that there is so much under selling going on, that no redress by reduction is possible. A beaver, hattered formerly for 6, 7, at the price of 4 gulden guilders for 1000, at the rate of 6 for a stiver, is now bought and sold for 18 to 20 guilders, wampum rating at 8 for a stiver. If we were to go on reducing wampum at this rate, we would at once drive away all our trade, which is already suffering; for this and other reasons we dare not carry our new reduction of the quantity, though repeatedly ordered by you."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 503-4. See April 21, Sept. 20, and Oct. 6, 1666.
Curtius, the master of the Latin school, has been dismissed by the directors of the West India Co., to whom Stuyvesant writes as follows: "What Alexander Carolus Curtius, the Rector or Latin schoolmaster, dismissed by your Honors, has remonstrated and requested of us on his departure, your Honors can deduce from his illustrious name. Col. Pratt, Annals of Public Education in N. Y., 27. Curtius's petition appears not to have survived. He had been master of the Latin school for about two years (see July 4, 1659). For the reopening of the school under Aegidius Luyck; see May, 1662.

The chancellors, or burgomasters, at the weigh-house, is by the burgomasters to deliver to the secretary of the city within 24 hours a statement of what the porters exact "for carrying wares, goods, beer and wine from one place to another."-Min. of Orph. Court, II, 96–97. See Aug. 1.

On Sept. 16, 1664, they ordered "to beat the drum at the coming fair and when the train band marches up under the orange flag," for which he should receive just compensation.—Ibid., II, 107.

An extraordinary court of the schout, burgomasters, and scheepsen is held at the city hall, but in the absence of some of the burgomasters this is postponed. One of the matters involved is a hearth or chimney tax for the city. Such a tax, of one guilder per annum on each chimney in New Amsterdam, had been established by Stuyvesant and the provincial council on Dec. 15, 1657 (q. s.). The city court met again on Sept. 10, 1661, with Stuyvesant represented between himself and the burgomasters and scheepsen as to authority for the imposition of new taxes. Stuyvesant told his regretted he rejected this misunderstanding, and said that if new taxes were to be imposed "it must be by and with advice of the Scheepsen. The two burgomasters demanded of him a separate instruction besides the instruction of Burgomasters and Scheepsen," but he said he could not give it, either alone or with his council. Then Scheep Petter Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven asked him if the burgomasters could "impose any new tax without the knowledge of the Scheepsen," to which Stuyvesant made answer: "Yes, as regards the imposition of the Hearth Money; and that the Instruction regards new imports, and that this is old."—Lett. & Ord. N. Neth., 323; Rec. N. Am., I, 351-353; cf. also Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 226.

The so-called "Duke's Plan," reproduced and described in Sept. Vol. I, Pt. 10, and pp. 207-10, belonging to the King's Collection of maps, plans, views, etc., and preserved in the British Museum, bears the inscription "A Description of the Towne of Mannadus or New Amsterdam as it was in Sept: 1661," and also the date 1664. The plan, which shows the city as far north as the outlet of the Fresh Water, was probably based upon a Dutch survey made in 1661, but was evidently made by an English draughtsman, shortly after the capture of the city by the English. It is a work, however, on heavy vellum, brilliantly coloured and heightened with gold. The title of the plan is so strikingly similar to the manuscript "Description of the Towne of Mannadus," of the same time, that some relationship between the two has been suspected; see Jameson, N. Y. Neth., VIII.

This manuscript "Description of the Towne of Mannadens in New Nutherland," as it was in Sept. 1661" was discovered in 1906-7 by Miss Frances G. Davenport, of the Department of Historical Research in the Carnegie Institute of Washington, among the manuscripts of the Royal Society of London. Its authorship has not been determined. It was printed for the first time, but not letter for letter, in Jameson's, N. Y. Neth. (1909), 421-44. The entire manuscript is reproduced in facsimile in this work for the first time.—See C. Pts. 87 and 88, Vol. II. (A typographical error appears there in the half-title in the spelling of Miss Davenport's Christian name.) The full text of the document, just as it was written, follows:

"Description of ye Towne of Mannadens in New Nutherland, as it was in Sept. 1661.

The Easter-side of ye town is from ye North-Eastagate unto ye point whereon ye Greats newe house standes present Whitehall and State Stys[,] and ye contains 490 yards, and lyeth Southwest and North-east, one from ye other. Between ye gate and point ye ground falls a little out and in, on this side of ye town gate there is a gutter [the canal, present Broad Street], whereby at high water boats goe into ye town, also on this side of ye town house [city hall], before which is build a half moon of stone, where are mounted 3, small brass guns, tho' it be large enough to mount 8.

The bay between Ye and Ye North-east gate [Wall and Pearl St.]. Between this side and Long Island all ships usually ly at anchor, to lade and valuate goods, secure from hurt of any wind and weather. From ye Wester side of ye Towne into Hudson river, and part by ye Easter side of ye town, between ye maine and long land. Nearest ye Wester side of this head is a plot of ground: a little higher ye other ground: ye, with a stand of Windmill; and a Fort four square [Fort Amsterdam], 100 yards on each side, at each corner flanked out 26, yards: In ye midst of ye East and Westside is a gate opposite to ye other [they were about north and south]: ye walls are built with lime and stone, and within filled vp with Earth to a considerable breadth for planting guns, whereon are mounted 16, guns. In this Fort is ye Church, ye Govenor house, and houses for soldiers, ammunition, etc.

"The Wester-side of ye town is from ye Windmill unto ye North-west corner 460, yards, and lyeth near North-north-east and South-west; it is bounded with ye Arme of ye Sea, ye stretches itself into Hudsons river, by ye Hollanders calld ye North-river. From ye town unto ye other side is 2. miles broad, and a fit road for shippe to ride, ye said rier goes far into ye land N. E. ward. About 40 leagues vp this rier on the river side they have a town calle Fort Amsterdam, 8 miles, calld Porter st [Fort Orange, Fort Aauria, now Alkaway], in compass as big as Manados, but not so much built, nor so populous. This town educ[s] their chief trade for beater-skins, otterkins, Muskins [muskrat skins], Deerk-skins etc. None but their own people may goe there to trade, except they have purchased ye jurisdiction of Cassandra for 50,000 dols. Between this river and Fort, with soldiers in it, and a small town of 6o. Dutch families, calld Soppase [Esopus, now Kingston], but is somtong from ye rier; there they plant corne etc. and have some trade for beater and other skins.

The land side of ye town [New Amsterdam] is from ye North-west corner unto ye North. E. gate 240, yards and lyeth neer W. N. and S. E. having six flankers at equal distance, in four of wch are mounted 8, guns.

[†] In ye town, in ye midway between the N. W. corner and N. E. hath a small descent on each side much aile, and so continues through ye town unto ye arme of ye water on the Easter-side of ye Towne: by ye help of this descent they have made a gut [the canal, present Broad Street to beyond Exchange P.], almost through ye town, keyed it on both sides with timber and boards as far as in ye 3. small bridges; and ye neer coming into ye gut they have built two large timber bridges with rails on each side; at low water ye gut is dry; at high water boats come into it, pass under ye 2. bridges, and go as far as ye 3. small bridges. In ye contrary stand houses in several places.

Brian Newton (Nunos) saks the provincial council to allow him to resign his commission of captain-lieutenant of the company's garrison at New Amsterdam, and to permit his return to Holland.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 228. He had been discharged from his lieutenantcy, in June, 1659, and returned to Holland only to sail again to New Netherland in December of that year.—N. Y. Col. Diary, XIV: 461-62.

The provincial council resolves to offer at public sale, on the public account, 40 negroes, young and old, male and female, recently received from Curagoo, payment to be made for them in beavers or in beef, pork, wheat, or pease.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 228.

The punishment of riding the wooden horse was still inflicted at New Amsterdam in this year.—Rec. N. Am., III: 327; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 228.

The burgomastar and schepens ask Pieter Tonneman, the city schout, if he has received the fines from the bakers of the city, and he answers that he has. They thereupon decide "to divide" the same among "the justice [court] of the City, the Poor and the Church."—Rec. N. Am., III: 354.

Stuyvesant and the council by ordinance direct the inhabitants of certain towns or villages, among them those of Harlem, within three months, or at the latest by Jan. 1, 1666, to have all lands claimed by them, whether cultivated or uncultivated, surveyed by the sworn surveyor, "and set off or designated by proper marks, and on the exhibition of the return survey thereof, apply for and obtain a regular Patent as proof of property, on pain of being deprived of their right," and so that remaining land may be given to others.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 409.

The burgomasters inform Pieter Tonneman, the city schout, that after the adjournment of their session they intend "to go with him and several of the streets, whether anything lies there to prevent driving," and, if they find the owner, Tonneman is to order him "to take it away or in case of refusal to do it at [the] owner's expense."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 106.

Pieter Tonneman, the city schout, is directed by the burgomasters "to see that the privileges on the streets be removed, as it has been forbidden by Placent that privileges should empty on the street."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 106.

Hendrick Willemse, baker, having been interrogated by the burgomasters as to the quality of bread baked in the city, about which complaints have reached them, says the main fault lies with the bakers, who allow their apprentices "to attend to the rising of the bread, who do not knead it sufficiently, which makes the bread bake badly."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 106; Rec. N. Am., III: 490.
CHRONOLOGY: THE DUTCH PERIOD: 1626-1664

1661 359. This situation induced the city court to pass an ordinance the next day for regulating the proper baking of bread in the city.

16 —Rec. N. Am., II 47; III 359-60. See also Oct. 21.

25 Stuyvesant had been shown letters received "from London and Boston" and the new burgomasters Williamus Willemsen and Willett had reported that not only was a rupture imminent between the mother countries, "but also the King [Charles II], the Duke of York and Parliament" were "urgently asked for three or four frigates to take ship [at New Amsterdam] and with force land, and until the Company here, and that Charles II was "urged to grant this demand, by telling him, that the W. I. Company" claimed and held New Netherland "by unlawful title, because in 1625 King James had granted to the Company only a watering place on Staten Island and nothing more."—Rec. N. Am., XIV 456. This alarm induces Stuyvesant and his council to draw up proposals for fortifying the city of New Amsterdam and for strengthening its fort.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 259. See also Oct. 17.

Councillor Johan de Decker, in the provincial council, moves that the burgomasters of New Amsterdam be required to state cause why they have taken this right to protect the city without the consent of the superior authority.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 259.

Oct. 7 Jan Gillissen Koekel, upon his petition of Sept. 25, is given the office of gauger and bramer for one year, subject to a renewal at his request, and his instructions are ordered to conform to those given to the former gauger, on Dec. 20, 1658.—Min. of Orph. Court, II, 102, 109.

Peter Schaafsman, the jailer at the city hall, is informed by the burgomasters that the city has great expenses, and is asked if he will consent to continue as jailer without a salary, "receiving only quarters and fuel" if he remains. He agrees to think it over.—Min. of Orph. Court, II, 109. He took his time about it, and, meanwhile, on Nov. 11, was ordered "to take better care of the City Hall."—Cal. Hist. MSS., 229.

As he could not have been paid for his work by Jan. 12, 1662, the burgomasters put the question to him definitely, and he replied it was not possible "that he should receive no pay," so they allowed him a yearly salary of 50 florins.—Ibid., II 125.

Joost Goderus and Barent Jacobson Cool, two of the porters at the weigh-house of New Amsterdam, report to the burgomasters that, as they have been "ordered to go and work on board ships" in the harbour, they are forced to neglect the work required by the burgomasters. They protest that they are not bound to work on the ships, but are informed, summarily, that if they will not do that work neither will they be allowed any work "of the burgomasters." Furthermore, they are advised "to hire others for the Burgurers' service," whenever they are absent on the ships.—Min. of Orph. Court, II, 109.

The presiding burgomaster reports that, notwithstanding orders given to the contrary on July 8, the members of the cattle-watch are calling out at four in the morning "Rise up from bed eyes," but fail to call the hour at midnight. Their captain, Lodowycz Pos, is ordered, therefore, to tell his men that they must abide by the former orders and rules, "to call the hours at all the corners prescribed and not to stop before reveille." For disobedience they are subject to a fine of a month's pay for each offense, "and besides arbitrary correction." Pos himself is threatened with the loss of his office if he fails to pay strict attention to his men.

These threatened penalties did not, however, lead to results; so, on the 14th of this month, the burgomasters asked Pos again why his men were "still calling before day break" to the people to rise. The answer shows that the men feared ridicule by the people if they called "in the day time," because when reveille was beaten it was in fact day. The watchmen being summoned before the burgomasters finally promised to obey the rules in the matter, and Pos was ordered to inspect his men during the night, "with the addition,"—Min. of Orph. Court, II, 109-111.

11 As certain persons forestall the general interest of the city by securing that the Indians bring to sell, "such as venison, mackerel and fish," the burgomasters and scheepen decide to enforce the provincial ordinance of July 21, 1666 (Laws & Ord. N. Y., 383), against runners in the woods, and to provide that no Indian shall "bring any articles to any places except such as shall be "ordered and appointed thereof."—Rec. N. Am., III 379.

The provincial council, on the 15th, by an order authorized the burgomasters to adopt measures for preventing a monopoly (Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 230), and, on the 21st, each burgomaster was asked to give his advice for putting an end to the "covetous engravings for prints of the Indians on those islands," and who sell "at enhanced prices to the poor people." The subject was fully discussed by the burgomasters, who decided "that two trading houses should be established for this purpose and the savages be charged to sell their goods at no other places, than these." It was "also ordered, that the planks lying before the house of Mr. Hans [Kierstede],—at Pearl and Whitehall Sts. shall be removed, to erect there one trading house for the Indians."—Min. of Orph. Court, II, 112-13.

The next step taken, so far as known from the records, was an interrogatory of Adolph Pietersen by the burgomasters on March 24, 1662, as to whether he could work eight or ten days for the city, in "putting up a little house, for the Indians to offer their wares." He replied that he was busy, but returned, presently, and said he would undertake the job, if the burgomasters could "wait a few days." They agreed.—Ibid., II, 135.

The presiding burgomaster of New Amsterdam proposes for the consideration of the city court "whether some means ought not to be taken to bring silver money here into circulation among the public and to keep seaman [wampum] only as an article of trade, and that the Honble Director General asks the advice of each one hereupon." The question of the incorporation of the city was also anonymously decided first to write to Fatherland and demand a mint, having that, to cry down the seaman and to fix the beaver at six guilders and the tobacco @ four and a half shillers per lb. and that the Lords Majors [directors at Amsterdam] should please to furnish some silver and silver coin for that purpose."—Rec. N. Am., III 383. See Oct. 6, 1660.

On Oct. 4, the presiding burgomaster stated to the city court 15 "that the yachts or sloops trading up and down" the Hudson were "indebted for wharfage, for loading and unloading at the wharf," which, although quite as much bound to pay as the ships, have a court it not paid. He asked the court if it was not advisable to request from Stuyvesant and the council an order requiring "the yachts, in place of paying the wharfage," to "make each of them one or two voyages to Tappan and bring from there, for this City, their yachts full of stone in order to surround this City with a wall in course of time."—Rec. N. Am., III 377. The burgomasters now ask the provincial council that yachts or sloops owned in the province be obliged to bring two or three cargoes of stone yearly to the city for the redoubts proposed to be constructed, in lieu of paying their wharfage; and the council empowers them, on the same day, to make an agreement with the captains of such sailing craft either to bring stone or pay the wharfage fee.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 210.

An order of the provincial council, on Oct. 11, empowered the burgomasters to make regulations for the assize of the bread baked in the city.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 230. At the same time, Stuyvesant and the council had confirmed the nomination, by the burgomasters, of Hendrick Willemsen and Christoffel Hooghplant as inspectors or "oversiers of the bread." They now accept these posts. Their business is to see that the bread is made of good materials, has the proper weight, and is well baked, and "to perform their duties for the welfare of the community and the inhabitants."—Min. of Orph. Court, II, 113.

At the same time Schout Pieter Tenmanne states a loaf of coarse bread from Reijnier Willemsen, a baker, and requests these newly-appointed "oversiers to express their opinion" about it. They examine it and declare that it contains "honest material," but has not been worked properly or allowed to ferment enough, and that it was baked badly and made by someone who either did not know how to bake or, knowing, had been in a hurry. Reijnier Willemson comes before the burgomasters and is shown the bread by the schout. The burgomasters ask for an explanation, and he replies that "he was out and had put the boys to work to bring this piece, constantly trying to pull the bread out of the oven, even when he said it was not done yet and must remain in the oven for another hour," also that "the wheat was from Gravestend, which is not as good as the grain from elsewhere." He is released, "this time," with a warning "to bake good and fit bread for the public.

On the same afternoon, the overseer, Hendrick Willemsen, who is also a baker in the city, comes again before the burgomasters
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

1661 and informs them "that the bakers cannot go on with their business, if they are to continue baking only for their wages," because they lose too much time "taking the grain to and from the mill.

He also reports that he has reproved Reynier Willemsens for having blamed "his boys," a thing "which would not be done in Holland."

The city court forthwith establishes a new bread assize, and prohibits the baking of cakes (Koeckjes), cracknels, or sweet cakes. The ordinance is at once "read out from the front [steps—see Jan, 11] by the city hall, "after the sounding of the bell."

On Nov, 4, the burgomasters charged the schoot "to direct all bakers . . . not to bake anything else, but coarse and white bread and always to keep coarse bread publicly for sale in the shops."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 116. The conditions were unfavourable to the bakers; so, on Nov, 18, they petitioned the burgomasters for "a raise of the price of white, wheat, and rye bread, and permission to bake little cakes, sweet cakes and cracknels once or twice a week." They were granted the cake privilege on condition of their keeping in their shops coarse bread "for public sale at the prescribed price and not dearer."

An interesting anti-garnishee ordinance is passed to protect the servants of the West India Co. "from some self-interested persons" who get assignments, "on the Company's books of account, against the servants, for debts contracted for 'trifles,' and for which they charge 'over 50% more than people could purchase them for."

On June 11 of this year, the deacons of the church at New Amsterdam petitioned the provincial council that each of the adjacent villages be obliged to make weekly contributions for their own poor—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 226. They were led to make this demand because of "the many applications and great trouble" which they experienced daily "from persons residing in the outlying villages with whose characters and wants they were wholly unacquainted, causing a depletion in their treasury to the disadvantage of the poor and needy of New Amsterdam. Stuyvesant and the council now (Oct, 22) pass the first poor law applicable to the province, in order, as they say, "that theLazy and theVagabond" may "as much as possible be reined, and the really Poor [be] the more assisted, and cared for."

The deacons of New Amsterdam are not to give assistance to any persons not residents of the city, unless they bring a certificate showing "their character and poverty." Collections are ordered to be taken "in all Villages and Settlements" and to be "laid up for the Poor and Needy." This is to be done in every place, whether there is preaching there or not. If a place has neither preaching nor a pastor, the magistrates thereof are required to "nominate and qualify two proper persons" to "go around every Sunday with a little bag among the congregation and collect the Alms for the support of the Poor of that place."

If they fall short in their needs, they may receive the aid of New Yorkers or persons of New Amsterdam in the same quarter. They are also specified for such cases.—Laws & Ord. N. Netha, 410-11.

That this ordinance did not solve the difficulty is evident from subsequent conditions, for which see Dec. 28.

At about this time a second school for the teaching of common branches and the catechism was opened "on the bounty of the Director-General," under the charge of Harmans van Holoken (see Jan. 16, 1660), who had been replaced by Evert Pietersen in the older school, situated near the fort (see Feb. 5, 1662). Van Holoken, unsuccessful, apparently, as a schoolmaster in the older school, had solicited employment "in one or other manner in the city," and the legs were set for a "reader, a schoolmaster and a master, with this condition, that the Director General, whenever his service might be wanted for the Company as adlford, shall replace him by another expert person."—N. Y. Col. MSS., IX: 389 (Albany); Eccles. Rec., I: 325; Pratt, Annals, 497 498 (Feb. 1, 1662), for "Schoolmasters in New Amsterdam," ending with Pietersen, see Kilpatrick, 70. The site of this bouwery school, which was intended for Stuyvesant's tenants and his negroes, was near the present corner of Sixth St. and Hall Place. See Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 941.

Jan Gillises Koeck is sworn in by the burgomasters as measurer or gauger of cans, ells, and weights in New Amsterdam, and is given particular instructions for the conduct of his office.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 116-17.

Jacobus Gabry, in a Latin letter written from Holland to Gov. John Winthrop of Connecticut, says that "the new teacher [Aegi- dius Luyck] of the children of the Director General" is about to sail and will be the bearer of this and other letters. He describes Luyck as "a youth, but very modest, a good reader, and well versed in languages." He predicts that he will become "teacher of the Latin school" at New Amsterdam, in the place of Dr. Curtius.—Abstract from the original Latin letter in Winthrop Papers, XIII: 79 (MSS. in Mass. Hist. Soc.). Cf. Kilpatrick, op. cit., 105, 137.

The burgomasters adopt the "following instructions for Master Evert Pietersen [see Aug. 1], the schoolmaster, to regulate himself thereby." These instructions and rules they have drawn up with the advice of Stuyvesant and the council.

He shall take good care that the children arrive at the regular hours of 8 A.M. and 1 P.M.

2—Keep good discipline among his pupils.

3—Teach the children and pupils "the Christian prayers, commandments, baptism, Lord's supper, and the questions with answers of the catechism," for which are taught here every Sunday afternoon in the church.

4—Before closing school "let the pupils sing some verses and a psalm."

5—He shall receive "besides his yearly salary," "from every pupil quarterly," as follows. Thirty stuivers for each child taught the alphabet, spelling and reading; fifty stuivers for instruction in reading and writing; sixty stuivers for teaching to read, write, and cipher, and from those who came in the evening and between times pro rata a fair sum" but "the poor and needy, who asked "to be taught for God's sake," shall "teach for nothing.

6—He is allowed "to demand and receive from every body who makes "arrangements to come to his school before the first half of the quarter preceding the 1st of December next the school dues for the quarter, but nothing from those" who come "after the first half of the quarter."

He is "not to take more from anybody "than herein specified.

Conditions for the sale of a lot of negroes in New Amsterdam are issued by the provincial council, and, on the same day, the burgomasters ask the council for four able-bodied negroes as a gift for the unloading service. On Dec. 8, the council voted to give three of them to the city.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 251.

The burgomasters fix upon new wharfage rates, to be paid by the merchants of New Amsterdam for unloading and loading their goods.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 118.

The city of Amsterdam engaged this time building a ship, called in the records "the City's ship" or "the City's barge." The burgomasters are now informed that the shipwrights are drawing "more than 1100 ft. in wampum from the Treasury for wages, at the rate of 16 ft. in beavers."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 118. From a record of a year later (Nov. 5, 1662), it is known that Jan Ariensz was one of the shipwrights who at that time asked the burgomasters for his pay "for making the City's barge."

—Ibid., II: 165. On Aug. 25, 1662, Pieter Jansen from Lange- straat engaged with the burgomasters to enter "the service of the City" and "to sail as skipper of the City's ship for the salary of 40 fl. in wampum and 50 ft. in beavers, including rations."— —Ibid., II: 159. He made another contract, on March 9, 1663, "to sail as skipper of the City's ship, doing also all work, as discharging and taking in freight," at a monthly salary of "40 fl. in wampum and one beaver or the value thereof." A few days later (Mar. 13), Ger Gerritsz was engaged by the city to sail with Jansen, at a monthly salary of 50 florins.—Ibid., II: 170-71. A year later (March 17, 1663), Jansen entered into another contract as skipper for the city, this time for a salary of 800 florins, and besides for each voyage, when he discharged at New Am- sterdam, "a forty of the vessel, 4 fl. also in wampum."

Andries Andriessen was engaged at the same time to work on the ship at a per diem salary.—Ibid., II: 194. (Langeestraat was in Brabant.)
CHRONOLOGY : THE DUTCH PERIOD : 1626-1664

A provincial law having been passed on Oct. 22 (p.v.), Dec. 18, the presiding burgomaster now proposes to the city court "to decree, whereas divers poor seek their support here from other towns, that the Deaconry of this City intend to permit a collection to be made every Sunday in each town from which the outside poor may be maintained—then inasmuch as such would tend rather to the prejudice than interest of this place—to resolve that such ought not to be undertaken before and until they communicate the same to the W. Court of this City, and to prefer acquainting the Honble Director General and to speak to his Honor thereupon, and that a collection be made by the Honble Director General and Council throughout the entire land for this object, so as thus to be freed from the trouble."—Rec. N. Am., III: 429-31. See Jan. 26, 1662.

The burgomasters lay out an order for the members of the rattle-watch or night police to go on duty in pairs, and direct their captain, Lodowik Pos, to order them to walk less noisily and not presume to commit nuisances "on the steps of the City Hall."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 122-24. See also April 15, 1666.

The earliest extant court record, as well as land trial, of the village of New Haerlem is of a hearing on this date at an "extraordinary meeting" in the case of Nicolaes Meijer [de Meyer] against Sijgermoen Luijks [Looijs], in which the plaintiff demanded the delivery of a house, barn, lands, etc., that were sold to him by the defendant, together with the costs of the suit.—Harlem Records (original MSS., I: 3 (N. Y. Pub. Library)). Both parties had lots at Van Keulen's Hook (ibid., 1: 5), and Otterspoor (see Landmark Map Rep. Key, III: 667).

Translated in full this court record (reproduced as Pl. II, Vol. IV) is as follows:

"13 January 1662. Extraordinary meeting.

Present Jan Pietersen
Daniel Taurner
Jan Lomant
Nicolaes Meijer, Plaintiff, against Sijgermoen Luijks, Defendant

The Plaintiff demands the delivery of the House, Barn, land and the further appurtenances as they were sold to him; with the costs of suit accrued and yet to accrue.

The Defendant acknowledges to have sold the land and the house to the plaintiff, but it was left to his consideration until the morning whether he would do it.

The plaintiff replies and shows two attestations wherein it appears that the sale was made; and also by the attestation of Evert Duiker that Defendant has acknowledged to have sold the same, but did not think that the expenses would amount to so much.

The defendant appears before the Court and prays for evidence, because the declaration of Myndert Koerten is contradictory; denies that Margarett Prout was present at the sale, and requests that the conversations be sworn to, and sustains that Meynart Gerritsen cannot testify, he having rented Meyer's land.

The Court orders the Plaintiff to have his witnesses sworn.

—from the original Harlem Records, I: 3.

Walewyn vander Veen, who had, on Oct. 23, 1661, petitioned the provincial council for ordination as a notary public, and had been ordered to be examined as to his fitness, is now sworn in—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 251, 253.

Gabriel Carpey receives two ground-briefs for two small adjoining lots, on the south-east corner of William and Wall Sts., the ground now covered by the building of the National City Bank.—See Castell Flat, C. Pls. 82, 120, II, and III: 244 Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl 87, Vol. II, and III: 406. It is reported to the burgomasters that the consistory of the church at New Amsterdam deems it necessary, because many poor people come from the country, "to pass the plate for a general collection," and the burgomaster has written that, not only in the city but also outside of it, a collection is demanded "for the support of the poor coming from outside." But the burgomasters resolve "to send an order to the Deaconry of New Amsterdam, "directing them not to give assistance to anybody, except to the inhabitants. . . . We provide these poor with clothing, food and a little money; also to make a note of whom assistance is given."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 124-25.
THE ICONOGRAPHY OF MANHATTAN ISLAND

Marten Cregier, treasurer of the city of New Amsterdam, having been directed two days before to render an account of his stewardship of the city's funds, now delivers to the board of schout, burgomasters, and schepens his accounts of the revenues and expenditures of the city, which being audited are found to be correct. On Feb. 5, he was succeeded in office by Allard Anthony, and the books and papers were handed over to the new treasurer.

Pieter, a negro, who has been engaged by the city as a public executioner of criminals, requests the city court for "the execution for execution's sake" of Marcellus Martens and Marcell van Veert (Waart). Martens had confessed, "without torture and chains," to the theft of cabbages from a garden, and had been sentenced "to stand in the pillory with cabbages on his head" (see also Nov. 15, 1661), as an indication to the public of the nature of his thievery, and the latter had been condemned to be whipped at the public whipping-post.—Rec. N. Am., III: 355-6; 409-10; IV: 24.

Feb. Stuyvesant comes into the city court in order "to be present at the nomination of the succeeding Burgomasters and Schepens in place of those going out." These nominations are made by a plurality vote, in double number, and are presented to Stuyvesant and his council for a final choice and election of the requisite number. Such choice was made on the 2d, when their names were proclaimed to the burgurers and inhabitants with the usual ceremony.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 25-29; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 253.

2 The burgomasters of New Amsterdam have submitted to Stuyvesant, the city's director-general, that it is "more convenient that the school[house] be erected on a part of the present churchyards."—N. T. Cal. MSS. X, pp. 39-40 (Albany). No further record appears. It is certain that a private house continued to be rented for the school near the fort, perhaps the house of Casper Symmeut on that same Brouwer St., at which would now be 40 Stone St. (Cortelyou Plan, II: 260). This is known positively to have been the location three or four years later (see May 8, 1666).

17 Persons who are not residents of New Amsterdam, but who are in the city for a time, are obliged to pay the tax for the ratelwatch as long as they remain.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 126.

"The burgomasters order Allard Anthony, the city treasurer, "to demand and collect from everybody, above 16 years old, without exception, the dues for the Ratelwatch."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 126-27.

18 The city court renews an ordinance with respect to the attendance and tardiness of members of the bench.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 16; 20.

20 Aegidius Laycke departs from New Amstel, on the Delaware, for New Amsterdam, "called for the private instruction of Stuyvesant's children."—N. T. Cal Decs., XII: 362; N. T. Cal. MSS., XXI: 257 (Albany). The Latin school, which had closed with the departure of Cortesius (see July 21, 1661), was reopened under Laycke in the following May (q.t.).

Mar. The provincial council orders the arrest of Solomon Lachair and Warnacr Wessel, farmers of the excise, because they are in arrears with their funds. Wessel's petitions to be released from imprisonment, which is granted to him through the intervention of several women on behalf of Wessel's wife. But a week later his bondsmen asked the council for security against loss by them of the bail and Wessel's property was ordered to be inventoried.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 234.

A dispute as to the right to collect fees from sales auction is settled by the council. Timothy Gabriel, the amanuensis, and Joannes Nevis, the city's secretary, are those whose conflicting claims are heard.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 234 and June 9, 1662.

3 Allard Anthony, the treasurer of New Amsterdam, reports to the provincial council. Timothy, Gabriel, the amanuensis, and Joannes Nevis, the city's secretary, are those whose conflicting claims are heard.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 234 and June 9, 1662.

15 By a proclamation issued by Stuyvesant and the council on January 15, a day of general thanksgiving, fasting, and prayer in New Netherlands was named for March 10. Stuyvesant promised that the proclamation be read publicly at New Amsterdam on March 10.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 233. Min. of Orph. Court, II: 129-30; Rec. N. Am., IV: 45.

The town of Harlem petitions the provincial council that the settlers there may be exempted from the payment of 8 fl. per morgen for their lands; rejected.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 235.

A "mill" and the house of Weyntje Elbers, widow of Aert Willemsen, a brewer, are mentioned in the records as being on her lot "on the Eastside of the Heere Street" (now No. 42 Broadway).—Min. of Orph. Court, I: 210. For particulars about this property, once owned by Andries Hude, see Castello Plan (C. Pl. 82e, Vol. II), and Key, Sec. C., No. 11, pp. 235-37, Vol. II.

Nominations are made by the burgomasters for a church-warden and an orphan-master, which they submit to Stuyvesant and the council for candidate state. Martin van Cortlandt is elected for the burgomaster, the city having made a vacancy in the orphan-masters court, and made the choice of a new member of that bench necessary; and Hendrick Jansen vander Vin had completed his term as a church-warden, and so was to be superseded. The provincial authorities, on the 16th, elected Pieter Wapenhartsen van Couwenhoven as an orphan-master; no choice was made of a church-warden by them before March 30, and on April 7 a commission was delivered to Gevert Lockerman.—Min. of Orph. Court, I: 130-31, 155, 152; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 235. See also April 7, 1662.

Jacques Cortelyou, the city's treasurer, appears before the burgomasters of New Amsterdam and is asked what his "charges for making the City map" amount to. He replies, he is willing to leave the amount to be fixed by the city officials, but volunteers the information that, if made" in Holland, "such a map would bring 100 rykoldalers," about $100. Whereupon, the burgomasters allow him, "for making the map and other services for the City 100 fl. in heavy money," or about $40. A week earlier (March 3), Jacob van de Water, a draughtsman, had been "allowed by the Burgomasters for making the map of this City, according to bill for 96 fl. in beavers, the usual price for a map." This important survey of the city by Cortelyou had been finished by the end of the year 1661 (see Dec.), when he had banded the data to the draughtsman. On Jan. 26, 1662, Cortelyou was summoned by the burgomasters to the city hall, where, upon interrogation, he informed them that he had finished his work and that the material had "already been in the hands of van der Veen for 6 weeks," who promised "to have it ready this week," being the end of January. The name "van der Veen" in the record is clearly a slip of the pen by the secretary or clerk for "van de Water."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 124, 129, 150. See also, summary of the Dutch Period, II: 91; description of the Duke's Plan, I: 209-9; and Castello Plan, II: 209 et seq.

A list of lands at New Haerlem at this date is entered in the court records; it shows the name of each owner, with the number of morgens of land possessed by each. The highest number of morgens held by any one person is 24. J. Pietersen Out, Daniel Tietemaer, Lubbert Gerrietsen, and P. Kaue each hold this number. Dominique Zipperus, the preacher, it is shown, has 18 morgens.—Harlem Records (original MSS.), I: 8 (N. Y. Pub. Library).

By a proclamation issued by Stuyvesant and the council on January 15, a day of general thanksgiving, fasting, and prayer in New Netherlands was named for March 10.
the Bailiff be charged and commanded not to execute any more Mar. judgments, until on notice given by the Court Messenger, the receipt is also produced." This is allowed, as it has been decreed by the provincial government.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 54.

The burgomasters, I. and Pieter Schuyt, say that one of the two court messengers of New Amsterdam, are ordered "to warn the arrested parties and notify them of the fine," when they serve persons with an attachment, in case the parties endeavour to "prove the arrest or run beyond the same without the consent of the Officer." (Schuyt)—Rec. N. Am., IV: 54.

Geertje Tenus (probably wife of Cors Jansen.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 354) is charged by the schout with having "tapped for Matteu, the negro of Heer Steenwyck on the 17th of this month, being a Day of Fasting," and he asks the court to deprive her "of her trade for one year and six weeks." She denies the charge, but Matthaeu says in his examination that he got drink from her and she took his money for it.Resolved Waldron testifies that the negro lies and has been forced to it by beating. It is alleged that Matthaeu got drunk "at another place." On the 28th, witnesses were examined, and the court dismissed the case for insufficient evidence, and ordered the negro to be "imprisoned for false accusation."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 51, 56-57.

The burgomasters resolve "to issue an order that no fruit market shall be held at the prescribed place and date."—Min. of Orph. Court, 173. The records do not reveal the purpose of this vote.

The citizens of New Amsterdam request the burgomasters for written instructions and make the following suggestions, viz., that the leather firebuckets be greased and cared for, that everybody who has powder in his house shall be ordered to take good care of it, to prevent disaster in case of a fire; that wells be made; that firebooks be procured and locations for them be designated; they also ask what they ought to do when a fire breaks out, since they have "nothing to show" that they are firemen, also what fines they may be allowed to impose; they request an order prohibiting anybody from using the firebuckets, "on pain of being fined," and they request to know "how much" they are "to receive for their lost time." The written instructions were issued on April 21 (q.v.).—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 132.

David Wessels and Frereich Arenzen report to the burgomasters that some people come from out of town to the city "asking for work or to make chair matting," who are "allowed to earn the wages." This, they say, deprives them as burgomasters of the city, who paid the city's taxes, from earning a "support for themselves and their families," and they ask for a prohibition of the intruders.—Min. of Orph. Court, I: 112-33.

Nicassius de Sille and Hendrick Jansen van Vinc, church-war- ders of New Amsterdam, were ordered by the council to go with Claes Mareschalk to repair the glass in the Church (in the fort which he undertook for a reasonable price," but now renders an unreasonable bill, which they exhibit to the court for examination. The glassier replies that he was "calculated according to the Church's instructions," and he "has no reason to let the licences in the arms in their proper places." The court appoints Cornelis Steen- wyck and Adolf Pietersen to reconcile, if possible, the parties in dispute.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 57. For earlier reference to the coats-of-arms in the windows, see Oct. 9, 1664; and July, 1768.

Oratam, chief of the Hackenschacks, and another chief, named Matrano, are authorized by the council of New Netherland to seize any brandy brought into their country for sale, and to seize the purveyors thereof, bringing them to New Amsterdam to be "punished as an example to others" in the hope of stopping this illicit rum traffic with the Indians.—N.Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 218-19; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 215.

The provincial council gives notice that the duties on goods exported to New England and Virginia will be sold to the highest bidder.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 236.

On March 10 (q.v.), the burgomasters nominated Joannes de Decker and Hendrick Jansen Vinc, as firewardens, submitting their names to Stuyvesant and the council, so that one of them might be elected and confirmed as a church-warden to succeed Hendrick Jansen van Vinc, whose term had expired. No choice was made then, so, on March 30, the burgomasters named Loockerman and Jan Vigne, from whom the provincial authorities commissioned Loockerman as a church-warden, Vinc, receiving permission from the burgomasters, "on behalf of the Church, to take away the box in the City Hall," which is granted. He was also ordered, on April 12, "to make ready his accounts of the Church revenues and expenditures as soon as possible and submit them to the Burgomasters." This report he delivered on the 21st, "as more fully may be seen by the bills filed in this City Hall." The burgomasters, and those of the two other towns, held a meeting on the 25th of this month, to consider the report presented by the burgomaster of New Amsterdam, to enter upon his duties.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 131, 134, 152, 153, 156, 152; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 235.

Jan de Pre acknowledges the sale of his house and house lot, "as well from farm land and garden, in New Haerlem to Willem de Montaigne, for one cow and fifteen gilders in seawax (wampum), the purchaser to pay for the survey. It is signed by both parties in autograph and witnessed by the hand of M. Zyperus, the clergyman.—Hermel Records (original MSS.), I: 14 (N.Y. Pub. Library).

A minute is entered in the council minutes relating to Stuy- vensant's visit to and return from the Esopus country, now Kingston, N. Y.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 236.

The "Corporation for the propagation of the gospel in New England and places adjacent in America" is established.—Wisnor, op. cit., V: 169.

The city court grants permission to Anna Claess Crousow, widow of Daniel Litscho, "to sell by the Bailiff some books" in her possession and the property of Sir Henry Moody, Bart., she having a lien on them "for a considerable sum."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 64. It would be interesting to know the titles of the books in this sale.

On March 23, Gerrit Hendricksen petitioned the provincial government for a renewal of his lease of the revenue of the weigh-house for another year, which was granted. Now the council farm the weigh-house to him again, but with some alterations in the conditions.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 241, 246.

"David du Four" (David de Voo) acknowledges acceptance of the post of herder of cows in New Haerlem, to begin on the 21st of this month.—Hermel Records (original MSS.), I: 16 (N.Y. Pub. Library). Action was brought, on May 11, against "David de Voor" in the New Haerlem inferior court, because of the damage sustained by the town through not properly performing his duties, and because the town has to expend more to replace him. His answer was that he was beguiled by sweet words into taking the job, but did not want it. He was condemned to pay to the town the amount in excess of his own contract to which the town was put by his failure.—Ibid., I: 19. See April 29, 1662.

The residents along the great canal (now Broad Street), "between the first bridge and the shore"—meaning, apparently, from the Brouwers Brugh (present Stone Street) to the East River (now Pearl Street)—are directed "not to put earth beyond the posts set, and to improve the street," so that people can "drive their carriages" in the street. Joannes Vanlotter and Coenraet ten Eyck are appointed overseers by the burgomasters, to "further this work."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 172-73.

On March 24 (q.v.), the fire-wardens requested from the burgomasters written instructions with respect to their duties and pre- paratives. These are now adopted by the burgomaster and may be summarized as follows: (1) They are to see that "no more roofs" are "covered with reeds nor the old ones repaired, under a penalty of 6 fl."

(2) "That no wooden or plastered chimneys" are built in the city, "and to condemn those which may have remained," having them "torn down in a prescribed time under a fine of 8 fl. for each time" their orders are disobeyed; (3) They are to fine householders whose chimneys are foul; (4) To see that "the ladders and fire-buckets" are not used by the inhabitants, and fine those who do use them; (5) They are obliged "to go to a fire with a black staff with three crosses" (from the city arms), as their insignia of office, and to suffer a fine of three gilders for the benefit of the schout if they fail; (6) It is their duty "to make an inspection at least every three months," to observe if the fire-buckets are in their proper places at the points designated for their deposit, and to have those which are damaged "brought to the City Hall," to be repaired by order of the burgomasters; (7) They are to watch "that the porters of the Weighhouse and the beer carriages, as well as the grainmeasurer," go to fires and remain there "until the fire is out or as long as the Firewardens deem it advisable, and those who fail are to be fined; (8) They are required to see to it "that no little fires" are "made outside the houses," as "hot ashes would in sum- mary cause a conflagration;" (9) For their services, the fire-wardens are to receive all the fines provided for in their instructions.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 135, 136-37.

Reyer Cornelissen van Soestbergen, a prisoner held for alleged theft, answering certain interrogatories in court, declares he "bought from a negro by the new Bridge the sack of grain" which he threw "in the water by the Cropile bushes," but did not know the negro subsequently he had intended "to bring the grain to the mill and sat so long on the piggy behind Tomas Hall's until he removed it thence." It developed in the case that the schout demanded of the court that the prisoner be heard further, "after having been subjected to Torture on the rack.

Rec. N. Am. IV. 26
On the 28th, the prisoner pleaded guilty on four points, and was condemned by the court to be brought "to the place where criminal justice is usually executed and there to be tied to a stake, severely scourged, branded and banished out of this City's jurisdiction for the term of ten years," and "further in the costs and fines of justice." The punishment was administered the next day (29th).—Rec. IV: 68-70.

Jan Cooco (Cogu, or Koku) and Moenia Petersen acknowledged that they have engaged from this day to attend as herdmen of cows and oxen belonging to the town of New Haeremaun, until "a fortnight after All Saints day." They are to be paid 50 guilders in seawart, and half a pound of butter for each milk cow, of which 50 guilders are payable five weeks from date and the remaining 300 guilders on the expiration of their term.—Harlem Records (original MSS.), I: 15 (N. Y. Pub. Library). See also April 20, 1662.

Without the alteration of a word, Charles II signs a charter for Connecticut which has been prepared by the colonists. No other charter was ever more highly appreciated, or ever more prodigiously used by the English monarch.

This charter provided for the union of the colonies of Connecticut and New Haven. The leading men of the latter were opposed to the union and resisted the charter until 1665.—Winor, op. cit. III: 334.

On the 6th, the court of City Councils, at Amsterdam, and the city of New Amsterdam, at New York, met, to consider the project of a canal from the Hudson river to the sea. The court of City Councils was composed of 25 members, and the city of New Amsterdam of 30. The court of City Councils was composed of 25 members, and the city of New Amsterdam of 30.

May 28
A. Van Coeren, a Dutch merchant, is ordered to appear before the court of City Councils, at Amsterdam, to give an account of his voyages to the East Indies, for which he was discharged by the court of City Councils, at Amsterdam, to give an account of his voyages to the East Indies.

June 2
Concierge Matthijs de Vos reports to the burgomasters concerning a dispute between him and Secretary Joannes Nevius about "the fees for selling goods at auction." Both lay claim to these perquisites; but they submit their differences voluntarily to the burgomasters for a decision, and these decide that the fees should be equally divided between the two. Both sides are satisfied and thank the board.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 144.

Egbert van Borum, late ferry-man, petitions the provincial council for compensation due him for ferrying over the East River several persons on the 16th, and for having been paid 50 guilders.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 237. See June 1, 1624; May 25, 1624.

The burgomasters order "a warrant to be issued to the Treasurer to collect the tax on chimneys August 1, agreeably to the Ordinance of July 17, 1663, and to give notice to all persons of the assessment; and to have the tax assessed on the 1st of August."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 147.

Annetje Smits, wife of Hendrick Jansen Smit, is hailed to court by the schout, who charges her with tapping on Sunday during the prehanging hours, contrary to law. She is fined "six guilders for the poor."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 102, 163. See also May 26, 1662; July 25, 1663.

The tavern was at No. 52 Bridge St. See Feb. 1, 1647.

Adriaen Vincent is ordered by the burgomasters to pay the renewal of his burgerright, because he has been in the country and absent from the city of New Amsterdam. He pleads with
The question is raised by the burgomasters whether a man who has married in New Amsterdam the daughter of a burgess may also enjoy the burgheeright without paying for it. "After some discussion," they decide in the affirmative, on condition, however, that the person give "notice of it within six weeks after marriage."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 158.

The shippers of furs are given notice by the provincial council to send in a return of what they have shipped in the vessels about to sail. Two days later, another notice was given to them to send their furs, within 24 hours, aboard the vessels about to sail, and, on Sept. 6, a warrant was issued to the farmers of certain export duties to search the sailing vessels.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 24.

Previous edicts against Conventicles and prohibited assemblies are not obeyed as the provincial government desires, so now the ordinance is renewed and enlarged upon. Only "the Reformed worship and service" are legal; all others are inhibited. The law reads: "no Conventicles or meetings shall be held in any town or place within the colony whatever the province it be in houses, barns, ships, barracks, nor in the Woods nor fields upon forfeiture of fifty guildens for the first time for every person wether man or woman or child, that shall have been present in such prohibited meetings, and twice as much for every person, whether he be man or woman or child that has exerted or taught in such prohibited assemblies, or shall have lent his house barn or any place to that purpose; for ye second time twice as much; for the third time four times as much, and arbitary punishment besides."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 15.

The directors at Amsterdam are inclined to a "total abolition of the military" in New Netherland, placing "reliance on the inhabitants alone for the offensive and defensive maintenance" of the province. Smyrnyess and the council see in such a policy only disaster. They show how feeble the military establishment is, as follows: "Your Honors have seen from the list sent over last year, how many soldiers remained them in the service and how they were distributed, namely, secondarily your honor, 12 at Fort Orange [Albany], 12 to 14 at Fort Altena on the South [Delaware] river, indeed few enough in our poor opinion considering the multitude of barbarians, who visit the distant places daily, 25 men at the Esopus [Kingston], whom we have relieved while writing this by 6 or 8 men from the garrison here [Fort Amsterdam], on account of warnings from other savages, that the Esopus savages had threatened to attack some of our people there during seeding time in revenge for the savages sent to Curaçao [see May 21, 1660], 6 men on Staten-Island for the safety of the few inhabitants there, the balance of about 70 to 80 remain for the reasons given in our former letter here in winter, for the savages have been discharged since and several more will be sent home discharged by the ships, now about to sail, so that not more than 60 or 70 remain here in garrison as a reserve troop for any arising emergencies; altogether they do not number over one hundred men who can cause any trouble here."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 152.

They tell the directors in Holland that, if they had from their own experience "a perception of the interests, losses, sudden attacks, unexpected murders, mandaughters, different incendary fires, happened to the inhabitants," they would rather grant more military assistance than design to take away the inadequate number of soldiers now in the province, who are scattered in small contingents.—N. Y., Col. Doc., XIII: 223-24.

Surgeon Jacob Huges produces a judgment before the burgomasters against Lodowycck Po, captain of the rattle-watch (night patrol), and requests that his rattle-watch tax be liquidated by a garnishee of the salary of Po, the burgomasters say it cannot be done, "except with the consent of the debtor," and that the "City's property" cannot be attached.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 153.

The burgomasters resolve "that henceforth" there shall be in New Amsterdam "two market days in the week, to wit Tuesday and Saturday," and "the city's property is to the common sale and sell their wares."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 156.

A number of cases have come up in the court at this time about faulty bread baked by the bakers of New Amsterdam, so the city court decrees that the schout or prosecuting officer shall "go around once every week," but at no stated day, in company with "two or more other bakers of baked bread," to discover the guilty bakers. This order is delivered to him in "writing," and he promises "to do so."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 111.
the partner, who in turn has sold the share to Albert Albertsen.

His partner, who bought it, according to agreement thereon, to Jacobus Bakker, Govert Lockermans, Jacques Cousseau, and Hendrick van de Water. Albertsen gave "an assignment of four hundred guilders" on van de Water, and feared he might not get his own. He therefore requests the city court to direct "the Court Messenger to attach the money," which being allowed, he asks that the attachment "be declared valid" until it is found to whom the most belongs. The court so declares.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 139.

On Nov. 17, Asse Levy and Eghbert Meindersen, sworn butchers, again told the burgomasters that their pay for slaughtering was insufficient, and were allowed an increase in certain prescribed cases. —Min. of Orph. Court, II: 163, 165. See Oct. 31, 1665.

Upon the request of Joost Goderius, the foreman of the porters, at about a weigh-house in New Amsterdam, the burgomasters decide that the porters shall each pay eight stuivers weekly into the common fund. Those who are "unwilling" are to be assessed "twice as much." This is the common fund established for the benefit of the porters in case of illness, etc.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 165–66.

Schout Tenneeman requests the city court to allow him "to place Francois de Bruyn in prison in the City Hall," as he has defaulted in a judgment recently rendered against him. The court directs the schout to confine the prisoner "in a respectable tavern." —Rec. N. Am., IV: 160.

Pieter Tonneman, the city schout, on Oct. 26, petitioned the provincial government for an increase of his fees and arrests, and to be allowed to "agree and compound for all civil and criminal cases up to one hundred guilders." This is now granted to him by apostil, "on condition that he render every month precisely, correct account and reliqua to the City, Poor and Church, of what share or portion" belongs to each. The petition and apostil thereon were ordered to be entered upon the court minutes of the city court, on Jan. 23, 1663, as of record.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 187, 188; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 242.

The burgomasters inform Lodowycck Bos, captain of the rattle-watch, that his men are not going about at night "to their proper places for calling," the hours, and that the people on Pearl Street have lodged a complaint about it. Bos replies that "they always call at the first entrance of Pearl Street" (apparently at the present State and Whitehall Sts.), but do not go farther because the residents beyond are unwilling to pay the watch tax, so are not entitled to the service. The burgomasters simply tell him to see that they make "their rounds properly." —Min. of Orph. Court, II: 164.

Lubbert Gerritsen acknowledges the sale of his lot No. 8 on the north side of the village of New Haerlem, with the housing garden, to Jan Louken (Dayto), in the manner he had purchased the same from Matijjs Boon, and that for the sum of 300 guilders, in seawant.—Harlem Records, (original MSS.), I: 33 (N. Y. Pub. Library).

The court of schepens of the village of New Haerlem appoints and authorizes Jan P. Slot as surveyor [wijzmeester], for the welfare and security of the village, engaging also all carpenters from setting up any fences or building in the absence of the surveyor.—Harlem Records, (original MSS.), I: 34.

This day the village officials of New Haerlem make the following minute in their records: "Posted a notice [for the benefit of the inhabitants], that the fences be put up on the northside of the village within fourteen days, subject to a fine of two pounds Flemish" for dereliction.—Harlem Records, (original MSS.), I: 34.

Symon Durwig and Mecius Pietersen are appointed fence viewers of the village of New Haerlem, and it is ordered that persons in default of fencing be fined three guilders for each dereliction.—Harlem Records, (original MSS.), I: 34. On Dec. 16, it was decided to have an inspection of fences on Dec. 18.—Ibid. This fence viewing resulted in a number of prosecutions in the court of schepens.—Ibid., II: 35, 36, 18.

Daniel Toureur is chosen as warden of the church and fire-warden of the village of New Haerlem in the place of Jan Lunamontge, Jr.—Harlem Records, (original MSS.), I: 34.

A curious form of installment payment of the burgomasters appears in the case of a man who was sworn in as a member of the rattle-watch or night police, but whose burgomaster fees have not been paid. He has some one of the butchers and inhabitants to assist him, provided that a sworn butcher is "present at the slaughtering." They are "not allowed to take an assistant from outside this jurisdiction," unless they first inform the burgomasters thereof and report to the secretary of the city. The sworn butchers are allowed fees, as follows: For an ox or cow, 5 florins; for a calf or pig, 2 florins; for a sheep or goat, 1 florin, and smaller animals in proportion.

Willem Jansen, the Bergen-Manhattan ferry-man (see Dec. 22, 1661), complains against the Bergen officials that they have told the community there that every inhabitant of the place can keep a barge and ferry, whereupon these officials are summoned to appear before Stuyvesant and the council "to give an account of their action." They appeared on Jan. 4, 1662, and countercharged that Jansen "had refused to carry over," which prompted them to act, but Jansen said he only refused to serve "those who would not pay." The Bergen schout "was directed to assist the ferryman" in securing his payments for service, and, if he acted unbecomingly, to report him to the provincial authorities, who would "then issue such orders, as occasion may require."—Ibid., XIII: 324, 325. This was the ferry known as the Common-paw ferry. See also June 25, 1669.

The constant depreciation of wampum as an exchange in New Netherland, after repeated correspondence between the provincial government and the directors at Amsterdam, leads to the promulgation of another ordinance for regulating the currency, which is the last act of the kind passed during the Dutch régime. It is found that the depreciation is so great "that 20, yea, even by some, 24 guineas are now ordinarily paid for one Beaver." Moreover, the directors at Amsterdam have often in dispatches, and especially in a letter of Dec. 22, 1660, ordered the reduction of payment made in New Netherland "to the Company's servants in Wampum or Beaver, to the value of Holland money," and the council find themselves obliged, "in order that the Company's servants may receive in some degree an equivalent of Holland money, again to reduce the Wampum, at the Company's counting house [Pearl near Broad St.], from 16 to 24 White, or 12 Black [beads], for one silver, and to disburse it at that rate on the first of January next, to the Company's Servants in payment of Monthly wages and Board money, and as regards Beaver, to continue to pay out, provisionally, until further Order, at 7 guineas, in payment of Monthly wages and board money."—Laws & Ord. N. Yth., 433-34. See Dec. 22, 1659; Oct. 28, 1662; and Jan. 20, 1664.

Three negro women, slaves, petition Stuyvesant and the council to be manumitted, which is granted to them on condition that one of them shall come weekly to do Stuyvesant's housework.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 242.

During this year, the West India Company's ship, the "Arms of Amsterdam," on her way from Guinea to New Netherland with a cargo of negro slaves, was captured in the West Indies by an English privateer, Robert Downman, and carried into Virginia. Stuyvesant and the council sent Jan de Decker at the head of an embassy to Virginia, to remonstrate and reclaim the slaves.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 254, 259; N. Y. Col. Docs., II: 218. The proceedings had upon this complaint are in the Records of the General Court of Virginia, No. 2, and a transcript thereof, made in 1847, is published by the Historical Society of Virginia, X: 249.

On March 13, the ordinance was "published from the City Hall after the usual ringing of the bell three times." It referred to a former ordinance of the director-general and council, renewed on Oct. 21, 1665 (p. 214), that the first minute new enactment gave the two inspectors authority "to go around among the bakers," at will, but, "at least once a week," to see that the bread baked was "of good material and due weight," and just as the flour came from the mill, "unmixed with or other stuff amongst it." Unpaid or overdue bread was to be seized and the guilty baker to be fined; the schout was "authorized duly to proceed against the contraverter of the law."—Ibid., IV: 214-15.

This ordinance resulted in a petition from the bakers of the city, who averred they could not comply with it without loss, unless the price of bread was raised to the consumer. The burgomasters and schepmen, on March 23, agreed upon a new assize of bread; but the increase was still unsatisfactory to the bakers, who named higher prices. The city fathers met them half way, and a revised rate was fixed upon on April 17 (q. v.), to wit: wheaten loaves of eight pounds at 26 stuivers; rye loaves of equal weight at 22 stuivers, and white loaves of two pounds at 12 stuivers.—Ibid., IV: 217, 218, 220, 224.

Pierre Pié, a Frenchman from Picardy, conducts a tavern in New Netherland, at a house owned by Joannes Verelen, on the north side of Marketfield St., at the east corner of New St. See Cal. Landmarks, Plan, II: 359. Stuyvesant and the council find they have received a "false warrant," and the council find a false warrant, and the council find a warrant of apprehension for Pié, "protected by the Governor," receives him in the city court with " publishing of the watch and in conducting himself irregularly, both in making noise and other insolvences."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 175; 179-80, 180-87. See 1660.

On Jan. 30, Schout Toneman recommended to the burgomasters and schepenen the nomination of new members of the city court. On Feb. 1, they made the nominations in the presence of Cornelis van Ruyven, as representative of the provincial government, and now, on the 2d, Stuyvesant and the council elect from the nominees the new members of the bench, who take the oath. The "first [eleven] of the bench," which are installed by Councilor Jan Ross de Deckel, he having been especially commissioned to act in the case. —Rec. N. Am., IV: 194-97; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 244.

Those in the employ of the West India Co. in New Netherland are enjoined from receiving payments of wages on account, unless they have as much as three months' wages due to them. The order prohibiting advance payments arose from the discovery that some of the employees, "by their troublesome and importunate applications," had "received more than they were entitled to, in direct violation of the Order issued on the subject of payments. They are warned "not to importune or trouble the Receiver of Compensation, for money or goods, on pain of instant dismissal" from the service, and the disburser officers are made subject to the loss of a month's salary if they aid persons contrary to the act, and are to "be debited on their account" with all that they advance "to anyone contrary to this Order."—Laws & Ord. N. Yth., 435-36.

Paulus Leendertz received various applications to work as treasurer of New Amsterdam, in place of Allard Anthony. He received the books and papers of the financial administration of the city on March 2.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 168, 169.

A great earthquake is felt and heard throughout New Netherland, New England, Acadia, and Canada. For contemporaneous accounts of the phenomena, see notes by Henry C. Murphy on one of Selyni's poems, in Anthology of New Neth., 175, passim; also Broadhead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 709. Complaint is made to the provincial council by Johannes de la Montaigne, schout of New Haerlem, against divers persons for riot, committed in planting a May pole decorated with rags before the door of a newly-married couple, and by assembling around the house, "hornings," etc.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 244.

Nicholas Verlett receives a grant from Gov. Stuyvesant for a tract called Hobok (Hoboken).—N. J. Hist. Soc. Collections, I: 11.

Notice is given by the provincial council to Paulus van der Beecy, ferry-man, informing him that there have been "many complaints" against his service, because he does not "fulfil the conditions under which the Ferry" was leased to him, which is an inconvenience to those who need the service, and who often have to "wait half a day or night, before he carries them." He sends him as a recorder, a copy of the conditions to which he is amenable, and threatens, "if the complaints continue," to "let the said Ferry publicly to somebody else" at his expense. —Rec. N. Am., IV: 178.

Amsterdam, on Feb. 16, Stuyvesant and the council now elect Allard Anthony and Johannes van Brugh as members of the bench of the court of orphan-masters. Cornelis Steenwyck holds over as the third member of this court. — Min. of Orph. Court, II: 169, 170; Col. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 245.

Abraham Jansen, a carpenter, is requested by the burgomasters “to make a model or a plan for a sluice to be put in at Joggins the shoemakers.” — Min. of Orph. Court, II: 169-70. The reference is to Jochem Breekman, whose house was on the Heere Gracht, at what is now Broad, near Beaver St., where the Consolidated Exchange stands. See Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82, Block M, No. 9, and p. 29, Vol. II.

The inhabitants of the village of Harlem petition the provincial government for leave to pay for their lands in wampum, but Stuyvesant and the council order the commutation of the price of the lands into payment of tenths. — Col. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 245.

The newly named Brug Street (Bridge Street) is mentioned in a lease of the house of Antony Jansen van Fes (also known as Van Veen, and Van Salec, and sometimes called “Antony the Turk”). The house was on what is now Bridge St., between Whitehall and Broad Sts. The lessor was in “bound too hard to rent the house with good titles at his own expense.” — Min. of Orph. Court, II: 42. See Castello Plan II: 164, Nos. 12 and 15.

Catherina Ernsthings, widow of Hendrick Jansen Shuyter (called “Blue Coat”), receives a ground-brief for a house and lot on the south side of Wall St., west of William St., the ground now included in the site of the building of the United States Trust Co. at No. 26. — Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82, C.S., Vol. II, and II: 236; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, Vol. II, and II: 392.

1728
The provincial council resolves to reduce the military force and the number of civil servants in the province of New Netherland. — Col. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 245. As early as Dec. 24, 1660, the directors at Amsterdam had written to Stuyvesant and the council urging economy, advising them to “begin with the military establishment,” as they deemed it “utterly unnecessary to keep 250 soldiers in the service,” and directing them “to get rid of as many soldiers as possible.” — N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 487.

1729
Lodowyc Koos, as captain of the rattle-watch, is directed by the burgomasters to change every eight or fourteen days the pairs in which their men are to go about on duty, and to order them to arrest all persons who quarrel or are noisy “on the Strand” of the Hudson River and 36th north latitude, extending from the present Pearl Street; “to bring them to the City Hall and keep them there until the next day and then report to the Burgomasters through their Captain for punishment according to circumstances.” — Min. of Orph. Court, II: 171.

The captain of the rattle-watch or night police is informed by the burgomasters about complaints against him, because sometimes they fail to call out the hours for three or four hours at a stretch and are not keeping order in the city. — Min. of Orph. Court, II: 171.

1732
A new assize on bread is promulgated in New Amsterdam. — See summary under Jan. 9, 1663.

1736
Publication is made from in front of the city hall of renewed ordinance “forbidding the sale of beer or wine, or other drink or entertain panties on the Sabbath;” and further forbidding them “to draw any strong drink for the Indians or natives” of the province. — Rec. N. Am., IV: 225.

The burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam petition the provincial government for the removal of duties on exported liquors. Stuyvesant and the council order the removal of the export duty on beer brewed in New Netherland. — Col. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 246.

1737
Abraham Jansen receives permission from the provincial council to erect a water-mill near the Capskke in New Amsterdam (see Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 965), with the pledge that no one else shall be permitted to erect a similar mill on Manhattan Island. There is no recorded evidence of the execution of this right. — Col. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 246; O’Callaghan’s MS. Notes on Windmills, in N. Y. Hist. Soc.

An old and stilly ngress, Mayken by name, who has served as a slave of the West India Co. since 1628, petitions the provincial authorities for her manumission, which is granted. — Col. Hist., MSS., Dutch, 246.

The burgomasters determine to write a letter to Jacob Jansen Garderius, alias Kloeter, who lives at For Orange (Albany) ordering him to “line up the bank before his lot next to Daniel Litsco [Litscho], as his neighbours there suffer great damage, or else, if he fails to do it, it shall be done by the City and the expenses recovered from the lot.” — Min. of Orph. Court, II: 172. The reference is to the absentee owner’s neglected sheet-piling on the shore of the East River, his house being in the street with that of John Lawrence, afterwards a mayor under English rule, and with Litscho, the tavern-keeper. It was the street along the strand, now Pearl Street, south of Wall St. Kloeter’s absence and continued neglect led to the confiscation of the lot and its regreating, in 1667, to Balbier de Haarte. — See Castello Plan, II: 326, Nos. 10 and 11.

Adolf Pietersen and Aldert Coninck are appointed by the burgomasters as “buymasters” or overseers, “to see that the High [now Stony] Street be properly made higher and passable,” and “the people living on High Street” are “directed, each to raise and improve the street before his house and lot.” — Min. of Orph. Court, II: 172. On May 25, the burgomasters again directed these overseers “to do their duty in improving the street.” — Ibid., II: 174.

1739
A land ordinance, passed by the provincial government, recites a strange violation of former laws regarding land tenure. It shows that on Manhattan Island, Long Island, and in other places, land, that was granted with the understanding that it was to be improved, still lies “wild, waste, unoccupied and unfenced;” moreover many tracts of land are “also abandoned and stripped of their Fences by the Proprietors,” who, none the less, reclaim the lands whenever another seeks to do so. The ordinance was promptly revoked, and it is looked upon by the government as a “serious damage of the Public,” an “obstruction of Agriculture,” and therefore a “loss of the Honourable Company’s long expected Tents and other Revenues.” Another ordinance is now directed to stop these abuses. All grants of lands within the province, for which tenths are long due and which are unimproved, are notified “to fence in and improve, within the term of six months, the lands they lay claim to,” or suffer forfeiture of the land for the behoof of the company, the same to be again disposed of “for the public benefit.” — Laws & Ord. N. Y., Neth., 1738-39, 193-94.

In a criminal case, the burgomasters and schepens adjudge that Jasper Abrahamsen shall be brought to the place where criminal justice is usually executed, be bound to a stake and severely flogged, and the Hangman shall make a gash in his left cheek or jaw lest the blood flow; further he shall be banished for the term of five and twenty years from this City’s jurisdiction and be condemned in the costs and issues of justice, which the prisoner shall have to pay before being released from confinement.

A similar sentence is pronounced against Hendric Jansen, “which two foregoing judgments are put into execution, according to ancient customs his mind of May.” Abrahamsen was a native of Amsterdam and sailmaker of the ship “The Purnemaker Church,” and Jansen was cooper of the ship and a native of “Attendurg” in the Haren District [Attendorn, in Land Hadeln] near Hamburg. — Their offences, for which these punishments were inflicted, were as follows: They violently went about in several houses demanding food and drink, taking what they could seize, beating and abusing people, not even respecting women. They then entered the house of George Wolsey, demanding drink, but were thrown out by Wolsey himself, attended by Elias Doughty and Richard Cornell, and continued their escapades at the house of Charles Bridges (Carl van Brugge), another Englishman, by whom they were likewise ejected. Jansen also profaned the precincts of Dominie Druisen's house and assaulted people in the public streets, and perpetrated other villanies, which were adjudged to be intolerable "in a well regulated place and city such as this is, where justice is administered. The case was a very important one in the annals of the Dutch settlement.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 231-35.

8 Isaac Grevenraut buys the house and outbuilding of Michael Talens "on the Strand near Capeken," with the intention of moving the house, if possible, to another lot "on the Strand near the Fort, near the house of Jan Eversen Bouts."—Miss. of Orph. Court, II: 45. For the Talens property, see Castello Plan, II: 275 (Block G, No. 4), and for the Grevenraut property, see ibid., II: 275 (Block H, No. 1). The two plans (see also and Mark Mair, Red. Key, III: 606) are shown very well on the Castello Plan, extending around the southern end of Manhattan Island, beginning just beyond Stuyvesant's house and extending around to the Beaver Path, near the wind-mill. Grevenraut's and Bouts' properties were on Stuyvesant's Hook (mentioned in the De Selle List, Vol. II). This was one of the earliest mentions of an attempt at house-moving found in the records.

17 A provincial ordinance prohibits slippers, top captains, and others from bringing within the jurisdiction of New Netherland any Vagabonds, Quakers, and other Fugitives, whether Men or Women, without having first received permission from the government.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 433-40.

Because Warnaar Weisels, the factor of duties on exports and imports, has made several complaints against the prevalence of smuggling, he is authorized to visit or cause to be visited, in his discretion, all departing Vessels subject to the payment of Duties, if the vessels have remained in port over night.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 441.

The burgomasters resolve that, "Whereas the Heere Graft [great canal, now Broad Street] has by the Burgomasters and Rulers of this City been put in good condition by making a good lock and repairing the old one, that it may retain the water to prevent the unbearable stench at low water and whereas said graft is very foul and muddy, therefore the burgomasters direct every resident along the same to dig out and carry away two feet in depth of the mud and the overseers of the graft are ordered to have the same done"—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 441.

On the same day, Tryntje van Campen sues the burgomasters to appoint her husband as "lock-tender." She is told that no salary is attached to the position, because the city receives "no revenue from the lock.”—Miss. of Orph. Court, II: 175, 176. See also May 26, and June 4, 1662.

The Indian massacre known as the Second Esopus War was begun on this date. The Indians made "an unexpected, sudden attack" on the settlers near Esopus (now Kingston, Ulster County, N. Y.), attended by murder and arson. It is timed to take place when but few men were in the village of Wiltwyck, while they were at work in the fields. In this village two dwellings were burned, eighteen persons, men, women, and children, were murdered, and ten others were carried off into captivity. The village itself, afterwards called Hurley, was "burned to the ground and its inhabitants were mostly taken prisoners or killed."—N.Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 245-47, 256-57. Doc. Hist. N. Y. 40 (to ed.), IV: 25, 26.

The execution of Freryck Flippen, as mortgagor, having obtained a judgment against Jacob Wolfbertsen Couwenhoven, asks the burgomasters for permission to levy on and sell "the brewing utensils" of Couwenhoven, but is told to submit his request to the full bench of the city court. This he did on the 12th, demanding by way of justification that the defense proved "the brewing materials, hypothecated to his predecessor and subsequently to him," might "be sold by execution to obtain his pay therefrom." Couwenhoven answered that he had no objection to the account, judgment, and mortgage, but that some silverware was in Flippen's hands "as a pledge," and that his dwelling-house and the brewery and its contents had already been "adverted for sale on the 2d July next"—for the satisfaction of creditors. Flippen expressed content, "on condition of getting the first money" from the sale; but the court adjudged that he should wait, "saving his action in case of preference or concurrence." On July 5, Flippen requested the court for an "act of authority to the Marshal to sell the dwelling house, the brewery, brew vat and brewery apparatus pledged to Freryck Flippen, mortgaged to Pieter Rudolphus, deed," and the court ordered the marshal "to put these in execution." On July 12, Couwenhoven told the court that the marshal had "been with him in Freryck Flippen's name to seize his brew kettle and brewing apparatus pledged to Freryck Flippen to sell them by execution." He was ordered to make his peace with Flippen.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 175-76.

Some persons having appropriated for their own use some of the fire-ladders which belong to the city, and having failed to return them, the burgomasters order the fire-wardens to institute a search for the missing ladders, and then found "to lock them up with the others at the prescribed place back of the City Hall and take good care of them." The fire-wardens are also authorized "to hire them out," on condition that the renter pay each time for the use of a ladder six stuivers for a repair fund.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 175-76.

The reference to the portrait of Stuyvesant is important; it was recognized by Mr. Palsmit in 1912, and was pointed out in the Iconography, II: 95-96, as a "hitherto unnoticed reference," being "the earliest mention of portrait painting in what is now the state of New York." The probability of the known portrait of Stuyvesant owned by the N. Y. Hist. Soc. being the identical portrait painted by Couturier was also suggested. See July 1768, for Du Simiètre's note about the Stuyvesant portrait, then in his son's house in New York.

New information on this subject has recently been brought to light by Dr. A. Brees. At a meeting of the literary section of the Koninklijke Academie van Wetenschappen, in Amsterdam, on June 2, 1919, he read a paper on "Two unknown painters," one of them being "Hendrick Couturier de Jonge" (a name spelled variously in the records), from which a full abstract is given herewith. The younger Couturier was the son of a father with the same given name, who distinguished himself by "de Oude" or senior. According to the denizens' book of the city of Leyden, the father came "from the land of Limburgh," and was a limner. The son was recorded as a "young man from Leyden," where undoubtedly he was born, although absolutely nothing is known of his life. loon Church book calls him "Hart Couiturier, peinte de Leyde."

12 Also in the year 1648, the St. Lucas Guild of Leyden was founded, and one of the first names enrolled was that of Couiturier. On Nov.
17, 1648, as "St. Hendrick Couiturier de Jonge," and as a cambel or grain merchant (geef greesezeden), he is recorded as making, before a notary, a mutual testament with his wife, "Elyas-beth Coppin," their home being "oue the Coopertsgracht," in Leyden. On Sept. 6, 1649, he hired a house and lot in Leyden, from the organist Eustatus Parisius, but before the end of that year, he had gone to the City," as is registered in the name in 13 On account of the Indian war at the Esopus, "most of the soldiers in garrison" at New Amsterdam having been sent to Wilwyck (now Kingston), it becomes necessary for the burgomasters to provide a proper watch over the city, and they therefore direct the captains and principal officers of the trainbands or militia to see to it "that henceforth every evening a non-commissioned officer with a sufficient number of men with hand and side arms" shall go on guard for the night at the Land gates," and that sentinels shall be posted and the rounds made until further orders are issued.

—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 178. On June 22, Lodowycck Pos, the "Marshall, issued to each Burgh Company fifty pounds of powder, altogether one hundred and fifty," for the three companies.

14 In a letter to the magistrates of Fort Orange, Stuyvesant mentions the Indian depredations at Esopus, and says he "arrived in the village of Wiltwyck [now Kingston] at about 6 o'clock" (on the previous day), that he intended going to Fort Orange to bring about the ransom of "the forty-five captured women and children," held by the Esopus savages through help from either the Mohawks or the Senecas. But he could not find a ship and, moreover, was forced to change his plans, he says, because the yachts going to Manhattan, by "bringing the pitiful tidings ..., would throw everything into dismay there." He felt obliged on that account to hasten his return to Manhattan and "make there arrangements" for the relief of Esopus. He also gave orders that thenceforth no yacht should sail up or down the Hudson River "by itself, unless well manned, to prevent possible surprizes."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 249-50. On June 19, another order required that all yachts coming from the north "must touch at Esopus, to get news from there, under a penalty of 50 guilders for dereliction."—Ibid., XIII: 254.

15 The people on Staten Island are informed by the provincial council concerning the recent depredations by the Indians at Esoopus, and that the General Assembly found it to the good while yet are urged on their guard and "to keep good watch;" also, two soldiers are sent to them.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 248.

18 The court of burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam considers a "petition of the beer tasters," who ask permission to "sell the Varn [4 mengel or about 5 quart] of beer for sixteen stivers" (32 cents). The court allows them to sell at "fourteen stivers and no more."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 260. On the 26th, the court orders the "school" to "take strict attention to this and to impose a fine fixed thereon upon the tasters, who take more than four stivers for the tun of beer."—Ibid., IV: 268-69. But on Oct. 9, the tavern-keepers petitioned the provincial council for leave to charge 16 st. and this was granted.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch,

19 The inhabitants of New Netherland are warned by proclamation to "take care of their person," and the duty of examining and turning over only in parties of 4 or 5 persons, with provided arms proper. The precaution was necessary on account of the Indian masses at the Esopus, and the consequent "condition of the country."
—Lanx & Ord. N. Neth., 444.

20 Lodowycck Pos, who has been captain of the rattle-watch or night police, is now in command of three burgheer companies of militia, with the title of "Marshall" or provost marshal. On July 10, four members of the rattle-watch were summoned before the burgomasters and informed that the "Trainbands," or three burgher companies, had "takeo the place of the Rattlewatch;"
therefore these men entered the service in the militia.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 179-80.

plunder and all the savages, whom they could capture," in "order to induce some of the English to take part in the expedition to 22 Stuyvesant and the council, at Fort Amsterdam, issue a proclamation calling for "sufficient" or "an offensive and defensive war against the . . . Esopus savages," enlistment to be "for a year or a year and a half or longer, until the same shall be destroyed." The usual soldier's pay is offered, also "free plundering," possess of captured Indians, "exemption from tithes for 6 years," and compensation for injuries and loss of eyes or limbs.—N. Y.

23 Marten Cregier informs the city court that he has been favoured by Stuyvesant and the council with "the Captain-Lieutenancy in the service of the Ho[166 West India Company], and therefore now comes" to take his leave of the Burg of Burg-omasters and Schepens of the City and at the same time to deliver Burgomaster van Cortlant the City Seal and the Key of the Chest of Deposits." On July 3, the city council resolved "to invite, by the Court messenger in the name of Schout, Burgomasters and Schepens, for next Thursday [July 5], at nine o'clock in the forenoon, thirteen of the ablest men, who had been former burgomasters or schepens, to gather at "the City Hall, in the manner of a Common Council (Vroetschap) . . . to lay before them the letter" of Stuyvesant and the council, "and to deliberate together and consider, whether 25 @ 30 men could not be encouraged to serve in time of need as a replacement to this or other place requiring assistance, on receipt of five guilders per day for the expedition, and in addition the privilege and benefit of exemption from watch, chimney money and tiths for the term of six years; and to hear their advice thereupon." The city bench, however, in view of the prospects for a burgomaster and Pieter Wolpertsen van Couvenhoven's resignation (on July 3) from the office of schepen, to join Cregier's company as lieutenant, deemed it expedient that these vacancies should be filled. The court made double nominations in the usual manner, on July 3, and the two places were filled on the 5th by Stuyvesant and the council.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 268, 275-77. The letter of Stuyvesant and the council referred to above (dated July 2—see text ibid., IV: 274-76) was inspired by the Indian troubles at Esopus and a fear of further Indian depredations in other villages, or even on Manhattan Island. The city fathers and former burgomasters and schepens met January 25 to "savings a bountiful and considerable sum of money for an expedition . . . ."—Ibid., IV:
270.

24 Schout Tonemen asks the city court to commend Lysbet Auckers, who has "presumed to sell and tap with unstacked whole and half muzies [a muzie = 4 of a bottle] and with a beer can, to be found under size, thereby abusing and affronting Jan JeUisen and bystanders, saying she will not let them stamp any more than she pleases and also to be no more obliged to use, than what she daily makes use of." For "her stubbornness, unmarked measures and under sized can," the schout demands she be fined 25 guilders and costs, "on condition of allowing the unstacked cans, mutzes and half mutes in her house to be marked, on a line thereunto affixed" (sic). She replies that "the can belongs to Paulus Heimans and that he placed it in her house, and that she locked up the unstacked mutzes, with which she has not tapped."
The court orders her "to prove that the seized can belongs to Paulus Heimans and that she has no other than stamped measures in her house or to make them unteasurable." Rec. N. Am., IV: 265-66. On Oct. 23, she was again hailed before the court, as "Lysbet Ackermans," charged with having "tapped brandy for two soldiers and beer for two Indians on Sunday." She admitted having drawn beer for the Indians, but said "it was before the church, and she did not travel in the roads of the city," and denied tapping brandy "for the soldiers at this time." She was fined ten guilders.—Ibid., IV: 320.

25 Proposals are made by Stuyvesant and the council at Fort Amsterdam to sacrifice the Hackensack, Nyack, Staten Island, and other Indians in an attempt to pacify against the Esopus Indians.

26 Warning is given that "about 20 to 25 Esopus savages have left their fort 3 or 4 days ago," intending "to come down here [about Manhattan] and get prisoners or some Dutchmen."

JUNE 27

People are cautioned, therefore, not to go into the fields or along roads during the present time精通大意：

Burgomaster Martin Cregier is commissioned by Stuyvesant and the council as "Captain-Lieutenant over all our military, to command the same agreeably to the instructions already given or hereafter to be given, to drill, to march them up and down and have them commanded, drilled and marched up and down by other, his subaltern officers, as the situation and circumstances of affairs shall require it for the best of the Company and the greater safety of the country," and to have full direction of the military affairs when Stuyvesant, the "Captain-General," is absent. Cregier takes the oath and receives his "provisional instructions."

At the same time the oath is taken by Lieutenants Nicholas Stillwell, and by Pieter Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven, "Captain-Lieutenant of a detachment of natives [Indians] and volunteers."

These officers, and the "oldest Sergeant Christian Nissen," constitute a "Council of War," which has the decision in "all matters of war as well in sending out our parties as concerning the expedition [against the Esopus Indians] in general," by a plurality vote, and, in case of a tie, Cregier has an extra vote to settle the matter.

The council of war is "directed to use all possible precautions in sending out parties for the protection of the coming harvest and the cattle, and to send out a frequently renewed in as many parties and to all precautions as many parties, so as to be desirable, without jeopardy to the protection of Fort Amsterdam, and to make a detailed report of occurrences and requirements to the director-general and council."

Cregier arrived at the Esopus Kill on July 3, with reinforcements from Stillwell and Van Couwenhoven arrived, with the troops they had been able to assemble, on the evening of the 9th. Cregier remained in the Esopus country until Nov. 17, when he returned to Manhattan, leaving about 60 soldiers under the command of Esigo Nissen; but on the afternoon of Dec. 19 he left Manhattan Island again and arrived at Wapping's on about the 27th, and returned to Manhattan on the last day of the year, and reached New Amsterdam about noon of Jan. 3, 1664. The return voyage was attended by flood and ice drifts.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 268-73, and CREGER'S very important Journal of the Esopus war, 323-54.

JULY

On account of the Indian uprising, the provincial government, on June 25, appointed July 4, and the first Wednesday of each succeeding month as days of fasting and prayer throughout New Netherland. In New Amsterdam the proclamation thereof was made in front of the city hall on June 30.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 248; Rec. N. Am., IV: 106.

A common council (voortucht) is convened at the city hall of New Amsterdam, consisting of the city bench and thirteen invited former burgomasters or schepen, at which it is agreed "to perform every duty, to enrol for the service of this City some people, as many as twenty @ five and twenty men; during these troubles [Indians'] which cannot form a standing army, and sent as a reinforcement to this or any other place reduced to stress by the Indians; then whereas a considerable sum of money is requisite thereunto, and the City Treasury cannot supply so much to defray the same, it is therefore expedient to take up some money on interest from the Commonalty on a/c of the City, which it will be impossible not only to get, but also to discharge, unless the R. Hon[ble] Director General and Councilors . shall please to benefit this City for ever with the income of the half wage scales i.e., half the receipts of the weigh-house, the city having formerly been granted one half, and the provincial government having retained the other half, and the Ferry to this side of the river, with the ferry from Brooklyn. A committee of two is appointed, one burgomaster and one schepen, to communicate this resolution to Stuyvesant and the council the next day.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 276, 277. See June 26 and July 10, 1665.

Martin Cregier writes to Gemoenepa, and the burgomaster and the council, informing them that his contingent numbers "about 150 men bearing arms, all counted except the negroes," and that he "cannot bring much more than 100 men bearing arms into the field." He asks that "the ordered goods" be sent at "the first opportunity," for "we cannot," he says, "get provisions here, that may be brought to the country."

Not only supplies were furnished from Manhattan Island, but the grain raised in the Esopus region had to be sent down to be ground, "on account of little water" at that place.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 275.

A call for volunteers for the defense of New Amsterdam is issued by the provincial council.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 250. On July 2, a circular letter was sent by the provincial council to the several towns of the province, urging upon them watchfulness and defense at the present juncture of affairs, due to the Indian troubles, and requiring them to send delegates to a provincial meeting to be held at New Amsterdam on the 6th. A similar letter was sent to the burgomasters and schepen of Nieuw Amsterdam. The delegates were convoked on the day named; but, on the 10th, the delegates from Amersfoort (Flatlands), Gravesend, Midtwood (Flatbush), New Utrecht, and Breukelen wrote to Stuyvesant and the council that they were ready to defend their neighbors on Long Island from attack, but refused to cross the river to New Amsterdam.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 249; Rec. N. Am., IV: 275-76.

Various members of the rattle-watch or night police are informed by the burgomasters "that the trainbands have taken the place of the Rattlewatch," and they are asked if they will "be willing to go on an expedition in the service of the City," in case trouble arises from Indians on Manhattan "or in the surrounding villages." The men agree to enlist, on condition of being "rewarded if wounded;" are furnished with hand and side arms, and promise "to turn out by day or night upon the command of the burgomasters or the R. Hon. Director General and Council, II: 179-80. See June 14, 1665; June 26, 1665; July 5, 1665.

Stuyvesant and the council write to Councillor Johan de Decker at Beverwyck: "We have renewed the peace with the savages around here [Manhattan] if the heart is as good as the mouth, then we hope for a good result."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 275; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 526.

Skippers of sloops sailing on the Hudson River are ordered by a provincial edict of this date "to apprehend, if possible, all Indians who come aboard their vessels "between the Dans Kamer and Catskill," and then to deliver them as prisoners at New Amsterdam or, in order that they may be used as guides as occasion requires. Those who deliver up as prisoners "any of the Esopus Indians or their adherents," who are at war with the Dutch, are promised 100 guilders in wampum for each Indian captive. The "Dans Kamer," a dancing ground of the Indians, was on a plateau adjoining the rocky point at the head of Newburgh Bay, north of the present city of Newburgh.—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 444-45; Ruttenber, Indian Geo. Names (1906), 158-59.

As liquor is being sold to Indians, contrary to statute, and as the existing Esopus Indian war makes the sale in the province more dangerous, since it invites the peril of other Indian disturbances, another law is now passed, directing all magistrates of inferior courts in the towns to enforce strictly the laws hitherto passed on the subject, and to exact in their respective jurisdictions such orders as they judge to be "best and most proper for the suppression of that scandalous traffic."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 446-47. For summary of such laws, see above, 1662.

"Seventeen savages" come "into the Fort" (Amsterdam), and state that they live "on the East end of Long-Island," and offer their services "to go also into the fight against the Esopus savages." The offer is accepted by the provincial government, and they are asked when they will come; they answer, that they will first, "wait for news" how matters stand "at the Esopus."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 286.

The sachem of the Wickquaquack (Indians of Westchester County) comes "of his own accord with his brother" to the council chamber in Fort Amsterdam, and says "he was warned by a Wappingh savage that the Esopus savages would come down with 40 or 50 men in about 5 or 6 days, to kill them and the Dutch of New Haerlem, Hasimus, Hobocken, Genoetsupa and the new village" (Nootwijk). He says also that "therefore he has come to take refuge with his people near New-Haerlem, he gives them to understand that they are not so secure, so that the people may not get frightened."

He says, further, that "he has warned the inhabitants of New-Haerlem and requests that we give notice to the people on the other side of it and on the General's bowery, that is Stuyvesant's farm.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 282.

Aegidaeus Layck, retainer of the Greek and Latin school in New Amsterdam, petitions Stuyvesant and the council for a salary (see May, 1662). His request is referred to the directors at Amsterdam, to whom, on Aug. 9, Stuyvesant recommended that
The provincial council resolves that Stuyvesant should go to Sept. Boston for the purpose of coming to some agreement, if possible, with the commissioners of the United Colonies, respecting the defending of their property. He is to write to the governor, but on Sept. 24th he writes a letter to the vice-director of Curacao, which is dated from Boston. In this letter he gives an account of his reception at Boston and the place of his residence there.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 252, 307. See also, regarding his visit, Hollandtse Mercurius [Jan., 1664], 11; Josselyn, Voyage to N. E., 166.

The porters of New Amsterdam are ordered by the provincial authorities not to carry any beer or wine from any house without a permit from the farmer of the excise.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 252.

The burgomasters order that "all grain and lime" be measured by the official measurer.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 182.

The burgomasters resolve, "that the Schout, Burgomasters and Scheepens in office" shall "receive yearly the sum of 25 fl. instead of being exempted from the excise on wine, beer and meat."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 182.

From nominations made by the burgomasters of New Amsterdam on the 7th, Gov't Lookermans is appointed by the provincial council an orphan-master in place of Johannes van Brugh, who has gone to Holland.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 253; Min. of Orph. Court, II: 186.

First news of Capt. Cregier's victory over the Esopus Indians is received by the council at Fort Amsterdam from a Hackensack Indian, and "a new coat" is promised to him as a reward for his tidings.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 294.

Stuyvesant and his council reflect that the Sunday laws are being treated as if they applied only to "keeping of half the Sabbath;" to now an ordinance is passed commanding "that not only a part but the whole of the Sabbath day" shall be kept. From sunrise to sunset "no ordinary labor" is to be performed, "much less drinking-clubs allowed to sit," and it prohibits "all extraordinary exercises, such as gaming and dice playing, Rising in cars or wagons, Fishing, Bowling, Running and roving in search of Nuts and Strawberries, Trading with Indians, or any such like, and, among the rest, the too unreasoned and excessive Playing, Shotting and Screamimg of children in the Streets and Highways, on the line of the upper garment, or six guilders (according to the rate of the counting house) for the first offense; double the sum for the second time, and for the third time to be exemplary corrected on the body." This law was transmitted by the provincial authorities to the burgomasters of New Amsterdam on Sept. 15.

In March, 1666, both the burgomasters had not yet made publication of the act as directed, and Stuyvesant notified them to do so, asking "the reason such was not done." He was told "that the Board found themselves agrified in some particulars." When the matter came up in the city court on March 18, the act was again read and conclusively, and Cregier, Boating, Rising in cars or wagons, Fishing, Bowling, Running and roving in search of Nuts and Strawberries, Trading with Indians, or any such like, and, among the rest, the too unreasoned and excessive Playing, Shotting and Screamimg of children in the Streets and Highways, on the line of the upper garment, or six guilders (according to the rate of the counting house) for the first offense; double the sum for the second time, and for the third time to be exemplary corrected on the body." This law was transmitted by the provincial authorities to the burgomasters of New Amsterdam on Sept. 15.

Cornelis van Ruyven, Offrid Savenven van Cortlandt, and John Laurence are commissioned by the provincial council to proceed to Hartford, there to endeavour to procure a settlement of the boundary between New Netherland and Connecticut. They left New Amsterdam at sunrise on the 19th and arrived at Hartford on the afternoon of the 20th. — Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 254, 255.

15 Cornelis Steenwyck reports "in the morning" to the council at Fort Amsterdam that, on the previous night, "at about six o'clock," Secretary Cornelis van Ruyven was at his door to tell him "what a Northern savages had related at Jan de Schilder's house, namely, that the balance of the Esopus savages had fled with their prisoners to the Wappingtins, where also the Mahicans, Kitchtawagu, Wiants and the Periodi are in the same condition." Before the session of the council is ended, confirmation comes in letters sent from the Esopus and from Fort Orange. It is reported that these Indians have had a war dance "and made a plan" to make common cause against the Dutch as soon as their corn has been gathered, by sending down a great party of them first all to Dutch plantation on the River at Hobookan, Hasinus, the corn-land and then the Manhattas Island, to burn, to kill everybody or take prisoners, whom they could get and that it should be done in a few days." At noon, the council got the confirmation, was greatly concerned, and deferred deliberation until the afternoon, when some of the city fathers were to be present an invitation to deliberate with the council, for the matter was deemed to be of "very great importance." When the joint meeting assembled in the afternoon, "the advice received from the Esopus were read to" a majority of the burgomasters and schepens present; "and then a frank statement was made of the present situation of the country and its perilous state, of the impossibility to redress it, unless either by subsidies or by negotiation of drafts on the Fatherland money could be raised for the maintenance of the too small military force, but neither counsel nor help could be thought of or proposed by them; however it was resolved for the present to send some troops to protect New-Harlem, and for fighting, each maned by 10 or 12 men up the North River [Hudson] to prevent the designs of the savages and divert them as much as possible; meanwhile also to warn the villages in the country around . . . that they must be on their guard;" and "the Vice-Captain of the City, was ordered to New-Harlem, to remain there in the river and to prevent as far as possible the savages from crossing over to Long-Island." The two yachts designed for the Hudson River were put in motion, and Lieut. Van Couwenhoven was given particular instructions how to operate with his command. — N. Y. Col. Docs., III: 399-401. See Oct. 24, 1663.

The city court of burgomasters and schepens addresses a petition to Stuyvesant and the council, in which they recall that the latter, some while ago (see Oct. 15, 1663), brought to their attention "the very dangerous position and situation of the country, as well in regard to send some troops to the barbarous Esopus nation and their allies, as the menacing anticipations and encouragements of neighbours together with the already mutinous revolts of some English subjects, and that, for the prevention and farther resistance, not only advice, but deeds and means" were "highly requisite and necessary." They say that they are "well inclined and bound," as a body corporate, as well as individually, to give the "aid of their poor council and small abilities for the benefit of the common wealth and more especially of this City:" but that they represent "only one member and the danger" is a concern of "the Province in general," and that it is "important and advantageous that some Delegates be convened and called as well from this City as from the other surrounding places and villages, also especially from the town of Beverwyck and Colony of Rensselaerswyck to deliberate and consult together under your Honors' wiser direction and higher authority for the good of the commonwealth;" they request Stuyvesant and the council to order the convoking of such an assembly "as soon as possible," so that whatever is "found most advantageous for the country" may "then be determined for the general peace, quiet and union."

The apostol of the provincial authorities thereon, dated the 28th, declared: "Though the General and Council of New Netherland find the request consistent with justice and consider the convocation of the Magistrates mentioned herein as necessary, yet bearing in mind the inconvenience of the approaching winter and that the delegates sought as well from the Colony of Renselaars Wyck as from the Town of Beverwyck cannot possibly come down and return before the winter, the Director and General said that it might be more convenient to call for the present occasion the Magistrates of the adjoining towns and hamlets, and that what by them, with the knowledge of the Director General and Council, may be proposed and advised for the public good may be in scriptis, to be communicated, should time and circumstances permit, to the Courts of the Colony of Renselaars Wyck and of the Town of Bever Wyck and Wild Wyck and to hear their advice thereon." — N. Y. Am., IV: 318-20; Van Rensselaer Bosvour Manuscripts, 784-85.

On Oct. 29, the presiding burgomaster presented to the city council the answer of the provincial government to the aforesaid petition, and stated that he had "called together the Court to conclude, in pursuance to the answer, on the points and articles necessary to be proposed for the good of this Province at the General Assembly to be convened . . . also to commission by plurality of votes two persons from the Board to attend the Assembly." The city court then agreed upon the following articles, viz.:(1) "To demand assistance against the savages" (2) To take up the matter of "boundaries between us and the English." (3) "To send Delegates to Fatherland," to make their demands to the Directors at Amsterdam for assistance and, failing with them, "to address themselves to the Lords the High and Mighty States General." Burgomaster Paulus Leendertsen Vander Graft and Schepen Jacob Kip were qualified as the two delegates of the city to the general assembly, and were instructed "to propose their articles and points." — ibid., IV: 325. The provincial council agreed, on Oct. 25, to a general assembly and sent out circular letters on the 29th, convening the same on Nov. 1. — Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 254.

On the day named (Nov. 1), the delegates met at New Amsterdam. They sent an address to Stuyvesant and the council, in which they recommended the appointment of agents, in Holland, to procure a settlement of the boundary controversy with Connecticut and free trade with the neighboring English colonies. The general assembly remained in session until the 31. See Oct. 22 and Dec. 11.

The burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam, and the delegates from the adjacent towns, address a remonstrance to the directors, the more important of which may be summarized as follows: In behalf of the inhabitants of the province, they refer to "the depreciated value of returns, not only causing here an excessive rise and dearthiness of wares imported into this country from Patras, but also the departure hence of several families; and, consequently, a depreciation in houses and real estate, the prosperity and hopes of agriculture alone remaining;"

Certain means for the preservation of the people are necessary, as vouchsafed by the Freedom and Exemptions published by the directors; namely, "reasonable protection, peaceable use and enjoyment of the bonâ fide property of the lands," protection against "all intestine and foreign wars, invasion and violence;" and the fulfillment of the promise of the directors "to work out and secure commission and patent, in due form," whereby their "real and legitimate jurisdiction over this Province, the authorities could be shown, demonstrated and justified," and to obtain "from his Royal Majesty of England, an absolute and definite settlement of the Boundary with his subjects, the English Nation, our neighbors here, and the ratification and approbation thereof."

They aver: "This province ought to be reinforced by a requisite number of good soldiers;" but they have been disappointed. The consequences whereof, so repeatedly placed before your eyes and submitted to you, are at present palpable, and make the Remonstrants indeed feel the licentious, bloody and impending ruinous effects thereof. These effects are seen in the massacre at Esopus, it is considered that they are one sily, stand here between barbarous nations, and are bounded on the other by a powerful neighbor who keeps quarreling with this State about the limits [boundaries]. Thus the good people were thereby brought and reduced to a condition like unto that of a flock without a shepherd, a prey to whomesoever will seize his advantage to attack it."

Regarding the aggressions of their English neighbours, they say that nation has "found out a way neglected by your Honors, to provide and arm itself with a coat of mail in the shape of an unlimited patent and commission which it lately obtained from his Majesty of England [see April 21, 1665; March 24, 1665]; for experience in State affairs teaches and abundantly exemplifies, that the strongest are commonly in the right and that the feeble, ordinarily, must succumb."

The eventual outcome was already apparent: "The total loss of this Province is infallibly to be expected and anticipated." They report "It being objected and pleaded by the above named English, as a pretext for their designs, that the real right and property of this Province and its territories were not duly proved and justified on your Honors' part by proper commission and patent from their High Mightinesses."

The document closes with a plea for relief and help as indicated, and is signed by delegates of the city of "Amsterdam," and the villages of Amsfoort, Breukelen, Midwout, Haarlem, Utrecht, Boswyk, and Bergen. — N. Y. Col. Doc., II: 477-79 (where full text is given). See also summary under Oct. 22; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 224.

The general assembly (Gemeene Landts Vergadering) chooses and commissions Jan Baptista van Renselaer, patron of the colony of Renselaerswyck, and Johannes Pietersen van Brugh, former justice of New Amsterdam, as the official agents to carry to Holland the remonstrance of Nov. 4 (g.v.), with other papers, and provides funds for their expenses. The documents in this case are in Van Renselaer Bouwer Manuscripts, 785-89. See also Oct. 22 and Dec. 11.

Andrew Hudde died. He had been in New Netherland since 1659, and was one of the earliest official surveyors of the province, as well as among its earliest land patentees, serving the government in many high places of trust for 34 years. While in process of removing with his family to Maryland, he arrived on Nov. 1, 1663, at Apoquanuminth, in the present state of Delaware, "and died there of a violent fever on the 4th." — N. Y. Col. Doc., p. 31 (note) XII: 446.

Marie Taine (or de Tene), widow of Philippe Casier, and David Uitze, sell to Jorit van Oblinsus their houses, barn, land, and garden, situate in New Haerlem, contained in three parcels, one lying north of the village, and the other two on Van Keulen's Hook, with the meadows thereunto belonging. — Harlem Records (original MSS.), I: 47 (N. Y. Pub. Library).

The chief of the Wickquaeskeck (Indians of Westchester County) comes to Fort Amsterdam, to request "for himself and his people, as his dependents and to fish unmolested near the village of New-Haerlem." This is granted "on condition that they shall not come armed into the neighbourhood of the Dutch." To serve as means of identifying them, passes are issued, containing "the seal of the Company impressed in wax on little cards," to be shown to the Dutch whom they meet. Twelve such passes are issued, four each for the Wickquaeskeck (dwelling between the Hudson and Byram's Rivers), the Ritchowan (Croton River), and the Reckgawank (Haverstraw). — N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 301.

New Haerlem magistrates are appointed by the provincial council. — Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 255.

Leonezoon to Leishe, Pietet Welpershen van Couwenhoven, Sergeant Pieter Ebel, and Harmen Douweisen, "all three well versed in the savage tongue," to find out if the Wappingers and Esopus Indians are well disposed to make peace, as has been reported.—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 304-5.

A clerk, without a sheperdy, and in respect to leased bouriers or farms. The owners allow the lessees the use of horses, oxen, ploughs, wagons, and other implements, but the lessees use them "also in the service of others and on other lands, whereby not only the Horses, Cattle and implements" are abused and worn out, "but even without a sheperdy and Lands" are neglected, "to the serious damage of the Lesseors and Agriculture in general." To stop this cause for just complaints, the provincial government prohibits by law the use thereof on other than the specified land leased, unless such permission has been expressly stipulated by written contract; for violation, the act provides a forfeiture of four shekels of wheat for each day, in addition to what was earned by the lessee "by plowing, drawing of timber, &c.," to be divided equally between the owner and the fiscal. — Laws & Ord. N. Neth. 450-51.

The supreme court of New Netherland gives judgment in favour of Timothy Gabry, vendue master, in his suit against the city clerk and city marshal of New Amsterdam, enjoining them to permit him to sell a certain class of property by public auction. It is held that all sales of property surrendered for the benefit of creditors shall be conducted by the provincial secretary or his deputy. — Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 355.

At a session of the schepens of New Haerlem, Joannes Ver- vecken is chosen by them to seek to obtain a vanwetser (precentor) for the town. — Harlem Records (original MSS.), I: 48 (N. Y. Pub. Library).

On the afternoon of this day, Capt. Martin Cregier sails in the company's yacht on a voyage to the Newsewingh (Navesink) Indians, and with him go Govert Lockermans, Jacques Cortelyou, and Pieter Ebel, with ten soldiers, two sailors, and the sachem and another Indian of Staten Island. They warn certain Englishmen to meet there against purchase of Indian land without the consent of the Dutch provincial government of New Netherland. On Dec. 12, an agreement was made with chiefs of the Newsewingh Indians for the purchase by the Dutch of all their unsold lands, and to prevent sale of the said lands to anybody else. — N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 314-17. On Feb. 16, 1664, the council determined to send an expedition of 20 to 24 men in a yacht to take possession of the country which was in danger of settlement by some Englishmen. — Ibid., XIII: 358.

Domingo Angola, a free negro, petitions the provincial council for the manumission of Christianna, a baptized orphan daughter of Manuel Trumpeter and Anthony, her wife, both of whom have died. The council grants the request, on condition that the West India Co. is to be furnished with another negro slave in her place, or that 300 guilders be paid for her release. On Sept. 16, 1664, record was made of the payment of this sum for her freedom by Govert Lockermans. The petitioner, Domingo, and his wife, Maykie, although free at this time, only received their certificates of manumission as the company's slaves on April 17, 1664. — Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 256, 264.

Albert Leeuwardtten receives a country-brief for a lot at No. 13 and part of No. 14 Wall St., the westward part of the Wilks building being now on this site. — See Map of Dutch Grants, C, Pl. 87, Vol. II, and III: 367.

The chief of the Hackensack Indians comes to the council chamber in Fort Amsterdam, to inform Stuyvesant that the Indians have "complied and their alliances are 'glad that the Dutch were willing to make at their request a peace with them.'" — N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 314.

The provincial government issues a certificate in regard to conferring of bail liberty upon certain of the negro slaves of the West India Co. on Manhattan Island. — Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 256.

Jorit Goderus is disinherited from his office as head porter of the weigh-house at New Amsterdam, because he has stolen firewood, "a very prevalent practice among the poor of New Amsterdam." Goderus had been superseded by Barent Jacobsen Cool (or Cool) on Sept. 21. — Min. of Orph. Court, II: 182-83; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 256, 257.

Cornelis Steenwyck appears before the burgomasters and schepens of New Amsterdam and is informed that, "pursuant to their unanimous resolution," he is "requested by the Geeral Provincial Assembly [held Nov. 13] to proceed to Fatherland as Delegate from this Province, to lay the deplorable and sorrowful condition of this Province before the Directors with petition for redress pursuant to the writings to be given him therewith;" as the ship "Gilded Star" is in port ready to sail, he is "requested to get himself ready, to repair thither in her in the aforesaid quality," but Steenwyck and others in the ship present "do not permit it," yet offers to sail in another ship, in March or April of 1664, and to "do then all" that lies in his power for the good of this Province. — Rec. N. Am., IV: 342. See Oct. 22 and Nov. 3.
Stuyvesant, on behalf of the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., and in compliance with their order of Sept. 11 of this year, cedés, transfer, and conveys to the burgomasters of old Amsterdam in Holland the “South [Delaware] river from the sea upwards to as far as Capt. Cregher at Esopus, informing him of three leagues from the bank of the river, on the west-side as far as the territory reaches to the English Colony, with all streams, kils, creeks, ports, bays, and outlines belonging thereto.”—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 449.

Before Stuyvesant and the council at Fort Amsterdam appear chiefs of the Hackensack and Staten Island Indians, bringing the brother of the chief of the Wappinghs, requesting “two months more of armistice” for the Esopus Indians.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 350-51. The next day they returned and renewed their request, which was granted because of the difficulties in which the government found itself owing to English aggressions in Westchester, on Long Island, and in the country of the New-angers.—Ibid., XIII: 321-22.

An armistice is made with the Esopus savages for a period of two months.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 342. On this day, also, Stuyvesant gives the rightfull owner or to the court in question and the terms of the armistice and instructing him how to inform and regulate the people there under these conditions.—Ibid., XIII: 323.

Maria de Bruyne (Truyn), wife of Jan Peck (Peeks), is prosecuted by the provincial council for selling bready to Indians. At the same time, the council, due to this and other cases of infraction, promulgates an ordinance which demands the arrest of “the Indians who are found drunk on Sundays . . . and not to liberate them before they shall have paid one pound Flemish. But the Sachems shall be previously informed hereof,” namely, about the order.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 257, Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 451.

On Jan. 3, 1664, the fiscal lodged a complaint against Maria in the provincial council for selling liquour to Indians, no doubt in continuance of the original case brought up a few days before, and the council concluded not to try the case, or to try it, but to dismiss the costs of action, and to be banished from the Island of Manhattan. On Jan. 24, she begged the council, as “one of the oldest inhabitants of the city of New Amsterdam,” to grant her a remission of the sentence and permit her to remove to Fort Orange (Albany). Four days later, the provincial authorities remitted her fine for the time being and allowed her to remove to Long Island.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 259, 259. The tavern was in the Smits Vly.—See July 24, 1656.

It is discovered that “furniture and cattle which the Indians plundered from divers inhabitants and Bouwerss” during period of Indian uprisings, as recently during the Esopus Indian war, were bought or bartered from the Indians by some of the inhabitants, which encouraged and afforded the Indians “to perpetrate more and more such Robberies and thefts, to the serious damage of the Farmers and of Agriculture.” A law is passed prohibiting the purchase, barter, or trade of “any plundered or stolen Movable or of Cattle from the Indians, unless information thereof” has been “previously given to the Director General and Council or to the Inferior Magistrats, each in his respective jurisdiction where such goods are offered for sale,” and their consent is obtained. Anybody who violates the law is required to give up such stolen property to the court in their jurisdiction, to suffer all losses involved, and forfeit “in addition as a fine, as much as they shall have given the Indians for the purchased or bartered goods.”—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 452-53.

Sometime before this year, a blockhouse was erected west of the present Church St. and south of Wall St. It is shown on Pl. 10A, Vol. I. On Pl. 15, Vol. I, it is called “the Northwest Blockhouse.”

The population of New Amsterdam, which numbered 1,000 souls in 1667 when surveyed by Capt. De Konikes, now numbers 1,500,of whom less than 350 are male adults, the rest being women, and children under 18 years of age.—O’Callaghan, Hist. of New Netherlands, II: 246, citing Albany Records, XVIII: 135; Holland Sect., XVI: 212.

A guard-house at the land gate was mentioned in a deed from Hendrick Hendrickse to Martin Hoffman, dated Nov. 17, 1666.—Libcr Deeds, B: 55 (New York). The words referring to the guard-house are as follows: “A lot east of the High Street, having to the north the Court which is a square, and to the south three leagues from the bank of the river, on the west-side as far as the territory reaches to the English Colony, with all streams, kils, creeks, ports, bays, and outlines belonging thereto.”—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 449.

A. Neglect of fencing has led to daily complaints “by the Farmers of the great damage done to the planted and sowed fields, because such care and attention as ought to be taken of the Fences” have not been paid to them, and “the trespassing of Cattle in some Villages” has resulted in “entire plantations” being “eaten up, destroyed and trodden under foot, to the serious damage of the proprietors and the detriment of Agriculture in general.” Stuyvesant and his council now pass an ordinance in the hope of obviating a recurrence of these abuses, and order the appointment, in all Villages, Hamlets and Settlements, of three fence viewers, who are required to examine the fences in their respective jurisdictions every two or three weeks, and to fine delinquents after due notification. A “proper Pound” is to “be constructed by the respective Inhabitants on the first fitting opportunity,” but not later than the ensuing month of March, and any inhabitant has power “to take up and impound all such Cattle found in Cornfields with a common fence,” for which the impoundee is to “receive from the Owner,” before the impounded cattle are released, prescribed penalties for trespassing. Should an owner delay the redemption of his impounded cattle more than the second day after notice they are to be sold at public auction to the highest bidder by “the nearest Official.”—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 454-55.

The provincial council orders a search to be made for the person of Lytter Antonissen, a negro born in New Netherland and a slave belonging to Martin Creger, who is suspected of having set fire to her master’s house. She was examined before the council on Feb. 14, and the next day the council passed a formal accusation against her as an accused. She confessed her guilt on the 8th, and on the following day was sentenced to be conveyed to the place of public execution, to be chained to a stake, strangled, and then burnt. However, the council at once revoked this sentence, and directed instead that all preparations for strangling and burning her should be made, and that then, when about to go on with the execution, she should be pardoned and returned to her master.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 258, 259.

Jan Pietersen Slot receives a ground-brief for a parcel of land on the island of Manhattan at Van Keuren’s Hook, drawn in 1662 by Daniel Tourneur; lots 7, 8, and 9 were drawn by Slot.—See Riker’s Hist. of Harlem, 206.

On Dec. 25, 1663, the magistrates of the new village of Haerlem petitioned the provincial council for the appointment of Johannis la Montague, Jr., as clerk of their church and as schoolmaster. The council now appoints him to these offices.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 258. He accepted, and served until 1700.—Kilpatrick, Dutch School of N. Neth., etc., 133, 160, citing Riker, Hist. of Harlem, 289.

The following agreement is entered into this day between the Dutch commission of New Netherland and John Scott, “president off ye English on Long Island & Capt: John Youngs Commission from Conciticut,” namely: “That ye English on Graves end flashing falstone Craddock, Newwark & Henestead doe still remain according to ye New Settlement under the King off England without Let or Molestation from ye Dutch Government in any manner, Stuyvesant & Council or any Authority under them under any Notion or Consideration Whatsoever. The directors of the West India Co., chamber of Amsterdam, write to Stuyvesant and the council with respect to fortifying the harbour of New Amsterdam, and creating settlements thereabouts, so as to "prevent the English occupying those places."—Y. T. Col. Decr., II 218.

The directors at Amsterdam, in a letter to Stuyvesant of this date, refer to a previous letter to him, dated Sept. 27, 1663, in which they ordered "that the monthly wages of such servants [of the Company] there [New Netherland] shall henceforth be liquidated and paid in Beavers valued at 6 instead of 7 guilders a piece. With respect to the depreciation of wampum, they recognize it is on the increase, and therefore "resolve" and give their executions of the account of such persons as has been engaged here" (Holland) shall, "at the end of the year, be credited one-fourth in order to afford them satisfaction herein also, and to obviate all just causes of complaint."—Y. T. Col. Decr., II 218-19. See Dec. 22, 1653; and Dec. 28, 1662.

Jan de Witt and Jan Theunissen, partners in the ownership of a wind-mill on a site within the area of the present City Hall Park, on the Broadway side, having become involved in an irremovable dispute, the city court orders Jan de Witt to take over for a consideration Theunissen’s share until May, which he agrees to do. Further discussion, however, led to Jan de Witt’s retiring, when the partnership was dissolved in May.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 7-8, 12-13; Min. of Orph. Court, III: 70-71. Theunissen was formerly a tapster.—Rec. N. Am., IV: 171. See, further, May 27, 1664.

An edict of the states-general, under the great seal, is issued, declaring the right of the West India Co. to plant colonies in America, and laying particular emphasis upon its jurisdiction in "the country called New Netherland." It avows the company’s authority, derived from its charter of 1621, to settle the boundaries by the Hartford treaty of Sept. 10, 1663 (p. 72). This edict is a result of recent English aggressions, and by it the Dutch seek to stave off the English with "free and safe passage" under New Amsterdam. The conference agree with him and describe the invaders as "a ragged troop," ready for pillage. They agree to defend their "lives and fortunes," and acquit themselves as well in "defending the Company" as they did "in the Year 1653, in the English War."—Rec. N. Am., IV: 15-16. See Feb. 26.

The fear of an English invasion of New Amsterdam leads to the consideration of its defences. Its "openness . . . along the water side, both along the East and North Rivers," is "notorious." Stuyvesant has asked the city conferees "in what manner" it is "best to fix and defend" the place, and whether they think it "practicable and necessary" to set off the city immediately "with sufficient palisades against an expected attack." He now suggests that an inventory be taken of the number of palisades which each household and each unmarried man ought to furnish, and sets the time when the work shall be done. They think that the business is exhausted and unable to be further burdened; that the city’s income is so meagre that even "the few works heretofore begun for the City" cannot be completed; that "the greater the revenue, the greater the expenses;" therefore Stuyvesant, they say, should "be pleased to lend the Company’s Negoes to cut and haul palisades with the City’s Negoes for two or three days, one to be bound to the North, the other to the East River." Day and night watch for the city are discussed.

There are some things in Stuyvesant’s remonstrance which the city conferees consider to be beyond their jurisdiction and properly the concern of the provincial government. The latter took place on Feb. 17, at which time public announcement was made to the company, in front of the city hall.—Rec. N. Am., V: 15-18; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 259.

Stuyvesant addresses a representation, consisting of ten items, to the provincial councilors, and to the schout and burgomasters of New Amsterdam, in regard to the invasion of the English on Long Island and the possibility of an attack on New Amsterdam. The schout and burgomasters, impressed by the "great importance" of the matter, communicate it to the schepens, and to Olloff Stevenson van Cortlandt and Allard Anthony, both former burgomasters, and, in order to avoid a "summons and demand" made "first by letters" by the English at Hartford, and, "subsequently, by force of arms—first by one Jan Coo [John Coe] with a troop of about 50 @ 100 foot and horse- men in the English towns only on Long Island, afterward and recently by one Jan Scott [John Scott] with a troop of about 80 horse and also as many foot not only in the English, but also in the Dutch towns, on said Island," Stuyvesant adds that "no similar hostile proceeding" has "hitherto been made use of against these [parts]," but, "to prevent bloodshed and consequent greater mischief," efforts have been made by embassies and written protests to bring matters to an accommodation, or at least to refer the whole matter to the lords of the states-general, as an international concern. But not much is expected of an agreement abroad. Opinion differs in New Netherland. Some praise the forbearance with which the Dutch provincial government has shown, while others declare the "non-resistance and non-opposition by force and violence to cowardice, scandal and insult"—a reprehensible conduct for the Dutch nation.

The conference advise resistance to any further invasion by John Scott, should he return in March, as he has threatened. They declare that the directors at Amsterdam should have made use of their assets, profits derived from duties in Holland and New Netherland during many years, by "enrolling and sending 2 @ 500 brave discharged soldiers" and by fortifying the city of New Amsterdam. Had provision made this provision for security, they have no doubt "but those who now revolt would have taken greater care, knowing that we being strong enough would have given them plenty of trouble and reduced them by force of arms to obedience.

This is not the case but "every Burgier is bound to defend his place within its walls," they say, while "the military or soldiery of the Company" serve "outside and the country and villages round about," wherever necessary, both against "the savage barbarians" and the English or any other nation which seeks to do injury.

Stuyvesant had said that he thought the English were trying to provoke a quarrel ending in bloodshed, as a pretext for the Dutch villages with "fire and sword." Now, under New Amsterdam. The conference agree with him and describe the invaders as "a ragged troop," ready for pillage. They agree to defend their "lives and fortunes," and acquit themselves as well in "defending the Company" as they did "in the Year 1653, in the English War."—Rec. N. Am., V: 18-19. See Feb. 26.

The new Huguenot village on Staten Island is granted an inferior court of justice by the provincial government, which names David de Marest, Pierre Billou, and Walraven Lutten as the first judges to be registered. Appeal is to the supreme court of director-general and council, "from all judgments exceeding Fifty guilders." The local court is also "authorized to enact proper Ordinances, [providing] that the Cornfields and Gardens are to be "carefully fenced, kept inclosed, and the broken fences properly repaired."—Laws & Ord. N. Neth., 458-59.

The petition of New Amsterdam, in view of the approaching election of new members of the city bench, recommends the nomination of "such persons as make profession of religion, no opponents of the Superior or Inferior government, but peace loving and such as are fit for that office." The bench made nominations on Feb. 4, "in the presence of Cornells van Ruyvens," appointed by Stuyvesant and the council to be present on this occasion on behalf of the provincial government. Election by the latter took place on Feb. 12, after which public announcement was made to the commonalty, in front of the city hall.—Rec. N. Am., V: 15-18; Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 259.

14 An ordinance is enacted for the recording of deeds and mortgages in Breuckelen, Midwout, Amsterdam, and New Utrecht, instead of at New Amsterdam, because it has been found that many inhabitants of these villages neglect "to convey in proper form their sold Lands, Houses, and Lots, to the purchasers, and to give a quittance therefor," on the ground that they are "unwilling to bear the trouble, loss of time, and expense attendant on going to the Manhattan, to the office of the Secretary of the Director General and Council," such neglect resulting in some lands being sold four or five times, "without being duly recorded." The new law requires local registration in registers kept separately for deeds and mortgages, and correct copies thereof to be delivered annually to the office of the provincial secretary.—Letter 2 Ord. N. Neth., 459-60.

16 The council sends a force to hold the Navensink lands.—See Dec. 6, 1663.

19 Abraham Lubebenser is engaged by the burgomasters as constable (gauker) in the city.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 185.

20 The burgomasters of New Amsterdam enter into an agreement with Jan Bockhout, Gerrit Jansen from Amstel, and Jacob Keeren "for making eighty gibeons to wit thirty two 1/2 feet high and wide, thirty two 1/2 feet wide and 5 feet high, and twenty eight 6 feet high and 42 wide," for which they are to receive thirty-five stivers a yard and besides having "the liberty and freedom on condition that they themselves cut the wood." Cartage is to be paid by the burgomasters.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 185; See Feb. 20.

20 The burgomasters of New Amsterdam resolve to submit proposals for the defence of the city to Stuyvesant and his council. Experience, they say, has shown, that "all wars and troubles" with their English neighbours have been "based upon the desire to plunder" New Amsterdam "or obtain booty." New Amsterdam is the "capital," and its inhabitants are "mostly Dutchmen," who have "at their own expense built so many fine houses" that the city surpasses "nearly every other place in these parts of North America." Here is "a garrison of three complete companies of militia;" therefore, the place should be "properly fortified" in the manner they recommend, which would make it "formidable to eveminded neighbours or the savages," and these proposed works "will be of great use to both the East and North, making them safe for help to come, as a road to retreat or go to the assistance of so many villages, hundreds of farms, with houses, grain, lands, cattle and nearly ten thousand souls, mostly Dutchmen and some Frenchmen, who in the course of years and with God's blessing would "grow into a great people," in a province so favourably situated, "where thousands of acres of land" are yet "uninhabited and unfortified."

The country, they think, might even be a refuge for the people of the Netherlands, if the fatherland were "visited by cruel wars, civil or with outside nations."

Or it might become a "granary" for the fatherland, in the event of "failure of the Eastern crops or a prohibition of trade by the Northern kings and princes." The burgomasters estimate that "about eight thousand sheep of winter grain" are "in the ground, besides the large quantity of summer grain, rye, peas, oats, and barley," which are "already cut." If a peace is concluded, they promise "an abundance of cereals."

Again, they say New Netherland might be expected "to become the staple of commerce" for the fatherland "by the planting of tobacco, hemp, flax and other necessities," all of which thrive there. If a peace is concluded, they contemplate these things, the burgomasters conclude that, next to the "salvation of the province," after the boundary question has been settled, lies "to fortify the new Amsterdam by a bastion at the East River gate [Pearl and Wall Sts.], pallisades closely set through the water to the round bulwark before the City Hall [Pearl St. and Coenties Alley], from there pallisades to the Kapsken brooks at the southern end of Manhattan, where Battery Point is, where a new wall should be built to protect from there the East and North Rivers and especially the City and the port, then again pallisades to prevent a landing to about half way up the North River to a bastion," this bastion "to protect the part as far as the North West bastion, to be built near a group of closely set pallisades, running down to the river and well protected against the floating ice." From this point across the island to the East River gate they propose the building of "a strong stone wall with two bastions" and "with a wing into the [East] river."

Now they contemplate the cost, which they say will be "a large sum of money." They know that the provincial government cannot spare any money, because the late Indian war depleted the treasury, and it is also impossible "to burden the inhabitants" of the city "with more taxes." The people, they say, "grow daily poorer." However, "in this pressing necessity," the burgomasters promise "to spend the whole of the City's income on the fortifications, and to raise among the merchants and richest Burgers and inhabitants as much as possible" as can be obtained, or may be needed, provided the provincial government "in a year from now," allow the city "to receive the innkeepers or tapsters' impost as security for the creditors and until the loan has been paid, but no longer.

On the 21st, Stuyvesant and the council agreed to this request, with the proviso that the collections of the tapsters' excise should begin in May, 1664, and that "from that date on the present and future revenues of the City" should "be hound for the payment of the money to be raised and that the fortifications" should be "planned and made with the knowledge and approval of the Director General and Council."—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 185-90; see Feb. 5, 1664. On the following day (Feb. 22), the city court met, and the aforesaid propositions were read, together with the conclusion. The preceding burgomaster reported "that Mr. van Ruyven" had "already offered 1000 fl. and the Director General promised at least as much on interest. It was then resolved, unanimously, "to summon not only the old Burgomasters and Schepens, but also the wealthiest inhabitants," to be assembled on Monday, Feb. 24; meanwhile the members of the city bench promised their personal loans, on interest.

On the 24th, some of the burgurers and inhabitants, who had been invited to court, had the proposals for a loan presented to them and were asked to signify the amounts they would lend to the city at an interest of ten per cent. This interest is guaranteed "that each shall have paid his last promised pennis and continue until the monies given on interest have been paid back, at the longest for a period of five years from date," to such value as the xewants thereof had, being eight white and four black beaks for a stiver.

More than a hundred loans were then made, aggregating 27,000 florins, which included 1,000 florins of 1,200 florins, the largest single loan.—Rec. N. Am., V: 28-33.

On Feb. 26, the burgomasters requested a "sealed warrant, showing that the import on wine and beer, to be sold by the tapsters in the city, was to remain in their hands until the projected loans were paid with interest. Stuyvesant and the council gave this warrant under the provincial seal on March 6.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 190-91; Col. Hist. Miss., Dutch, 265; Rec. N. Am., V: 33.

The council minutes refer to "the newly commenced settlement of Newtowick on the Northriver," where a farmer having died, leaving a minor son, it is desired to appoint guardians and trustees "for the aforesaid orphaned child," as well as "to take an inventory of the property" left by the parent. Stuyvesant and the council "request and authorize,"—Paulus Leendertse van der Giff, present Burgomaster, and Mr. Allard, a burgomaster of this city, to be the "collectors and Co-Patrons of the said new settlement to act as guardians and trustees" for the child.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 360. This settlement, formed about 1663 (see July 26, 1661), was also known as the Burgomaster's Colony or Beuvray, and was the site of the older Sappo plantation, and is included within the confines of present Village.—De Puyter Papers and Warren Papers, in N. Indian chiefs representing the Hackensack and Minisink Indians appear in the council chamber of Fort Amsterdam, bringing with them one of the captured children of Esopus in token of their good will, and presents are exchanged. —Y. T. Col. Docs., XIII: 361-62.

The city court of New Amsterdam, addressing Stuyvesant and the council, says: “Although your Honors convoked in the month of October of last year a General Provincial Assembly which was held on the 17th, 19th and 19th of November following by Deputies from the adjoining towns and settlements only, because the deputies from the Colony of Renselarswyck and villages of Beverwyck and Wildwyck were unable to come down and sail back at the time, owing to the inconvenience of the approaching winter; and whereas after the aforesaid meeting of the Assembly, our neighbours, the revolting English, have made attempts under one Jan [John] Scott against this State endeavoring to reduce our villages on Long Island under their obedience, with divers threats which they gave out, of making some attempt on this place; all which we think unnecessary to enlarge on, as is sufficiently known to every one and what they further sought to commit in invading, taking possession of, and inhabiting the Neuwestings, we find ourselves necessitated to turn to your Honors with urgent entreaty that in this highly imperious necessity, in which the whole country is placed, you would again convoke a General Provincial Assembly, as has hitherto been possible and customary both from the surrounding places and towns. As specially from the Colonies of Reinselars Wyck, Beverwyck, and Wild Wyck to exact by a unanimous vote, what shall be found proper for the prosperity, quiet and peace of this Province, which ought to be immediately reported to our Lords and Principals in Europe, so as to be able to send it over with the Delegates in the ship the Styvyn...” To which Stuyvesant and the council replied, on March 18, that, “Conformably to the Apostle dated 27th Octuber last, the petition was deemed just and necessary. Therefore the letters thereto required shall be drawn up and placed in petitioners hands to be despatched by the earlist departing ships.” —Rec. N. Am., V: 33-34; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 262.

On April 1, the provincial government issued a writ summoning the several towns to send delegates to a general assembly to be held at “the town of Amsterdam” on April 1st. This writ was, however, meanwhile, elected as its delegates Burgomaster Cornelis Steenwyck and Schepen Jacob Backer. The assembly met as required, and the delegates drew up an address to Stuyvesant and the council, which was answered the next day. On April 12, they sent a second address, in which they explained the purport of their first, and solicited postponement. Other exchanges followed. In an address on April 15, the delegates asked permission to petition the West India Co. and the state-general for protection and for a redress of divers grievances, as well as to send agents to Holland to support the same, which was granted.

Without coming to a final conclusion or voting supplies, the general assembly adjourned for a week. On the 21st, the provincial government again notified the delegates to assemble on the following day, and when they were met Stuyvesant addressed them in person.—Rec. N. Am., V: 45; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 263; Brodhead, Hist. State of N. Y., I: 728-29; Van Rensselaer, Hist. City of N. Y., I: 366-17.

The burgomasters and offer their services “to cut wood for the paillethiers.” The burgomasters draw up the following proposals for contractors: “The paillethiers are to be of oakt, 15 feet long and at the thin end 8 inches square with true edges, that is at least 8 inches across for 1000 paillethiers, 2400 feet as ribs, one third 7 inches square, two thirds 7 inches by 4, all to be delivered near the stomp at a place convenient to haul them: they may be thicker, but not thinner and at least 1000 pieces together round wood and not split.” The bidders demand 60 fl. per hundred and are offered only 40 fl. by the burgomasters; after discussion, the burgomasters yield. The job is given to four men, who sign a contract and ask an advance allowance for food; they are promised 10 fl. apiece when ready to begin work.

On the same day, Hendrick Lambertsen Mol contracts with the city to quarry 30 to 40 scows full of rock, at 18 fl. in wampum for each scow, and to begin his work at the end of the following week. —Rec. N. Am., V: 45, 59; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 263; Hist. City of N. Y., I: 366-17.

Nicasius de Sille is confirmed as a church-warden of New Amsterdam by the provincial council.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 261; Min. of Orph. Court, I: 193.

Governer Loockerman, one of the church-wardens of New Amsterdam, having been called by the attorney general in account of the administration of the Church money,” says he “never had the key of the money box or kept account,” and that he has “always up to date been in the hands of Mr. Johan de Decker and his attorney Francois Boon.” It appears from the records that Decker “had the administration of the money and of the property of the Church.” Loockerman, now being continued in the office of a church-warden, and having associated with him Nicasius de Sille, demanded the delivery of the money and property to him “under inventory.” Decker had left the city and had given the church funds “to his attorney Francois Boon,” but had made no accounting; so the burgomasters presented the situation to Stuyvesant and the council, asking that Boon be obliged to surrender the property and money to the two wardens of the church, with an inventory, “so that the necessary repairs of the Church might be made. On the 18th, Boon was ordered to do so.—Min. of Orph. Court, I: 193.

Pieter Wolphertsen van Couwenhoven reports to Stuyvesant and the council concerning information he has received from a friendly Indian about “great dissatisfacion among the Esopus and Wappings,” who “had expected to kill all the Dutch and drive the rest away, as the English of New Haven had promised to them, that they would first take Long Island and then the Menades (Manhattan). To ascertain the correctness of this rumour, Lieutenant van Couwenhoven was sent, with “2 or 3 others, conversant with the savage tongue, in the Company’s yacht to the Wappings.” Inquiry sustained the charge of English machinations.—Y. T. Col. Docs., XIII: 356-84.

Stuyvesant and his council issue an ordinance “for the better and more careful Instruction of Youth in the principles of the Christian Religion.” In order that children may be instructed “in the principles and fundamentals of the Reformed Religion,” as well as in reading, writing, and arithmetic, it is ordered that the schoolmasters “shall appear in the Church, with the Children committed to their care, and intrusted to them, on Wednesday before the commencement of the Sermon, in order, after the conclusion of Divine Service, that each may, in the presence of the Minister and Church, demonstrate what they have learned to their Scholars as to what they have committed to memory of the Christian commandment, and Catechism, and what progress they have made; after which performance, the Children shall be dismissed for that day, and allowed a decent recreation.” —Laws & Rec. N. Neth., 469. “Among the Dutch and their neighbors it was the universally accepted duty of schoolmasters to teach religion through the catechism and other church formularies. . . . Accordingly the Classis of Amsterdam—in special cases, the local minister and consistory—examined the prospective New-Amsterdam masters as to their fitness, especially for their religious duties. A like supervision the church exercised—in theory at least—over the actual teaching of the school.

"The civil authorities conceived their interests and responsibilities best counter the strides strikingly similar to what is common in America today. They chose the masters—frequently upon ecclesiastical recommendation—paid their salaries, furnished the schoolhouse, and gave the directions under which the masters taught. In the division of civic function, the State-General exercised only a broad oversight, serving more as a court of final appeal than as an executive or legislative agency. The Lords Directors from the general treasury of the company furnished the money for the salaries, directed the general affairs of the school, and besides held themselves free to control even its minutiae. The director general and council acted only as the agents of the company, but exercised much power in the service of their lords. The city authorities, but for financing finances and an autocratic director, would have furnished a sufficient support and the sole control of the city school.

In spite, however, of any thwarting of purpose, enough was done by the secular authorities to present a remarkable anticipation of the American public school."—Klipper, op. cit., pp. 83, 93-94.

Willem Bogordus is granted by the provincial council the use of 261.4 acres of land in west-northwest of New York for a residence.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 261. These houses, known as "the five houses of the Company," stood on Winkel Street. See Castello Plan, II: 259 (No. 6).

Jacob Strycker is confirmed as a member of the court of orphan-masters by the provincial council.—Min. of Orph. Council, II: 176, p. 176.

Charles II, deeming the Dutch in New Netherland unprepared, totally regardless of prior grants, arbitrarily grants the entire territory between the Connecticut and Delaware Rivers to his brother, the Duke of York, "his heirs and assigns"; he also conveys to him the territory between the Kennebec and St. Croix Rivers (Maine). See map marked "Fletter.

The territory covered by this extensive and very important grant is thus described: "All that part of the Mayne land of New England beginning at a certain Place called or known by the name of St. Croix next adjoyning to New Scotland in America and from thence extending along the Sea Coast unto a certain Place called Petuququine or Pemaquid and (soe) upp the River thereof to the furthest head of the same as itt tendeth Northwards and extending from thence to the River of Kinebequi and see upwards by the shortest course to the River Canada Northward And also all that Island or Islands commonly called by the several name or names of Matonom or Long Island which lies lying and bordering towards the west of Cape Codd and Narro Higansets abutting upon the Mayne land between the two Rivers there called or known by the several names of Coocetteute and Hudsons Rivers Together also with the said River called Hudsons River and all the lands and tenements, goods, and appurtenances thereon or thereunto belonging and lying within the said Rhode or River to the East side of De Ware Bay And also all those several Islands called or known by the names of Martin Vinyards and Nantouks otherwise Nantucket" (etc.).—Col. Laws N. T., I: 1-5.

Cochan in a manner similar to the Wappingers, Wapping, Weekscock, and other Indian tribes appear at the council chamber in Fort Amsterdam, bringing with them for surrender "a Dutch child, which they have bought from the Esopus savages for 31 strings of wampum." They also offer their friendship and express their desire to live in peace with the Dutch, upon whom they urge the necessity of expulsion in putting up a house or fort in the country of the Newesingsh, for good and sufficient cause, as made by certain Englishmen.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 395-96.

Jan de Wit, the miller, makes acknowledgment of a contract of sale to Claes Jansen van Langendijk of "half of the windmill, as it now stands upon a plain outside of this City near the Fresh Water, with half of the lot, on which it stands, measuring 20 rods square," and other appurtenances, on condition that the purchaser pay "for two and the Company besides one half of the two old sails, belonging to the mill from of old," and that the purchaser also take upon himself one half of what is still due by the mill to the company, "to wit, weekly to grind for the Company" 25 scheuvels of grain, whenever the wind is good and it is required of him.—Min. of Orph. Pieter Stoutenburgh receives a ground-brief for a piece of land near Gov. Stuyvesant's bowery, to the west of the Great Highway (Broadway), to the north of Cosyn Gerrittsen's land, and to the south of Dirck Michie's, containing in breadth 24 rods; "then a line running between Cosyn Gerrittsen northwest and by west and thence to the same line east, until it is in length 113 rods, and is in area about 8 acres or 4 morgens and 312 rods.—Lib. Jan S Tvrryer is charged in the city court by Schout Tonneman with entertaining at his house on Sunday, April 6, "in the afternoon after the 2d sermon," 20 persons who were drinking. Schuyver admits he 'tapped a little piet for strangers on account of their thirst." The court holds that there is a contradiction in the Sabbath ordinances of Oct. 26, 1636, and Sept. 15 (iiii), 1665, and unanimously resolves to go in a body to Stuyvesant and the council "on Thursday next [April 12] at nine o'clock in the morning to speak to them on this subject," also to find out "for what reason those who reside beyond the Fresh Water are allowed to tap more on the Sabbath than the tavernkeepers of this City."—Rec. N. Am., V: 46.

As "some dead dogs" lie "here and there on the street," Schout Tonneman takes the advice of the city court with respect to their disposal—"where he shall have them conveyed and by whom, to prevent the stench, which proceeds therefrom." He is instructed "to send the City's Negroes" under order to "collect and bury the same."—Rec. N. Am., V: 45.

The Triennial Act of 1645 is repealed. 515

1664 court with violation of the laws regulating tappers. Smith's tavern stood on the present site of 32 Bridge St. He is accused of selling drink on Sunday, April 6; and again, on May 22, he was charged with selling it after hours, the tappers thinking it "unnecessary singing and chewing." He makes a general denial, and is condemned to pay a fine and receive a reprimand.—Rec. N. Am., V: 48, 64. See Castello Plan, II: 267-68; Landmark Map Ref. May 29 Sachems or chiefs representing the Esopus, Wappinging, Kighteaugh, Reewonchong (or Haverstraw), Wickquaskeek, Hackensack and Tappan, Staten Island, Nyack, Marseminger, and about 20 other tribes, met in the council chamber in Fort Amsterdam in a peace conference with the Dutch officials, and conclude a treaty of peace. It was signed on May 16 by Stuyvesant, Niclaes de Sile, and Cornelis van Ruyven for the Dutch provincial government, with the following witnesses, Burgomasters Cornelis Steenwyck and Paulus Leendertsen Vander Girtt, Jacob Backer, as president of the schepen, old Schepen Govert Lockermans, Capt.-Lieut. Martin Cregier, Lieut. Pieter Wulpertens van Couwenhoven, Thomas Chambers, as commissary of Wiltwycke, and Abraham Wilmerdun, jr. The interpreters include Sarah Kiested, as well as Lockermans, Van Couwenhoven, and Chambers.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 375-77. See also June 2.

17 Three instruments of title, still extant, as Pl. 12 in this volume, from the originals in the N. Y. Pub. Library, present a succession of title which includes ground-brief, confirmation, and conveyance, and are of special interest, at this early period, on account of the intervening change of government. The first is dated May 17, 1664, representing the India Company's ground-brief, being from Director-General Stuyvesant to Andries Rees, for a piece of land in New Amsterdam, drawn up and attested by Cornelis van Ruyven, provincial secretary, signed by Stuyvesant, and sealed with the beaver seal of New Netherland. Rees's lot was on the east side of William St.; a little north of Exchange Pl. The New York City Bank now covers the ground.—See Castello Plan, C. Pl. 82a, 82e, and p. 332, Vol. II; Map of Dutch Grants, C. Pl. 87, and p. 406, Vol. II.

The second instrument represents the confirmation by the English government under the terms of the Articles of Surrender of Aug. 17, Sept. 9, 1664 (q. s.), being issued on June 4, 1667, by Gov. Nicolls to Andries Rees for the aforesaid property, written by the clerk's hand, signed by Richard Nicolls, and attested and recorded by the signature of Matthias Nicolls.

The third instrument is the first conveyance of the property, on May 26, 1660, by "Andries Rees to Thomas Day" (as near unto the Fresh Water by the Great Highway, containing, on the north-west side, 20 rods; on the south-west side, 20 rods; on the north-east side, 20 rods; and, on the south-east side, 20 rods. — Liber Patents, II: 116 (Albany). Willem Aarten is confirmed in the same part, on a tract near the Hudson, of Aug. 21, 1666, reciting a wind-mill on the land built by De Wit and Theunissen (see Jan. 22, 1664). Claes Jansen van Langendijk is confirmed in the other moiety or half part on a conveyance by De Wit, dated May 31, 1664. Both confirmations are dated Oct. 3, 1667, and are recorded in Liber Patents, II: 116 (Albany). In contrast, between De Wit, Theunissen, and Leendertsen, an extension of the West India Co. was concluded on Sept. 22, 1665, and between that date and April 4, 1664, when De Wit conveyed to Langendijk, the mill was built. The mill is shown on Pl. 10-A-A, Vol. I. See also Manatus Maps, II: 260; Castello Plan, II: 212; Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 962, and Chronology, Nov. 2, 1662, and April 4, 1664.

The general court of Massachusetts-Bay at Boston receives intelligence, as that "there are many complaints of traders, and the inhabitants, for the bills to be made by the Governor and the Council, and the merchants, that neither the Indians, nor the English, have been able to buy a fry of salt, to any" and that the merchants "are in great trouble," so as to make "a passage to the Gouwnanes and the mills, without going round West of the Red Hook, where the water is "ordinarily very low." The bill is "filled up with sand at one end," and it is believed the improvement will enable boats "carrying one hundred shades of grain or a full load of wood," or other cargo, to "pass through" the passage. The petition is granted, the dredging to be done at the expense of the petitioners, and saving the title rights of Lubbertsen and others.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 348-49. The name Red Hook is retained to this day on maps of the South Brooklyn shore of New York Bay, just south of Buttermilk Channel. See also Randel Plan of 1814, A. Pl. 15, Vol. III.

Several negroes, male and female, are sold by direction of Stuyvesant and the council at New Amsterdam to the highest bidder.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 266.

Various letters from Virginia are received by the provincial authorities of New Netherland, which give notice of an intended attack on Dutch vessels from Manhattan by a privateer. On June 6, the provincial authorities ordered the magistrates of New Utrecht to watch the West India merchants, who was Robert Downman, and to send word in case he was found along the coast.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 266.

The provincial government of New Netherland makes a contract with Thomas Willett for a quantity of beef and pork, payment thereof to be made in negroes.—Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 249.

This day is set aside in New Netherland as "a general day of thanksgiving as well on account of the desired peace as specially for God's signal mercy, which he has shown us during the war with the Esopus savages in delivering all the captive Christians out of the hands of the barbarians contrary to all human hope and expectation." Voted by Stuyvesant and the council on May 31.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 383-84. See also May 15-16, 1664.

The Rev. Henricus Selens writes from Breukelen to the classis of Amsterdam of the safe arrival of Dominie Samuel Megapolensis, and adds: "You have heard of the sad state of New Netherland. The Indians have killed some, wounded others and taken a number of captives and at the same time burned a number of houses at Esopus. The English have declared, that they would take our town [New Amsterdam] and all Long-Island with flying colors."—N. Y. Col. Docs., National City: 436.

When the Indians brought their petitions to Manhattan for barter and trade, some persons, as alleged in complaints of the inhabitants as well as of the Indians, assailed the Indians, led them by the arm, and dragged them with their goods "against their will into one house or the other, without allowing the Indians to barter and exchange elsewhere their Peltries for such goods" as they required. This led to trouble and was deemed to provoke "still more." Stuyvesant and the council, "to prevent such irregularities," now ordain that nobody, whether following the business of an Indian trader or not, directly or through others, shall "accost, or . . . take along with him the Indians on their arrival at the River side or landing, or the Peltries and other wares" brought by them, or . . . cause the goods to be carried to his house, but shall "allow the Indians to go with their Merchandise" where they themselves wish. Penalties for infractions are established.

This law was embodied in a request from the city of Amsterdam on June 24, with omissions for its publication; but the city fathers took no action until July 17, when, in the city court, they declared that, as the provincial government had already provided a copy of the law, which was "affixed to the gate of the Forty," and, among the substances not to be traders, they believed it "to be unnecessary to publish the ordinance for the sale of the Fry of this City," that is, in front of the city hall.—Lett. & Ord. N. Neth., 41, 42; Cal. Hist. MSS., Dutch, 266; Rev. N. Am., V: 97.

“there have been many complaints” to Stuyvesant and the council because “the Fences around some Bouweries on Manhattan Island” are “not kept up as well as they ought,” resulting in “serious damage” to cornfields “by the trespassing of the Cattle,” the provincial government therefore passes a law which names three fence viewers for Manhattan Island, who, when they find “any Fences out of order,” are required to warn the owners to make repairs immediately, and for failure to comply to cause them to be fined 12 guilders for the first dereliction, twice as much for the second, and 50 guilders for a third offense, as well as to pay whatever damages result from trespass of their cattle.

A third of the fine was to be paid to maintain the pond, and the remainder went as a perquisite to the fence viewers.—*Laure & Ord. N. Y., 46-65.

Joannes N. vis, the secretary of New Amsterdam, informs the court that he has seen a copy of an “answer” in a suit, written by Walwyn vander Veen, a notary, and wishes to know “whether such copying by others” than himself can be done. The court replies it cannot be done, but “that the papers in the suit, consisting of demand, answer, reply and rejoinder, which parties enter against each other, must be copied” by the secretary, and that he is entitled to the fees for the “answer” which the notary has transcribed. At the same time, the court warns the notary against accepting the fees, and threatens him with disbarment for six weeks if he again trespasses on the rights and perquisites of the secretary.—*Rec. Tomas Coninck, S. is charged by Schout Tonneman in the city court with having “unstamped measures” in his possession, “after the Crier had notified every one to have ells, cans and weights stamped by the sworn Measurer,” according to law. He is fined ten guilders.—Rec. N. Am., 77. In 1665, he was a resident of Pearl St.—ibid., 223.

July 4

Merritje Hoetlhl is charged in the city court by Schout Tonneman, who was “tapping” on Sunday morning during the sermon, who also states that he “found five persons at her house.” The case is postponed and beyond that the records are silent.—Rec. N. Am., 77.

July 15

Michael Taden is charged in the city court by the schout with having twelve Indians at his tavern (41 Pearl St.), and the schout demands he be fined 50 guilders according to ordinance. Taden is ordered to deposit the sum with the court. On the 8th, the schout in court demands the payment in “heavy money.” He says some of the Indians were drunk, but Taden alleges they came drunk “to his house and he tapped small beer for them, but no strong beer.” He is then fined 50 guilders, because “drunken Indians were found on Sunday at his house.”—Rec. N. Am., 85-83.

The burgomasters of New Amsterdam call upon the director-general and council and make “a statement of the grievances and discontent of many merchants and inhabitants” of the city, because they have been “forbidden by those of the Colony of New-Amstel on the Southriver to trade either with strangers or savages on the whole river,” which they allege is contrary to their privileges obtained “many years ago.” They say that Peter Alrichs have come to New Amsterdam from the South River, with a cargo worth twenty to thirty thousand guilders, and wants to know if persons who come from the Delaware to trade here “should not be obliged first to purchase citizenship (burgerright) and to keep an open shop for 6 weeks according to the privilege granted this City; also that these traders should not trade here with strangers and savages,” which is forbidden the inhabitants of New Amsterdam at the South River. A letter is written by the Rev. Samuel Driisius to the classis of Amsterdam, in which he expresses regret that Domine Heinriques Selyk of Goerdel, who has been very much in their midst, among them a number of the negroes, who are greatly grieved by his departure. He adds: "In reference to the places, in which he preached viz: the town of Brekleken and the Bouwerie [Stuyvesant's bowery], it is not yet positively decided, but I think it probable, that the son of Dom. Megapolenus, who has recently come over, will take charge of them, as he has not been sent by our patrons to any other place. The French on Staten-Island would also gladly have a preacher, but their families are few in number and poor, so that they cannot contribute much to the support of the Gospel and as our support here is unpunctual and small, there is reason he or she settle a preacher. In the meantime, that they may not be wholly destitute Governor Stuyvesant at their request, has permitted me to go and preach there every two months and administer the Lord's Supper. This I have done for about a year: in the winter season it is troublesome on account of the great water or bay, which must be crossed, and the showers and storms, which occur."—N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 391.

The ship "Gideon," for the account of the West India Co., lands at New Amsterdam 290 negro slaves, of which 153 are males and 137 females. Simon Cornelissens Gilde is captain of the slave-ship. These negroes were brought from the Coast of Guinea via Caraccas and the charter-party of the "Gideon," dated Nov.
15, 1663, was for a voyage from Holland to Africa to procure copper and elephants' tusks, and slaves for New Netherland.—

The general court of Massachusetts-Bay sends messengers to Nicolls, Cartwright, and the other royal commissioners with an answer to the proposals of the commissioners of July 27 in regard to the request for soldiers to cooperate "in reducing the Dutch at Manhatoes." The message was delivered to Nicolls on board the "Guinea," on the 20th instant, Old Style.—N. Y. State Library

The presiding officer of the city court of New Amsterdam, in addressing the members of the bench, refers to the prevailing rumour that the English frigates which have arrived at Boston are to come against New Amsterdam, and asks what action shall be taken in case he and his associate burgomaster are summoned to confer with the director-general and provincial council, particulary if the time does not admit of "calling a meeting of [the] Burgomasters and Scheepen." The members of the city court agree "to wait the time, in order to hear what demonstration the frigates" show, and to "regulate themselves afterwards accordingly."

Meanwhile, they make a demand on the provincial authorities for 25 negroes to labour eight days "at the Citys work," which are to be begun next week.

On Aug. 25, the court ordered by resolution that one-third of the inhabitants, without any exception, should "appear in person or put another in his place furnished with a shovell, spade or wheel-barrow, to labour every third day at the Citys works, on a penalty of six guilders for dereliction; that the guard should be kept and a whole company [be] paraded," beginning on this day (25th), when the drum was to be "beaten at five o'clock in the afternoon," that everyone who should guard was to receive a pound of powder and one and a half pounds of lead; furthermore, to conserve grain, the brewers were not to be allowed to "malt any hard grain during eight days nor brew beer higher than twelve guilders the run."

On the same day (25th), the city court petitioned Stuyvesant and the council in writing, declaring that they had positive information about the arrival of "four frigates" at Boston "or thereabouts in N. England, provided with a considerable number of soldiers with intention, as reports run, to attack and invade this place and the adjoining districts especially on Long Island," and then they were even then "on guard here."

The city fathers thought it manifest that the city should be put in a defensive state, and so asked for "eight pieces of good and heavy cannon provided with their carriages, balls swabs, brushes, picks and spoons." If this were granted, then the city would be "provided with a quantity of twenty-two pieces;" they also requested 50 pounds of powder for each piece of artillery, or altogether "eleven hundred pounds," as well as "half in proportion, also six hundred pounds of lead for bullets, to be used by the Burgers for their muskets." It was feared that New Amsterdam would have "to bear the first shot," before the fort was assaulted, and that it seemed "necessary to demand a greater number of people than the Burgery" could turn out, as the city had already provided a company of Burgers to "keep guard every night." They requested, on that account, that the city's contingent "be strengthened at first by soldiers and the Company's servants, and that the day watch . . . be kept by soldiers at both gates [the water and land gates], and in case of being besieged or attacked . . . all the soldiers and Company's servants with the Burghery" should "repair to this City's walls," it being con-considered that if the city were lost, the fort would be untenable," or very little sop" also, that if, "to skirmishing, any Burgery should require powder," he should "have free access to the Company to be furnished there with powder."

Stuyvesant, after a brief visit to Fort Orange, now (Monday) returns to New Amsterdam, only to meet at once the overwhelming difficulties of an invasion by the English.—N. Y. Col. Doc., II: 372.

The petition of the city court is now returned, with the apostil or marginal note of approval from the provincial body. That the fortifying might proceed speedily, Stuyvesant and the council at once contributed the company's negroes and "the company's a comforter" also to "assist with all possible might and means;" they sent six heavy cannon, as an addition to fourteen "previously delivered to the City," making the cannon for the city's use 20 in all; and also the requisite powder (1,000 lbs.) and lead (600 lbs.). They agreed, too, to promote the company's servants "to assist with the Burgery in the defense of the city, and made a provisional allowance "that one half the number of people" (i.e., the soldiers) should "watch by night with the Burghery and attend to the day watch at the Aug. City gates, so long as the Burghery work."—Rec. N. Am., V: 104-7. See also June 24, and Aug. 4/14.

Stuyvesant wrote on Sept. 9 to the classem of Amsterdam regarding the day's events as follows: "On the 26th of August [N. S.] there arrived in the Bay of the North River, near Staten Island, four great men-of-war, or frigates, well manned with sailors and soldiers. They were provided with a patent or commission from the King of Great Britain to demand and take possession of this province, in the name of His Majesty. If this could not be done in an amicable way, they were to attack the place, and everything was to be thrown open for the English soldiers to plunder, rob and pillage. . . .

"Our Directors are the most high and mighty Personages, with the municipal authorities of the city... asked that the whole business should be referred to His Majesty of England, and the Lords States General of the Netherlands; but every effort was fruitless. They landed their soldiers about two leagues from here, at Gravesend, and marched them over Long Island to the Ferry opposite this place."—Jameson, Nar. N. Neith., 414. There is another translation of this letter in N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 395-96. See, further, under Sept. 4.

Stuyvesant returning to New Amsterdam on the 25th (Nov. 24).—Bringing a considerable sum of money, now writes to the Dutch officials at Fort Orange, "Difficult, on account of my indisposition, was my departure from you; more difficult and troublesome were my return and arrival here, on last Monday [4th], on account of the report of the four English frigates, one of which the "Guine", showed herself, on the following Tuesday [9th], in the Bay, near Sandy Hook.

"Yesterday, being Thursday, three more arrived and sailed together up into the Bay of Noyack, where they remain at anchor up to the present time; they have sent the enclosed summons to all the Dutch towns, from which and from verbal statements, it is evidently to be inferred that they will endeavor to reduce not only this Capital [New Amsterdam] but also the whole Province to obedience to England.

"The naval and military force from Old England is estimated at 1,700, some say 3,000 men, in addition to the crowd daily expected from New England.

"You can easily consider in what a state of embarrassment and anxiety we find ourselves, without a hope of any relief. Therefore this serves chiefly to warn your Honors and all friends especially and mainly not to send down any Beavers or Peltries for fear of their falling into the hands of the English."

"I shall, as desirable, and indeed most necessary, that your Honors should assist us with some aid in men and powder, in case any hope or means remain of transporting and bringing them here in season and in safety."—N. Y. Col. Docs., II: 372. On Sept. 3 (N. S.), La Montagne and Van Rensselaer sent an answer, remarked that they did not to find the commissioners' Commission's letter, and said that, "at the request of some passengers, whose homes were "at the Manhattans," they had "convinced their delegation in a loop" bound for New Amsterdam.—Ibid., II: 373.

Stuyvesant writes to the royal commissioners, Nicolls and Cartwright, asking the reasons why the English hostile fleet lies in the bay before New Netherland, and sends the letter by a delegation to intimate "that with the utmost respect and civility, they doe desire and entreate of the Comander in Chief, of the aforesaid men of War or fighting, the intent and meaning of their approach, and continuing in the Harbour of Noyack [Nychack, below the Narrows, near Gravesend, between New Utrecht and Coney Island, without giving any notice to us, or first acquainting us with their designe, with Action hath caused much admiration [sic] in us, having not read any timely knowledge of the same, in respect to the Governor of the place, they ought, and were obliged to have done."—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 80-81.

Stuyvesant and the council send a letter to the commanding officer at Esopus (Kingston), in which they inform him of the arrival of the English fleet at Nychack (near Gravesend) on Long Island. They add: "We have therefore resolved for the better protection of this fort and consequently of the whole country to call down here the military, except that the Redoubt [Rondout] remain properly garrisoned. You are therefore directed, to send upon receipt hereof the Sergeant with the rest of the men immediately to this place."—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIII: 392-93.

The royal commissioners, Nicolls, Cartwright, et alii, publish by proclamation their design, under his majesty's command, for expelling or reducing to English control "all such forraigners, as have without his Majesty leave and consent seated themselves amongst any of his Dominions in America" (meaning the Dutch of New Netherland).—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 79. Col. Nicolls answers Stuyvesant’s letter of the day before by a letter conveyed to New Amsterdam by Col. George Cartwright and three other delegates, with a summons for surrender, claiming for the king of Great Britio the "unquestionable" right and title to these parts of America, and designating the "forraigners" as usurpers. Nicolls states that the king has commanded him "to his name to require a Surrender of all such forraughts, Townes, or places of strength" which are in the possession of the Dutch under Stuyvesant's command, adding: "And in his Majesty Name, I do demand the Towne, Situate upon the Island commonly known by the Name of Manhattoes with all the forraughts thereunto belonging, to be rendered unto his Majesty's obedience, and Protection into my hands." He adds: "That his Majesty being tender of the effusion of Christian blood, doth by these p[ices] confirm and Secure to every man his Estate, life, and liberty, who shall readily submit to him, and not employ any secret or open treacherous intencon, must expect all the miseries of a War, with they bring upon themselves." He expects an immediate answer.—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 81-83.

Stuyvesant acknowledges the receipt of Nicoll's letter of Aug. 20/30, and promises a full answer on the following day.—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 83.

The burgomasters of New Amsterdam request of Stuyvesant a copy of the letter of Col. Nicoll in which he demanded the surrender of the city, but are refused; whereupon a delegation from the burgesses of the city visits the provincial council and demands that the letter itself be a copy. On the following day, the burgomasters asked Stuyvesant to communicate to them the contents of a letter he had received from Gov. Winthrop of Connecticut, but he refused their request peremptorily, and tore the letter in pieces in their presence, against which they protested. Then they demanded to know the contents of Stuyvesant’s answer to the demand for surrender.—Col. Hist., MSS, Dutch, 268.

Stuyvesant writes a letter to the directors at Amsterdam, in which he informs them of the arrival of the English fleet, that New Island is lost, that New Amsterdam has been summoned to surrender, that popular murmurs and dissatisfaction exist, and that the loss of New Netherland is certain.—Col. Hist., MSS, Dutch, 368.

Gov. John Winthrop of Connecticut writes to Director-General Stuyvesant and his council from Gravesend, informing them that they has "late intelligence in the hands of the Right Honble Col. Richard Nicoll Commander in Chief of his Majes forces now arrived heere, & other his ma'ties Honble Commissioners," who have come from England under commission of King Charles II, in order "to reduce to his Majesties obedience all such foreigners as have without his Majesty leave, & consent seated themselves amongst any of his Dominions in America to the prejudice of his Majeys Subjects, & diminution of his Royall authority: . . . I understand also [he says] that they have in his Majesties name demanded the towne situate upon the Manhados, with all the forts thereto belonging, to be surrendered under his Majesties obedience I thought fit to give you this friendly advertisement, That I understand his Majeys command concerning this business is urgent and y' although he hath sent over very considerable forces exceedingly well fitted with all necessaries for warre with such Ingenious, & other expenides for strongest fortifications, yet hath also given them order to require assistance of all his Majesties Colonies, & subjects in New England, & hath directed his particular commands in his Royall letters to our Colonies: My serious advice therefore to your selfe, & all your people, as my best loving Neighbours, & friends is this, That you would speedily accept his Majesties terms, y' I understand hath been declared, & resign your selves under the obedience of his sacred Majestie y' you may avoid the effusion of blood, & all the good people of your nation, may enjoy all the happiness tendred, & more then you can imagine, vnder the protection of so gracious

23 inhabitants of Westchester, who were "committed Prisoners

Provision creeing with worms, whereby some of them remained diseased to this day, after w'w they were carried away in Chanoes, and layed in their Dungeon at Manhatoes."—N. Y. Col. Docis.,

Stuyvesant sends a long letter in answer to the summons to surrender, which Nicolls and Cartwright sent by deputies three days before. He denies the alleged "unquestionable" right and title of the English to the Dutch possessions, cites the charter granted to the West India Co. in 1621, and his own commission of July 26, 1646, as well as the extraordinary and inaccurate dates of Dutch settlers in New Netherlands. He accuses the country over which he has command and which he has been commissioned "to govern" ... in the name of ... the States General, as being Dutch by "first discovery, possession and Purchase of the Lands" from the Indians and others. Moreover, he refers to the Hartford treaty of 1650, which resulted from boundary disputes, but at which the Dutch jurisdiction itself was never questioned. He declares that the use of force by Nicolls would be a "breach of the Articles of peace" made between their sovereign nations, and offers a reference of the case for adjudication to their governments in Europe. Closing his letter, he writes: "As touching the threats in y'w Conclusion we have nothing to Answer, only that we fear nothing but what God (who is as just, as mercifull) shall lay upon us, all things being in his gracious disposal, and we may as well be preserved by him w'w small forces, as by a great

Mrs. Van Remselaer, in a description of the fort as it was at this time, observes (in Hist. City of N. Y., 1: 230-21): "New Netherland was in as good a condition for defence as any American colony. Fort Amsterdam, indeed, was a better fortification than could elsewhere be found. Yet the statement made at the time by Stuyvesant that the moiety of the wards were opened [see Aug.
27/Sept. 6], and various supporting documents show how impossible it was to defend city or fort against an invading force of any size."

The ten bakers of New Amsterdam are summoned to the city court to account for a declaration of an account that is available, which shows that the united stock amounted to 975 skelpos. The information is required on account of an expected sieg by the approaching English expedition. The date of the origi-

The Rev. Samuel Diasius, in his letter of Sept. 15 (N. S.), to the classis of Amsterdam, continued his narrative (see Aug. 16/16) thus: "The frigates came up under full sail on the 4th of September with guns trained on one side. They had orders, and intende, if any resistance was shown to them, to give a full broadside on this open place, then take it by assault, and make it a scene of pillage and bloodshed.

Our Hon. rulers of the Company, and the municipal authorities of the city, were induced to defend the place, but found that it was impossible, for the city was not in a defensible condition.
[See the remonstrance which the inhabitants addressed to Stuyvesant, N. Y. Col. Docis., II: 248; and Stuyvesant's defence, ibid., II: 944, and 473.] And even if fortified, it could not have been defended, because every man posted on the circuit it would have been four rods distant from his neighbor. Besides, the store of powder in the fort, as well as in the city, was small. No relief or assistance could be expected, while daily great numbers on foot and on horseback, from New England, joined the English, hotly bent upon plundering the place. Savages and privateres also furnished their services against the Dutch. Sir Henry Sloughter Northen Indians, with one hundred and fifty French privaters, had an even English commission. Therefore upon the earnest request of our citizens and other inhabitants, our authorities found themselves compelled to come to terms, for the sake of avoiding bloodshed and pillage. The negotiations were concluded on the 6th of September [see Articles of Surrender, Aug. 27/Sept. 6]. The English moved in on the 8th [see Aug. 29/Sept. 8], according to agreement."—

Stuyvesant writes another letter to Nicolls, in which he says nothing remains to him but to defend himself against the advances of Nicolls that he surrender; yet, as he views the possibilities of attack and defence, he sees that there would be "a great deal of blood spilt" and "greater difficulty" might arise hereafter; it has therefore been "thought fit" to send to Nicolls deputies to avert the disaster and to arrange a "place & hour" for deputies from Nicolls to meet "with full Commission to treat, and seek out the means of a good accommodation, and in the meantime, to cause all hostility to cease."—N. Y. State Library Bull., History
No. 2, 85-86.

A number of negroes, "half slaves" of the West India Co. at New Amsterdam, ask to be "manumitted and made entirely free;"
granted.—Col. Hist. MSa, Dutch, 269.

Nicolls answers Stuyvesant's letter of the same day, in which the director-general sought a parley or conference of deputies.
Nicolls renews his "first Summons and message ... for a speedy surrender of the Townes, to avert the manifold obedi-ce & Proteccon." He declares his willingness to send deputies, if "by such a meeting" Stuyvesant means "to treat upon Articles of Surrender." His salutation to Stuyvesant and good wishes for the inhabitants are expressed in gracious words.—N. Y. State Library

The inhabitants of New Amsterdam sign a remonstrance to Stuyvesant and his council, urging them not to reject the terms offered by the English for the surrender of New Netherland, but to meet the conditions in the speediest, best and most reputable manner.—N. Y. Col. Docis., III: 218-19.

Stuyvesant and his council commissioners depute to treat with Nicolls in arranging the articles of surrender, in such a way that 1664. Bloodshed, plunder, and murders may be averted, and, in consideration of the promise of Nicolls, "to redeliver the fort and

City of Amsterdam, in New Netherland in Case the difference of the province" is adjusted by the home governments.

Aug. Col. Richard Nicolls, "Commander in Chief of all his Mai-esties Fierce, now beleagueringe the Towne, on ye 26th of Sept., accepts the proposal made by the Governo[7]r and his Counsell, three residing officers of the former accommodation by Articles of Surrender of the said Towne and forts, thenceunto belonging, under his Maiesties obedience," and he names deputies to meet with those who have been appointed by the Dutch provincial government. The English are represented by Sir Robert Carr, Col. George Cartwright, Gov. John Winthrop, and Counsellor Samuel Willys of Connecticut, and Capt. Thomas Clarke and John Pinchon of Massachusetts. The Dutch delegation consists of Councillor

Johan de Decker, Capt. Nicholas Varlet, Dr. Samuel Megapoleleus, Burgess-master Cornelis Stenwynck, former burgomaster

Oloff Stevensen van Cortlandt, and former schout Jacques Couseau. Nicolls signs the commission "at the Camp before the Manhatans." The deputies agree to meet on the following day

Articles of surrender are consented to at Stuyvesant’s bowery

27th by representatives of the Dutch of New Netherland and the royal Sept. English commissioners who, as we have seen, have associated with themselves four leaders of Connecticut and Massachusetts.

These articles provide for the free enjoyment of all farms and houses owned by the West India Co., except such as are in the forts, and all public houses are to continue in use as before.

The people are to "continue free Denizens and enjoy their Lands, Houses, Goods, Ships, wheresoever they may be" in the province, and dispose of them as they please.

Any inhabitant inclined to leave the country is given a year and six weeks "to remove himselfe, wife, Children, Servants, and Goods, and to dispose of his Lands."

Officials who are minded to go to England are offered free transportation when the frigates return overseas.

People who come from the Netherlands as planters and

Dutch vessels are allowed freely to come and go, carrying back to

The Netherlands either persons or merchandise.

The open shipping trade is to be enjoyed for six months.

The Dutch inhabitants are granted freedom of worship.

No Dutch ship is to be forced to serve in war "against any Nations whatever."

The townsman of Manhattan are not to be required to billet any soldiers "without being satisfied and paid for them by their Officers," and, if, the fort proves incapable of quarrelling all of them, then the burgomasters of New Amsterdam are to "appoint some houses capable to receive them."

The Dutch custom governing inheritances is continued.

All public archives pertaining to inheritances, the church, the poor, or orphans, are to "be carefully kept by those in whose province it stands, and the records which particularly concern

the states-general may at any time be sent to Holland.

Other provisions regulate court judgments; travel to and traffic with England, the English possessions, and the Indians; debts; and the continuation of civil officers and magistrates in office until the regular time of new elections, provided they take the oath of allegiance to the king of England.

Contracts and bargains made before the treaty are to be "determined according to the manner of the Dutch."

The military officers and soldiers are to "March out with their Arms, Drums Beating, and Colours flying and lighted Matches."

Redelivery of the province is to be made immediately if at any time hereafter" the king of Great Britain and the states-general agree to it.

Finally, it is agreed that certified copies of the grant of Charles II to the Duke of York, and of the duke’s commission to Nicolls, shall be delivered to ye Honble Mr Stuyvesant the present

Governor, on Monday next [Aug. 29, Sept. 8] by eight of ye Clock in

A contemporary Dutch broadside of these articles, probably issued in Holland as a news bulletin, is reproduced as Pt. 13,

Vol. IV, from the original in the N. Y. Pub. Library. This is headed (translated):

"Articles of Surrender of New Netherland on the 25th of August, Old Style, Anno 1664." It continues:

"Symon Gidsle van Barop, skipper of the ship 'Gideon,' coming from Menaten or New Amsterdam, in New Netherland, reports to the Governor of New Netherland, on the 8th of September, New Style, that he was delivered over to the English on the following conditions . . .

(reproduction).

Opinions as to the identity of the "oude Molens" (old mill), mentioned in the last section of these articles, are considered in the description of the Nicolls Map or Survey, Pt. 10 Aa, p. 214, Vol. I.

Examination of the evidence now at hand makes it almost certain that the conclusion there reached as to the identity of the "old mill" was erroneous, and that the reference is after all to Pieterson's

The surrender was confirmed by the Treaty of Breda, July 21, 1667 (p. 5). After later reoccupation by the Dutch, and subsequent recapture by the English, New York was secured to the English by the Treaty of Westminster, Feb. 9/19, 1674 (p. 5).

In the year 1666, Stuyvesant, in his "Answer" to the charges which were made against him by the West India Co., for surrendering to the English without a demonstration of resistance, stated to the states-general that the fort of New Amsterdam could have been "reduced by 500 men in less than thirteene 12 hours," and he gave the following description of the fort and of the conditions with which he was confronted at the time:

"First. The fort is situated at a strategic place, where it was located on the first discovery of New Netherland, for the purpose of resisting any attack of the Barbarians rather than an assault of European arms, having, within pistol shot, on the North and Northeast sides, higher ground than that on which it stands, so that, notwithstanding the walls and works (muraure) are raised on the said side, people on high ground can see the soles of the feet of those on the esplanade and bastions of the fort, where the view is not obstructed by the houses and church in it, and by the gables on the wall.

"Secondly. The fort was and is encompassed only by a slight wall, 2 @ 3 feet thick, backed by coarse gravel, not above 8 & 60 feet high in some places, in others higher, according to the fall of the ground.

"Thirdly. It is, for the most part, crowded all round about with buildings better adapted for a citadel than for defence against an open enemy; the houses are, in many places, higher than the walls, and bastions and render these wholly exposed; most of the houses also have cellars not eight rods distant from the wall of the fort, in some places not 2 @ 3, and at one point scarce a rod from

Tell, the fort, the Burgers, and the surrounding people, who, between one and 18 years old, amounted to fully 12,000, would be under the necessity of seeking their retreat and support in the little fort, whose plane, wall to wall, is less than 150 feet in length and breadth."—N. Y. Col. Doc., II: 440–41. The "Reply" of the directors of the company is in ibid., II: 489; ff.

Twelve furnished a ruin in some little written outside a wall. The following affair was made in 1666, relative to the circumstances connected with the surrender of New Netherland, viz. "This day, the 4th of March 1666, appeared before me, Henr. Outgers, notary public, etc., in the presence of the hereinafter named witnesses, Harmen Martense van den Busch, 26 years of age, and Evert Willemse Munnick, 33 years of age, both of whom served the Chartered West India Company of this country in the capacity of sergeants in New Netherland, even at the time when the same was surrendered to the English, and at the request of the Honorable Directors of the Chartered West India Company, Chamber of this city, did, declared, attested and deposited for the truth that in the year 1664, and a considerable time before the arrival of the English to whom the aforesaid province of New Netherland was surrendered, when news was received that a force would come to capture the aforesaid place if possible, they failed to notice or discover that any effort was made by the government to put the place of New Amsterdam in a posture of defense; that they had resolved to offer resistance to the English, and that they, the deponents, and the soldiers under their command, being willing and resolved to defend the aforesaid places to the utmost, helped to repair the defenses of the city and the fort and made every effort to put them in a posture of defense, so that after this had been accomplished as far as the short time at their disposal permitted, they began to notice that some of the burgurers became fainthearted and instead of keeping watch with the soldiers as they used to do, did not come to the guard-house any more; that, therefore, seeing that the burgurers were apparently unwilling to help protect themselves and their property, they and the other military, being about 150 strong, moved into the fort to defend it; that meanwhile, some negotiations having commenced between the English and the Director, of which the deponents did not know the substance, two of the aforesaid frigates, being very poorly mounted, to their great astonishment came sailing in the harbor (the bay) to parley. But, when the Burgers, seeing that they were approaching and the soldiers seeing that no preparations were being made to prevent it, they began to murmur and to declare roundly that they were sold; that the aforesaid frigates, sailing along, actually passed the fort, without a shot being fired to prevent it, as could easily have been done. That two or three days later, the negotiations having continued, the deponents were notified that an agreement had been reached and that they were to march out with flying colors, drums beating and bullets in their mouths, which news was received by the military with peculiar dissatisfaction, mainly because they considered themselves sufficiently strong to resist the force that was then about the place and were in no danger unless it was considerably increased, for the soldiers and sailors who had come from Old England in the frigates were but about 400 strong and were very poor and inexperienced men. Furthermore, that the soldiers of the Company were not allowed the honor of seeing the English when they came, for fear that, being full of courage and spirit, they might attack the English, as indeed they had plenty of courage and bravery to do, with a fair prospect that they would have cut the English up. That, therefore, they first embarked on the ship Gideon and that thereafter entered the city of the fort, having meanwhile kept themselves out of their sight on the bosom.

Furthermore, the aforesaid Evert Willemse Munnick, alone, declares that at the time the aforesaid frigates passed the fort, Director General Stuyvesant acted as if he wanted to go to the gunner to order him to fire on them, but that the ministers Mega-politen, Aether and son, practically led him away and induced him to leave.
"And the aforesaid Harmen Martense, alone, declares that he knows very well that they were of no importance and had little fear, of which nothing was to defeat the enemy, but that the secretary and counsellor van Ruyven having sent his wife ahead to meet the English, he asked the said secretary what they, to wit, the government, intended to do while he sent his wife to the English, whereupon he answered that they had no powder and that the English were their friends, but that on the contrary, when they were embarked on board the Gideon and asked for the powder with which they were to be supplied, Captain Marten Krüger told them that he would provide it, but that for fear that the soldiers would attack the English, he had had two kegs of powder brought to his house instead of on board.

"Finally, the aforesaid deponents jointly declare that the wife of Nicolaes Meyer, free merchant there, in going out of the fort with Mrs. van Ruyven, when she saw that the soldiers intended to offer resistance, said: “Those lousy dogs want to fight because they have nothing to lose, whereas we have our property here, which we should have to give up.”" —Affidavit, relating to the surrender of New Netherland, made on March 4, 1665, before Notary Henrick Outgers, at Amsterdam, Holland, and entered in No. 6 of the records of that notary, now deposited in the Gemeente Archief of the city of Amsterdam. Translated by A. J. F. van Laer from a typewritten copy of the Dutch text, furnished to him in June, 1919, by Mr. Desiré S. van Zuiden, of The Hague, Holland.

Col. Richard Nicolls, on this day—the day of the surrender of New Netherland to him—reveals to Capt. John Young his intention of summoning deputies from the several towns to assemble at a convenient time and place, in order “to propose and give their advice in all Matters tending to ye peace and benefit of Long Island,” and desires Young to impart these things to his friends and neighbours. This was the first revelation of the idea which came to a head March 1, 1665 (p.v), and the calling of that meeting was delayed until too late in the season and then it was considered inconvenient in the winter “to put the Inhabitants to the trouble of sending any Deputies, to meet in relacon to ye affairs of the Island.” When the Hempstead meeting was called, John Young was one of the two deputies from Southold.—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 100, 133, 156.

Evidence that Col. Richard Nicolls changed the name of New Amsterdam on this, the day of its surrender, is found in his letter to Capt. John Young, which is dated at “Yorke.” The letter directs Capt. Young “to take an exact list of ye Names of those of long Island, who have taken upp Armes” under his command “for their King and Country,” with their addresses, that he may reward them; it requires that their arms may remain in their hands, and that a known body of militia may be ready to be called upon when necessary.—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 100.

On the same day, the royal commissioners dated their letter to the governour of Massachusetts “from New Yorke vpon the Island of the Manhattoes.”—Ibid., 100-1.

The Rev. Samuel Drisius, in his letter to the classis of Amsterdam of Sept. 15 (N. S.), continued his narrative (see Aug. 16/26 and Aug. 25/Sept. 4) thus: “After the surrender of the place several Englishmen, who had lived here a long time and were our friends, came to us, and said that God had signalised overruled matters, that the affair had been arranged by negotiations; else nothing but pillage, bloodshed and general ruin would have followed. This was confirmed by several soldiers who said that they had come here from England hoping for booty; but that now, since the matter turned out so differently, they desired to return to England.

“The Articles of Surrender stipulate that our religious services and doctrines, together with the preachers, shall remain and continue unchanged. Therefore we could not separate ourselves from our congregation and hearers, but consider it our duty to remain with them for some time yet, that they may not scatter and run wild. “The Hoa Company still owes me a considerable sum, which I hope and wish they would pay. Closing herewith I recommend your Honors’ persons and work to God’s blessing and remain,

“Your willing colleague,

“Samuel Drisius.”

THE ENGLISH PERIOD
1664–1763
CHAPTER II

THE ENGLISH PERIOD

1664-1763

A BRIEF summary of the principal events of the English Colonial period of New York City's history, from the surrender of New Amsterdam by the Dutch on Aug. 29/Sept. 8, 1665, to the Treaty of Paris, Feb. 10, 1763, which gave to the English control of the lands in North America lying east of the Mississippi River is to be found in Vol. I, Chap. II, pp. 445.

Aug. 29/Sept. 8, 1665, is a "Register of the principal events" connected therewith, under this date, in which is found the following paragraph:

"And thereupon, without any other occurrence, was, as above stated, the place of New Amsterdam, surrendered to the English, the garrison retiring with all their arms, flying colors and beating drums; and thereby the English, without any contest or claim being before put forth by any person to it, took possession of a fort built and continually garrisoned about forty years at the expense of the West India Company."

The city court of New Amsterdam is informed "that divers soldiers," who have "worked for the City," claim "about four hundred guilders," hence, "means must be provided." The court, therefore, orders the farmers of the excise on beer and slaughtering to make immediate returns to the city treasury, and directs the city treasurer to make an immediate accounting of "the City's income and disbursements," while public notice is given to all the city's debtors to pay within eight days.—Rec. N. Am., V: 107-8.

Sir Robert Carr is commissioned by Nicolls, Cartwright, and Maverick as commander of an expedition for the reduction of the Delaware country to the obedience of Charles II. His instructions read: "When you are come near unto ye 7th fort with is possessed by the Dutch you shall send ye Boate on Shoare, to Summon the Governores and Inhabitants to yield obedience to his Majestie as the Rightfull Soevereign of that Tract of Land, and lett him and them know, that his Majestie is graciously pleased, that all the Planters shall Enjoy their flame, Houses, Lands, Goods & Chattels, with the same privileges, and upon the same Terms, which they do now possess them, Only that they Change their Masters, whether they be the West India Company or the City of Amsterdam." Provisions are made also for conciliating the Swedes and for an understanding with the lord proprietor of Maryland.—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 104, 125-17.

An agreement with the Delaware magistrates, including the oath of allegiance to the king of Great Britain, was signed on Oct. 1.—Ibid., 127-25.

Rev. Samuel Driscoll writes to the classis of Amsterdam an account of the surrender of New Amsterdam, as follows: "I cannot refrain from informing you of our present situation, namely, that we have been brought under the government of the King of England. On the 26th of August [N. S.] there arrived in the Bay of the North River, near Staten Island, four great men-of-war, or frigates, well manned with sailors and soldiers. They were provided with a patent or commission from the King of Great Britain to demand and take possession of this province, in the name of His Majesty. If this could not be done in an amiable way, they were to attack the place, and everything was to be thrown open for the English soldiers to plunder, rob and pillage. We were not a little troubled by the arrival of these frigates."

"Our Director-General and Council, with the municipal authorities of the city took the matter much to heart and zealously sought, by messages between them and General Richard Nicolls, to delay the decision. They asked that the whole business should be referred to His Majesty of England, and the Lords States General of the Netherlands; but every effort was fruitless. They landed their soldiers about two leagues from here, at Gravesend, and marched them over Long Island to the Ferry opposite this place. The frigates came up under full sail on the 4th of September [N. S.] with guns trained to one side. They had orders, and intended, if any resistance was shown to them, to give a full broadside on this place, then take it by assault, and make it a scene of pillage and bloodshed."

"Our Hon. rulers of the Company, and the municipal authorities of the city, were inclined to defend the place, but found that it was impossible, for the city was not in a defensible condition. And even if fortified, it could not have been defended, because every man posted on the circuit of it would have been four rods distant from his neighbor. Besides, the store of powder in the fort, as well as in the city, was small. No relief or assistance could be expected, while daily great numbers on foot and on horseback, from New England, joined the English, hotly bent upon plundering the place. Savages and privaters also offered their services against us. Six hundred Northern Indians with one hundred and fifty French privaters, had even an English commission. Therefore upon the earnest request of our citizens and other inhabitants, our authorities found themselves compelled to come to terms, for the sake of avoiding bloodshed and pillage. The negotiations were concluded on the 6th of September [N. S.]. The English moved in on the 8th [N. S.], according to agreement. —Jameson, Nar. N. Neth., 414-15, which is a slight revision of Rec. N. Am., I: 560-61. Another translation is in N. Y. Col. Doc., XIII: 199-94. For other portions of the letter, see Aug. 16/26, Aug. 25/Sept. 4; Aug. 29/Sept. 8.

The earliest recognition of the name New York ("Jork") in the minutes of the city court appears on this date, in a letter written by the court to the directors of the Amsterdam chamber of the West India Co., in which they tell about the surrender of the city and province to the English authority.—Rec. N. Am., V: 116. Its earliest appearance on a map is found on a very rare map of the world (160's 5'), dated, and published this year by Joseph Moxon, London.—British Museum Cat., No. — copy (New Neth. portion) in author's collection.

The city court resolves to write to the directors of the West India Co. at Amsterdam, informing them of the capture of their city by the English and concerning the establishment of English authority in the province. This letter begins: "We, your Honorable and Loyal, sorrowful and desolate subjects, cannot neglect nor keep from relating the event, which through God's pleasure thus unexpectedly happened to us in consequence of your Honorable neglect and forgetfulness of your promise—to wit, the arrival here, of late, of four King's frigates from England, sent hither by his Majesty and his brother, the Duke of York, with commission to reduce not only this place, but also the whole Netherland under his Majesty's authority, whereunto they brought with them a large body of soldiers, provided with considerable ammunition. On board one of the frigates were about four hundred and fifty as well soldiers as seamen, and the others in proportion." The letter then recites the summons sent by Nicolls to Stuyvesant and the subsequent negotiations which led to the surrender, and describes the circumstances which prevented resistance by the Dutch, who had demanded three days' time for consultation, which had been allowed. "But meanwhile they [the English] were not idle; they approached with their four frigates, two of which passed in front of the Fort [Fort Amsterdam], the other anchored about Nooten [now Governors Island] and with five companies of soldiers encamped themselves at the Ferry [at Breuckelen], opposite this place, together with a newly raised Company of horse and a party of new soldiers, both from the north [New England] and from long Island, mostly all our deadly enemies, who expected nothing else than pillage, plunder, and violence from them.

After the fall of the House of Burgesses on March 16, 1664, the colony was governed by the governor and his council, which were appointed by the king and his privy council in London. The governor was responsible for enforcing the laws of the colony and maintaining order, while the council advised him on matters of policy.

His son, where they took the oath of allegiance to English authority.

The importance of this newly-discovered record is in its revelation of Melyn's attitude toward the capture of New Netherland, and because it is later than any record hitherto known in relation to him in the history of the affairs of 1663. See Innes, op. cit., 122, 351; Van Rensselaer, Hist. City of N. Y., 1: 486.

The Dutch and Swedes on the Delaware capitulate to the English, and for the first time every mile of the Atlantic coast from the north-east corner of Maine to the southern limits of Georgia is under the British flag. For further particulars in connection with this important step in the history of North America, and the extension of British rule, see N. Y. Col. Docs., III: 71.

The Dutch ministers of New Amsterdam, Joannes Megapolensis and Samuel Drissius, come into the city court and state that they have received their discharge from the West India Co., "dated the last of the month of November," notwithstanding which "they are inclined to serve the Commonwealth," they have addressed themselves "to the Governor Richard Nicholls [sic] and spoke to his Honour about the wages." They state that he told them their wages ran "for the time of six months, to which time the Company as such recognize (i.e., duties), after which time he would see how to arrange the matter. As the ministers are now in doubt as to how they should "regulate themselves," they seek the advice of the city authorities, from whom they receive assurance that their salaries will have due consideration, the same as "the other servants of the City."" Rec. N. Am., V: 133-34.

Evert Pietersen, who has been schoolmaster since 1661, and employed at a fixed salary by the West India Co. (see May 9, 1661), requests from the burgomasters and schepens, now that "his allowance from the Company is struck off," that they "keep him at the same allowance, to wit: fl. 36 per month, fl. 25 for board, Holland currency, and free house, salary of four guilder to passage to Patria." He is told "to be patient for the space of eight days, when his petition shall be disposed of." "Rec. N. Am., V: 137. His "eight days" having expired, he appeared in court on Oct. 18, and sought an answer. He was notified "to wait still a day or two."" Ibid., V: 144. It was actually necessary for him to wait much longer (see Apr. 25, 1665).

"One agreement was written out and very nearly made, declaring that Connecticut should not come within twenty miles of the Hudson River [Nov. 30, 1664—see N. Y. Colonial MSS., LXXIX: 4], but, as it did not receive the signatures of the contracting parties, it had no force. New York historians, like Brodhead [Hist. State of N. Y., 1: 255], are therefore wrong when they declare: 'It was well known that it had been settled in 1664 that the boundary should be everywhere twenty miles from Hudson's River.'"—Bowen, Boundary Disputes of Conn., 69-70. See, further, Dec. 14.

The city court that day told Gov. Nicolls they told them on the evening previous that he would "appear in person to administer the oath with that view [the] Burgomasters should summon to this City Hall the Magistracy of this City and some of the principal inhabitants.

When assembled accordingly at the city hall, Gov. Nicolls came in, accompanied by his secretary, Matthias Nicolls, and, looking around, asked where Stuyvesant, Van Ruyten, and the city's preachers Megapolensis and Drissius were. The burgomasters replied that "it was not known that they should be sent for." Nicolls, however, said he felt "that they would immediately come." Gov. Nicolls then asked each one present to take the oath of allegiance as "a true subject to the king of Great Britain," and to be obedient to the king, to the Duke of York, and to such governors and officers as were appointed by such authority.

In the original record, the form of the oath is recorded in both English and Dutch. When the oath had been read to the meeting by the governor himself, "divers debates occurred thereupon by some of the assembly," and "finally all the meeting roundly declared that they could not take such oath, unless the governor added to the form the words "conformable to the Articles concluded on the Surrender of this place." This they desired because "they feared" by taking such oath "the Governor might hereafter give it to nullify or render void the articles." Megapolensis and Van Ruyten, however, said they saw no impediment to taking such oath.

Others of the assembly squibbled over the oath so long that Gov. Nicolls "finally departed with his secretary from the meeting," which then adjourned.

On the following Tuesday (18th), "the burgomasters went with the Treasurer's book of the City accounts" to the governor, "and placed the same in his hands together with the bond granted to the City by the late Director General and Council." Then and there "decrees arose on both sides in [the] presence of Coll. Cartwright and Mr Thomas Willet regarding the oath." The governor said "that the Commonalty were greatly distracted by some," the burgomasters deny any knowledge thereof, and "persisted again that they could not take the oath" until after the demanded words had been inserted. Then Nicolls exhibited to them a written declaration, which denied the "false and heretical assertion cast upon the Oath of Obedience," namely, that signing it would annul and make of no effect "the Articles of peace so late and solemnly made, signed and sealed." He declared that the articles were not in the least "broken or intended to be broken by any words or expressions in the oath, and he further said consider anyone who circulated such a false construction as a disturber of the peace, and would proceed against him. He ordered the declaration to be "forthwith read to all the Inhabitants and Registered" people, and "that every denizen" be obliged to take the oath, if he intended to remain in the province.

On Oct. 20, the general meeting assembled again. The former proceedings and the declaration of Nicolls were read. The conferences agreed unanimously that the oath could be taken with safety, "provided the abovementioned Governor Nicolls would "seal his given writing" or declaration.—Rec. N. Am., V: 145-46. This declaration and the form of the oath are given in N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 118-19, 145-46. See also Man. Com. Coun. (1854), 521-27. For form of oath, see Aldenida.

As city schout, Pieter Tonneman, about to depart for Holland, asks the city court to give him his discharge from office and appoint a successor. He also asks for "a settlement from the City under the City's seal and signatures," and the "payment of his services according to the salary granted by the City." On the 20th, Tonneman told the general meeting which had assembled to act on the oath of allegiance which Gov. Nicolls required that he was unable to advise that subject, but he intended "to depart for Holland with the ship lying ready to sail." There was delay; on Nov. 22, he again requested the city court to choose another in his place "at the next Court day," so that he could then "take his leave" and also "wish his successor luck in his place." The city court thereupon resolved "to invite the old Burgomasters and Schepens to meet them in this City Hall at three o'clock in the afternoon, to choose, in form of a common Council," a successor to Tonneman. Accordingly, this common council assembled, and those present were informed by the presiding officer of the object of their being convened, and that Tonneman wanted "to depart with the ship the Eendracht lying ready to sail." Nominations were made and Allard Anthony received a plurality of votes as new schout, subject to "the approbation of the Hon'ble Governum Nicolls."

On Nov. 29, Tonneman sat with the city court for the last time. At this session he communicated "in writing his retirement from the Bench," and asked for a certificate as evidence that he had performed the duties of his office "to the best of his power" and in the interest of the country and its inhabitants. This was granted and he received also the thanks of the bench. In regard to his salary he asked to wait because the city war "burned" his "last two thirds." On Dec. 8, Gov. Nicolls issued a passport to him to go to Holland in the "Eendracht" (Unity).—Rec. N. Am., V: 145, 145, 159, 160, 166-67; N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 140.

Margriet Jelles is charged in the city court by Schout Tonneman with having "five persons at her house on Sunday night between two and three o'clock in the morning." She was fined 30 guilders, —Rec. N. Am., V: 140. The offense was taking at an unlawful hour.
Nicolas Bayard, as assistant to Cornelis van Ruyven, late Oct. receiver-general of the West India Co. in New Netherland, is appointed to make up the company’s books, etc.—Col. Hist. MSS., Dec. 24.

Sir Robert Carr is recalled from the Delaware, because his answer interferes with "the good settlement of his Maites affairs in ye several Colonies of New England," which his fellow commissioners, Nickolls, Cartwright, and Maverick, said "was the principal end" for which they were employed.—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. N. Y., Col. Doc., treat. 59.

Col. Richard Nickolls is commissioned by his fellow commissioners, Cartwright and Maverick, "to repair to Delaware Bay, and there to take special care for the good Governor" thereof, "and to depute such Officer or Officers therein" as he thinks fit "for the management of his Maites affairs, both civil and military, until his Maites pleasure" is "further known."—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. N. Y., Col. Doc., treat. XII: 459.

In a declaration of the articles of surrender on the customs and shipping at the port of New York is shown in no order from Gov. Nickolls to the collector, Thomas Delaval, as follows: "Whereas the Articles of Surrender of this Towne of New York do not expressly set downe the true meaning and intent of the Recognizor, nor to whom it shall be paid, yet for the good of this place, I have been, and am still content it shall be rec'd by Mr. Cornelius van Ruyven; But in regard there is in this Harbour, a Ship called the Unity [Eendracht] of Amsterdam, and doth take in Tobaccoes towards her Lading, which are brought from his Maites Plantagon; It being not mentioned in ye Articles that there is leave so to do, nor is it permitted by the Lawes of England, yet for the pretence to Encoourage the Inhabitants of this place, I am willing that they do so load their Tobaccoes, they paying here the Customs and Duties sett downe in the Booke of Rates, as they are usaullly paid in England. And by reason that I may not have retournes from Engild so soon as I expected, and shall want accomodation for my Souldiers, and to prevent the disorders and inconveniences that may happen to this Towne thereby, I have thought fit to order a Cent he rec'd upon all that has already Ship'd in this Harbour, or shall be Ship'd, over and above the lo. & l 12. Cent formerly paid to the West India Company, with payment to be in Content Beaver, or the value, where ywe are to looke narrowly after, and for so doing, this shall be ywe Warrant."—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. N. Y., No. 2. 122-23. See also Nov. 26.

Thomas Carverth is appointed by Gov. Nickolls "a Publique Notarie afterwards of New York," and gave notice that there is no other public notary in the city who understands "the English Tongue."—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. N. Y., No. 2. 122.

The burgomasters and schepen, now the city council of New York, and in that capacity not only sold the town on beer and wine, and the excise on "all cattle slaughtered for consumption" in the city. They designate Tuesday, Nov. 8, for this purpose, and direct the secretary of the city "to write and affix notices." As nothing was done then, another order, of the 24th, directed the secretary to write and affix notices for the farming to take place on the 30th, "at the house of Juffrouw Welkes at four o'clock in the afternoon."—Rec. N. Ams., V. 155, 166.

James Davison (James Davids), an Englishman, is charged by Schout Tonneman in the city court with having four persons drinking at his house "last Sunday about ten o'clock, during preaching." He responds that he had "no club . . . sitting and he did not tap within doors, but sold drink by the flag and small measure out of a Corr and two and a half gour of friends," and he is fined 12 guilders. Davison had taverns in New Amsterdam and in Albany.—Rec. N. Ams., V. 124 (note), 152.

Schout Tonneman charges in the city court that he found four persons drinking at the house of Egbert Meindersen on Sunday during preaching, contrary to law. Meindersen’s wife appearing, says "that four Englishmen came to her house demanding a drink of beer for their thirst, which she refused them," because she feared the scoundrel would come and fine her; but they said "they were very thirsty" and would "guarantee against the trouble. She is fined 12 guilders.—Rec. N. Ams., V. 152.

Jonas Bartelson, the “Farmer of the Great Excise on wines consumable by the tapsters and tavernkeepers” of New Amsterdam, appears in the city court against Hendrick Obe, demanding that he be fined for the wines laid in by him and not entered, according to the order of depute Binn of the city. Obe is charged with the costs of the action. Obe in rebuttal says he does "not tap to every one" and that he lodges strangers. He maintains he is "not obliged to pay the full excise." He is condemned to pay Bartelson "the full excise on the wines laid in and not entered, with costs of clerk hire."—Rec. N. Ams., V. 155-54.

On the 22d, Obe produced the above judgment in court, and declared that he had "laid in some wines not only to tap them, but to sell again," and asked the court if he was obliged to pay excise on more than he had tapped. The court persisted in its original judgment and decreed that Obe would "have to store the wines" on which he intended to sail, and that the town had their right. Obe is permitted to sail, and is ordered to pay the excise, but elsewhere, as well as make return of the amount of wine he tapp'd.—Id., V. 158-59.

Capt. Hugh Hyde, commander of H. M. S. “Guineas,” comes to Port James in New York and gives notice to Gov. Nickolls that his vessel is fitted up and ready to sail, but stays only for a favourable wind. He had been ordered, on Oct. 26, by the three royal commissioners, Nickolls, Cartwright, and Maverick, to set sail “directly for Portsmouth [Portsmouth, England], giving his Royal Highnesses notice” of his arrival. Hyde was delayed from sailing, in order “to notify the Officers of His Majesty’s of the arrival of the ship,” and that the ship was in the garrison of New York, and, as that mutiny had been “appeased,” the royal commissioners sent him another sailing order on Nov. 22, this time with directions to “touch upon the western parts of England, for advice, and from thence to Portsmouth.”—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. N. Y., No. 2. 124, 155, 153.

Prior to this, Cornelis van Ruyven had sailed to the south-east corner of Broadway and Wall St.—See 1664.

The “Prince Grant” (Broad Street between Beaver to Wall St.) is mentioned in a record of this date.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 2. See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 1068.

“The Beavers Grant” (Beaver Street between Broadway and Broad St.) is mentioned in a land record of this date.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 3. See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 993.

“The Marketfield” is mentioned in a land record of this date. The house conveyed was on the corner of the Beaver Grant and overtook the New York church, called the "Marketfield Church." This record goes to show that the name was at this time applied to more than the present Whitehall Street, and included the large open space or plain before the fort, at the outlet of Broadway.—Min. of Orph. Court, II: 3. See also Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 1005.

The president of the city court composes a letter to His Royal Highness, James, Duke of York, on behalf of the city fathers of New York, in which they promise obedience to the duke, and say they esteem themselves fortunate that he has provided them "with so gentle, wise, and intelligent a gentleman" for their governor as Col. Richard Nicolls, and they are confident "that under the wings of this valiant gentleman" the city will "thrive and grow like the Cedar on Lebanon." They request for the city "the same rights and privilege, that his Majesty our King and most gracious Lord is concerning on all his subjects in England; that is, that ships of all nations may come and bring into England the products of their own country, and may sail thence thereunto back again free and without impost on condition of paying the King's duty." But, on account of the impoverished condition of the city of New York, they ask that no more be paid other than "the charges and expenses" which are included in the fee payable by shippers and goods which come "from other places out of England, or even from England to Boston or any places in New England," or go "to their own countries." At the end of this period, they suggest the duke will see the advancement of the province, even to his deriving "great revenue" from it. Cornelis Ruyven, a councilman, "then peopled with thousands of families and great trade by sea from New England and other places out of Europe, Africa or America." For consummating these things "with greater pleasure, red and courage," they request "that all privileges and prerogatives which the duke will grant, "in addition to those inserted and conditioned in the capitulation on the surrender," may "be made known by Letters Patent" from the duke and the king, "not only in the United Provinces, but also in France, Spain, and all Hansa and Eastern places." This letter is "sealed with the Great Seal of this City impressed on Red Wax." The text of the letter was presented by the city bench on Nov. 24.—Rec. N. Am., V: 160–61, 162.

24 The city court resolves "to give notice to tapsters and tavern-keepers" that, if they want to continue in business, they must take out a license by a given time.—Rec. N. Am., V: 162.

Parliament votes £10,000 for the prosecution of war with Holland, growing out of commercial rivalry in African gold-dust and slaves.

26 Customs and duties at the port of New York are made payable to Thomas Delavall by an order of Gov. Nicolls, which directs "that all Ships or Vessels, from this Port, bound to the Nether-lands" shall "pay the Custodies and Dutyes express in the Book of Rates, of all sorts of Merchandize, according to Our English Lawes," and "make paym't to Mt Thomas Delavall, at the Cus- tome office."—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 113–34. See also Oct. 14.

An agreement is made between joint commissioners from 1 Connecticut and New York upon boundaries, including provisions that Long Island shall belong to New York, and "that the creek or river called Monomoneck which is reputed to be about thirteen miles to the east of Westchester, and a line drawn from the east point or side where the fresh water falls into the salt at high water, north-north-west to the line of the Massachusetts, [shall] be the western bounds of the said Colony of Connecticut; and all planta- tions lying westward of that creek and line so drawn to be under His Royal Highness' government, and all plantations lying eastward of that creek and line to be under the government of Connecticut."—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 1, 224–25; Hist. No. 2, 113–34; LIX: 5 (Albany). This agreement proved not binding. For further account of the Connecticut-New York bound- ary, correcting errors in Brodhead's Hist. State of N. Y., see Bowen's Boundary Disputes of Conn., 79–71.

Gov. Nicolls makes a formal address to the people on Long Island that they are, by agreement with Connecticut, henceforth under the jurisdiction of the Duke of York. Meanwhile, Nicolls continues all the magistrates in office, and makes the first reference to a meeting of deputies to be held at a more seasonable time to settle the affairs of the island. He says that he expects for the present no other orders "for five or six years," than their readiness when summoned to "Joyne in the defence of this his Maj's Territory, as they did in the reducing of it to his Maj's obedience."—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 133–35.

Referring to the determination made by the boundary com- missions of New York and Connecticut on this date, Gov. Andros, in May, 1675, expressed his opinion thereon to the general assembly of Connecticut, especially as to the territory west of the Connecticut River, as follows: "And as to their [Gov. Nicolls's commission] determination for this [New York] Colony made, I do not decline it [the decision] with a provident surprise; and directly Contra this [the Nicolls's] patent, & his own Intent and design confirmed. Els By it not only what you now have, but also Albany, Esopus & in effect all Hudsons River would be yours as being eastward of a line drawn North, North west, from the east Side of monomoneck [Mamoneck] Creek or Riker though peaceably enjoined by the Dutch, & not any part of that Riker ever claimed at any time by you."—From a copy in Secretary Alva's hand, in Winthrop Papers, Vol. X (Miscell. MSS. in Mass. Hist. Soc.).

Gov. Nicolls grants liberty to some Lutherans in New York "to send for one Minister or more of their Religion, and that they may freely and publishly Exercise Divine worship according to their Consciences," provided they in no wise abuse "this Liberty to the disturbance of others," and obey such laws and ordinances as are imposed upon them by the government.—General Entries, I: 71 (printed in N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, p. 136).

The original petition or charter, still preserved in the archives of the church, is reproduced as Pl. 14, Vol. IV; see also article by Kretzmann in The Oldest Lutheran Church in America (1914), opp. p. 12. The full text of the charter is as follows: "Whereas several Persons under my Government who profess the Lutheran Religion have taken the Oath of obedience to his Maj's his Royal Highness, and such Governor or other Officers, as shall by their Authority set them over, and they having requested me for Liberty to send for one Minister, or more of their Religion and that they may freely and publishly Exercise Divine worship according to their Consciences; I do hereby give any Con- sent thereinunto, provided they shall not abuse the Liberty of disturbing others and submitting to, and obeying such Laws and Ordinances, as shall be Imposed upon them, by the Authority aforesaid, Given under my hand and Seal at James Fort in New York on the Island of Manhattan, this 6th day of December Anno 1664."—Rec. N. Am., V: 168.

In the city court an interesting case comes up, of George Baxter against Cornelis van Ruyven, the receiver of the West India Company's revenues. Baxter says he has "attached the Company's house" because the company owes him the sum of 1,788 florins. But Van Ruyven answers that he pays only on the order of Stuyvesant, and characterizes Baxter's account as doubtful. He also says that Baxter, while "a servant of the Company, rebelled in the beginning of the year 1655" against the authority of the states-general and the company, by raising up "tumult and sedi- tion in the village of Gravesend and there erected the arms of the Commonwealth of England." To this Baxter gave him several times, for which "unmanly speeches" he is prevented from speaking further until he pays a fine "for the benefit of the poor." He refuses. Later he reiterated and returned to the court, made an apology, and promised to pay.—Rec. N. Am., V: 167.

Corneils Stuyvewyk, burgomaster of New York, and his part- ners, are granted by Gov. Nicolls the privilege to trade for one year between Holland and the port of New York in Dutch ships, with "Liberty of unloading and Loading here ye Goods and Merchandize of this place, and to export them to what Port they please, paying only such Custodies and Dutyes, as are payable by Englishmen here."—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 137–38; also 148–49 (Jan. 30, 1664/5).

Gov. Nicolls issues the following order to Stuyvesant and Van Ruyven with respect to the Dutch West India Co's estate in New York, viz:—

11 "Whereas the West India Company of Amsterdam hath Intrusted you with the Management of an Estate in Lands, Houses, Goods, Cattle, Negroes, Debts, and all other Revenue of what sortsoever unto them belonging. These are therefore to give you notice that for good reasons and Consideraoons mee thereunto moving, I have thought fit to put an Arrest upon you further proceedings therein, and do require, that you in the like Act not conclude, or in any Bargaine Sale, or disposition of any part or Parcel of the Estate of the West India Company, untill further Order from me, but on the contrary, that you give mee a true and exact Accoant, without any mystery or concealment of all and every part or Parcel of any sort of Estate appertaining to the West India Company as you will Answer the neglect of this Warrant upon you utmost Perill."

On the 27th of this month, Nicolls, by another order to the various local authorities, "to bee publisht to ye Inhabitants," re- quired "that all Persons in any way connected with any part of this company, or had "any part or parcel of the Estate . . . in their possession," or were otherwise interested, should "bring in Writing" to him within ten days time "a True State of their Debt and possession, trust or Conscem," with warning of arrest to those who practiced fraud, as well as the forfeit of twice the value of thing concealed.—N. Y. State Library Bull., Hist. No. 2, 140–41, 142–43.

— Probably from this year dates the Nicolls Map (or Survey), reproduced and described in Vol. I, Pl. 104-a. This carefully drawn and accurate survey shows the entire island of Manhattan and its immediate surroundings, and gives, as an inset, a plan of the city, very similar to the "Duke's Plan." It is particularly interesting as showing the early road system at the southern end of the island.

— During this and the following year, the "Deacon's Account" (printed in full in Riker's History of Harlem, 247) indicates activity in building a Dutch Reformed church at Harlem. It was on the north side of the Great Way (later the Church Lane), on a vacant lot between the east end of the old gardens and the river, i.e., in 145th St. west of First Ave. (see Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 955), seemingly reserved for the purpose. The work, suspended during "the farming season, was resumed on the approach of winter by the mechanics Jan Gulick and Nelis Mattheesyn."—Riker, 248.

In order to raise money for the purpose, "gardens, suitable also for building lots," were laid out, to be sold to "actual freeholders or residents at 25 fl. each." There were 20 of these, each containing about half an acre, at the west end of the village plot, running north and south from street to street. They were called the "Out Gardens," as they were outside the palisade.

— Doubtless, as in usual in new settlements, the people undertook the finest labor of preparing the timber, etc., as a voluntary offering. This work, of which no record remains, had evidently been completed and the building inclosed and [made] ready for seats when the deacon's account of money expenditures began.

The first entry, under Jan. 23, 1665, is for a feast given for Gen. Stuyvesant by D. Tournoy, Verdev, and Montague, at a cost of f. 2119. The minister probably came from New York to conduct the services.—Ibid., 246-48.

In 1666, the church was not finished and money was needed. Some of the out-gardens had not been sold, but little money had been paid in for the others. It was resolved that a tax should be "laid upon the lands, by the morgen from each lot," but for the present, if the ministers and deacons approved, funds were to be borrowed from the "poor money." Lumber was obtained, and Hendrick Kastens was employed to "raise up and underpin the building," and also to plaster it.—Ibid., 256. By Jan. 30, 1667, work was so far completed that an allotment of seats took place.

The building now came to be used as a school as well as church, and a loft or second story was sometimes rented. There was on the church lot an older house, belonging to the town, which was probably rented with the loft. A change was also made in the burying-ground at this time.

On Thursday, April 15, 1668, "the people had gathered around the Lord's table, for the last time in that humble but hallowed sanctuary where, through their early struggles, they had sought and found inward strength and comfort."—Ibid., 455. The church was also fenced in 1668 for a second and better edifice. Regarding the second church, see March 30, 1668.

— In this year, St. Augustine, Fla., was plundered by buccaneers under Capt. John Davis, an Englishman.

— In this year, the colonies of New Haven and Connecticut were finally united. John Winthrop was elected governor.

The great plague of London rages throughout this year.

1666

Jan. 1. A petition of Egbert Meindersen to the burgomasters is brought to the attention of the city court, in which Meindersen seeks "some abatement from the farming of the taxes," because he "has not received any excise from the cattle slaughtered as well before as after the English troubles." He is allowed 200 guilder "in scanty 60 white or four black heads for one steer."—Rec. N. Am., V, 182.

Arien Appel, who has boarded and lodged some soldiers of the English garrison, seeks payment from the city, but is referred to Gov. Nicolls or Thomas Delvarial.—Rec. N. Am., V, 181, 187-88.

Feb. 2. 1664, the burgomasters and scheepens in office at that time were continued. That article stipulated that they should also thereafter name and elect their successors. Under the Dutch régime they had been allowed only to nominate, whilst the election was reserved to the director-general and council. Following out now the wish to vested the burgomaster with a new city court bench. This done, they submitted their action to Gov. Nicolls, to learn "if he had any objection to these persons." He had not, and the board proceeded to proclaim the new bench to the commonality of the city at the city hall. The new members took the oath of allegiance to the English authority on the 9th, and their oath of office on the following day. Not one member of this bench was an Englishman. N. Y. Col. Hist., II, 546-57.

Col. Cartwright, in a letter to Gov. Nicolls, says: "I am very glad that Mr. Willet intends to go immediately to you (by whom I hope this letter will come safe to your hands). I believe him both a very honest and an able gentleman, and y' he will serve you both for a Mayor and a Councilor."—N. Y. Col. Docs., III, 67. This letter reveals the fact that Gov. Nicolls was planning at this time to place Thomas Willet at the head of the municipal government, when English officials should displace the Dutch (see June 12).

Broodhead says: "At Nicolls's request, Carr, while on his way to Boston, visited Willet at Rehoboth, and obtained for him from Governor Prence leave of absence from Plymouth, to assist in remodeling the city government in New York, as he was more acquainted with the manners and customs of the Dutch than any Englishman in the country, and his conversation was very acceptable to them."—Broodhead, Hist. of N. Y., III.

Col. Cartwright advises Gov. Nicolls that "the Fort is not to be kept 2 days longer nor 2 hours, by having the walls raised higher, in my opinion, and therefore a battery upon the point would be of greater advantage and more considerable than the Fort itself, if ever the town be fortified. The same materials will serve in both places."—Carr, N. Y. Col., XVI.

The first suggestion of post-riders appears in a letter of Gov. Nicolls to Gov. Winthrop of Connecticut: "I have for the speedy dispatch of Letters of Publike concerne made a Law that any Letter attestted on the back side with the Name of the Governer of any Colony, and directed to mee, or from mee so attested by mee to any Goverour or other person shall be immediately dispatch'd from Constable to Constable, who is to press a borse and man for such service at the rate of sixe pence per mile." He suggests that Winthrop "cause the same to be put in practice" in the colony of Connecticut, the payment to be "fixed upon by the Publike charge."—Winthrop Papers, XVI, 25, in Mass. Hist. Soc. For the establishment of the first regular postal service, see Dec. 10, 1672.

The members of the city court unanimously agree to obey the ordinances "on the subject of being absent and coming too late as well at ordinary as extraordinary Court days."—Rec. N. Am., V, 189.

Elizabeth Tyson receives a patent by way of confirmation for a plot "having on ye southwest the Maids Path, and on the north-west the East River and on the southwest the house of Peter Hermens which said southwest side contains by estimation 120 feet, 6 inches, the southeast side, 127 feet, and the northwest side 240 feet and 6 inches."—Leib, Publick Papers, I, 33 (Albany). See also Mass. Gen. Coun. (1856), 467.

This day is set by Gov. Nicolls for the appearance of two deputies from each town on Long Island and Westchester for a general meeting at Hempstead, "to Sette good and knowne Laws within this Government for the future and to alter or to make them when thought good for the Welfare of the Colonie." The Duke of York's Laws are promulgated at Hempstead, L. I., Gov. Nicolls having them compiled from the statutes governing other English colonies in America. Regarding the various original written copies of these, and the later printed ones, as well as their substance and amendments, see Col. Laws N. Y., I., 6-100.

The preparation and publication of these laws were done in obedience to the duke's commission to Nicolls, dated April 2, 1666 (p. v.). A letter of March 13, from Gov. Nicolls to Gov. Winthrop of Connecticutt, acknowledged the receipt of a copy of the Connecticut laws when he "was upon the way to Hempstead." He said that he "had finished the body of Laws for this Government, except the Publicke Rates whereby I gue the Deputies their choice amongst all the Laws of the other Colonies who receiue verbatin those of Connecticutt." All the other laws, he said, were "collected either out of those of Boston, Newhaven, Mary Land or Virginia, and by that you may condense it into a small book." Despite this, he had "not made any improvements or additions" from those of ye Colony. The governor went on to tell his "great tryalls and exercise of patience" with "some very disobliging persons [Capt. Young of Southold and John Howell of Southampton] whom I sought much to satisfy both with reasons & Civility." I made divers attempts, he adds, which "had been at last so far from effecting as they had been delayed, and by that time I had very much quarantin me that I would give them the most honourable share in the Government but I found they ... refused any office at all which you know passeth not vnpunish't in other Colonies but I am too well Natural to deal harshly though with the worst of men." Furthermore, when, at the conclusion of the meeting, the other deputies signed "a publick agree to his R. Highness . . . that they and theirs doe submit cheerfully according to the Tenour of their oath to his Royal Highness and his Laws that all my actions are or shall be established," Young and Howell did not sign.—Winthrop Papers, XVI: 21, in Massachusetts Hist. Soc.; cf. Brodhead, op. cit., II: 66-70. These laws, thus formulated, are ill-arranged and relate to a large variety of subjects, such as the proceedings of courts in various actions at law; the administration of estates; slavery; the boundaries of towns and common lands; brewers; the registration of births, marriages, and burials; capital offences; branding and impounding of cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs; public worship and holy ordinances; children and servants; physicians and surgeons; conveyances; forfeit of dower; fast days and thanksgiving; official fees; crimes; innkeepers and ordinaries; Indians; defamation; lying and false news; military affairs; marriages; master and servants; public officers (such as constables, overseers, justices of the peace, etc.); public charges; weights and measures; wolves; shipwrecks; oaths; forms of procedure, etc.—Col. Laws N. Y., I: 6-73. The laws further provide that in case the peasants were seduced into the London insurrection of ""The Governor and Council with the High Sherif & the Justices of the Peace" shall be held at New York once a year, beginning on the last Thursday in September. This court had the "supreme Power of making, altering and abolishing any Laws in New-York."—Col. Laws N. Y., I: 159; N. Y. Gov. Docs., 188. Some authorities believe that a court of assizes existed before March 1, 1665. Chalmers, Pol. Am., I: 175, says that Nicolls, in erecting this court, was merely "prudently copying what had been already established by the Dutch." and Dawson, in The Sons of Liberty in N. Y., I, (footnote), puts forth the suggestion that the court of assizes was the same as the Dutch "Court of Director General and Council." See also Brodhead, op. cit., I: 61 (footnote). These laws were amended in many particulars in Sept. and Oct., 1665, and added to in 1669, 1671, 1672, 1675.—Col. Laws N. Y., I: 73-100. An alphabetical index was made in 1669 in the East Hampton (L. I.) copy and there is an index in the Van Cortlandt (N. Y.) copy. It is original in that "N. York" is always made by these laws the place of record of boroughs, sales, or other conveyances, and of the administration and probate of wills.—Ibid., 61. This is a copy of the laws at Albany, in the office of the secretary of the state. They are printed in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections, L: 345-428. See March 17, and Alden, March 8.

In the city court, Schout Antony charges Lysbet Ackermans with using an un stamped weight and un stamped wine measure; that on Jan. 8 (Sunday) people went into her house, "after the third bell rang," to drink; also that she had insulted and abused Donato Vioce with Godmass and lodge. She is taken up and committed for excises in extenuation of the charges, but the court decree that she will "have to clear herself by oath."—Rec. N. Am., V: 192-93.

Gov. Nicolls, writing to Gov. Winthrop, says: "I shall cause a Copy of our Laws [see March 1] to be written according to your desires."—Winthrop Papers, XV: 165. If ever made, this copy seems to have disappeared. There is preserved in the Mass. Hist. Soc. a fine manuscript copy of the Duke's Laws that was sent in 1673 to the chief magistrat of Nantucket (then a part of New York). It is in the handwriting of John Clarke, the engrossing clerk in the office of Sec. Matthias Nicolls; it contains 62 leaves, of which the last three are blank. The first page is an engrossed title, as follows: "Laws Established by his Royall Highnesse Duke of Yorke & Albany & To be observed in his R. H. Territories in America." There is a statement, dated April 22, 1673, in the handwriting of Matthias Nicolls, that the oath of fidelity was always to the king, and that proceedings were in the king's name.—G. Howth, Nantucket Papers, 59: Ex. Com., May, II: 372-77.

Gov. Nicolls issues a warrant to the "Scout, and p'seat Magistrates of Harlem" to require that they take "special care, that none of your Towne p'soume to sell any sort of Strong Liqueur," or Strong spirits, on such occasion side, and that no person offending therein, that yeu2. Seize upon such Liqueur, and bring such Persons before mee to make Answer for ye2. Offence."—N. Y. S. L. Bull., Hist. No. 2, 159.

Albert Leeslersten and Ananias Cornelius petition the city court for a copy of the record or restitution, of "their land taken by the Hon. Petrus Stuyvesant and laid out for the Village of N. Haerlem." Stuyvesant was furnished with a copy of the petition and order by the court to make an "answer thereunto in writing."

Mar. 21

The president of the city court informs the bench that, during a visit by him and Burgomaster Van Cortlandt on the previous day to Gov. Nicolls, the governor had told them the soldiers were in need of being boarded and of having their wounds dressed. He said they had no "pot or kettle to cook for themselves," and "it was therefore necessary to quarter the soldiers in the Burghers' houses;" adding, that he would furnish weekly rations for the soldiers and the burgomaster should give payment of two guilders weekly for each soldier for lodging money, in consideration of which the city should have, "in addition to the great expense, the income of the Scales and the Ferry, and that eighty soldiers" should "be quartered, two and two in a house." The city bench agree to "see some Burgers" to obtain their consent to lodge soldiers. Meanwhile, the schout is sent to Gov. Nicolls to invite his presence at their meeting. The schout returning, reports that the governor is "not yet dressed," but has requested "that Burgomasters and Schepens would please come to him."—Rec. N. Am., V: 207-8. See March 31.

A large number of burgners and inhabitants having been "invited to appear at the City Hall this day," about three dozen respond. The president of the bench informs them of the governor's proposal and the reasons thereof (see March 29); that the governor wanted to scatter the soldiers so as to prevent further disturbances and insolences by them, and that the governor promised, if any person suffered "harassment" from the soldiers billeted in a house, he would "make good the same and charge the damage to the soldiers." Most of these present refuse to lodge soldiers.—Rec. N. Am., V: 208-9. See April 6.

The president of the city court informs his associates that he and Burgomaster Van Cortlandt have again had a conference with Gov. Nicolls at which the governor "accused them of sloth" in regard to "quartering the soldiers in the Burgher's houses" (see March 31). If they have not sufficient authority, Nicolls is willing to warrant them with it; he intends to send for them in the evening, in order to hear their resolutions. After listening to this report, the court agrees to the same matter, and resolves "to request from the Governor that the subject be postponed 'till to-morrow in order to hear theron the old Burgomasters and Schepens as well as some of the principal Burgers, and to ask their advice."—Rec. N. Am., V: 211.

The conference with the court members was held on the 7th.

The governor's proposal was again presented, but those present unanimously declared "they would rather contribute than receive the soldiers into the house." Gov. Nicolls then appeared, and again they were asked "man for man," in his presence, "if they intended to quarter the soldiers in the houses," but they persisted in their former declaration. After all had withdrawn except the governor and the regular members of the bench, Nicolls delivered a written order, charging the court to give him a list of houses sufficient for lodging 100 soldiers, and to so distribute the number that not more than two would be lodged in any one house. To this the court replied that the commonalty dreaded to receive soldiers in their houses, in view of the insolences that the soldiers were even now committing against the people.—Ibid., V: 212-13. See April 18 and 19.

Bartholdus Maan complains to the city court "that two soldiers struck him on the head on the 5th of April or thereabouts, New Style" that, although, he was forbidden by Gov. Nicolls "to tap for the soldiers," he was forced to it by the soldiers, who came in crowds before his door, even taking "two of his great glasses," and accusing him falsely "of having presented a pistol at them to shoot them," when, in fact, they had "taken the pistol from his bedstead" and carried it off, he only securing it again "outside his door." He also accuses two soldiers of insulting his wife; a number of soldiers coming in and, "with naked swords, hacking and striking all within their reach," giving him and Daniel Vreeveelen a cut, as well as later "in the night after the rounds had passed," smashing his window in pieces, an offence which they had committed against his house on a former occasion side, and for which he had complained. The court, by the solildery determined the commonality not to quarter them in their houses, as the governor had desired.—Ibid., 213.

In the city court of June 15, Bartholdus Maan was again in trouble, the schout charging that there was "disturbance and quarrel at delfs. house on the 5th of June" in which the city sold was accused with having drawn a knife, also presented a pistol" and that the governor had ordered him, the schout, to "take informa-

Isaac Greenravat, in whose house the soldiers were quartered, asks the city bench to permit him to have possession of his house again "on the first of May," when the lease expires.—Rec. N. Am., V, 219. See Feb. 13, 1666. For the location of the house, see Castello Plan, II, 257. 13

The earliest known street directory of New York City was a "List of the Burghers and Inhabitants of this City that are "assessed" for the lodging of the English soldiers. It gives, all told, 254 names, as follows: At the Markellif; 11 on the Hostra Steet (Broadway); 22; on the Strand of the North River; 15; at the Cingle or City Wall; 10; on High St.; 41; along the Waal; 111; by the Water (now Pearl St.; 15; on Pearl St.; 19; behind Pearl St.; 7; on Brewer St.; 19; on Winkel St.; 6; on Bridge St.; 109; on the Hostra Grafs; 20; on the Prince Grafs; 17; on Prince St.; 31; on the Beaver's Grafs; 9; in Markellifkett Alley, 8; on Smeec (Smith) St.; 11; in the Hostra Grafs Alley (Smith's Valley); 18; outside of the Landgate; 5.—Rec. N. Am., V, 221-25. Cf. Mem. Com. Coun. (1849), 356-59. 19

The city court is again apprised of the governor's order for hilleting 100 soldiers (see March 29), and that he offers now a weekly pay of three guilders in seaway "or goods equivalent." Nobody was satisfied, however, unless another two guilders were added. This being considered, enough placed, it was determined the 100 men. Nicolls was given a list of the houses, and he gave it to Capts. Delavall and Salisbury "with orders to inspect the houses;" and to ascertain if they were "adapted for the reception and lodging of the soldiers." They reported to him that the houses were "almost all fit except fifteen in number wanting double bedding and pillows for two persons, which Burghers and Scheepens having fitted up, they were delivered over to Capt. Salisbury on the 18th of this month by order of the Hon. Govt. Nicolls." The governor was "about to depart for Boston... in three or four days," hence he "thought fit to suspend the quarterings until his return, or to remove difficulties between Burgher and soldier."

"On condition that Burghers and Scheepens should pay now to the soldiers the two guilders per week in seaway as lodging money, which they had previously promised to the Burghers for the quartering the soldiers." The court decided "to accept the proposition of the Govr. and Sheriff, in considering it to be for the comfort of the good inhabitants of the city, and resolved upon a "general assessment" to raise the 200 guilders required weekly (see also June 17). Jan Jellens Koeck was authorized by the court "to go, with one of the Court Messengers, from house to house with the assessment list, and collect the monies from each for so much as he is rendezued." On the 20th, he received his formal act of authority, in which he was "ordered to prepare both notes and strings of wampum of two guilders to two hundred guilders and deliver them to the Treasurer" of the city; if there was a residue, he could give that to the treasurer in any greater sum, yet, in no wise "receive any sum without writing it," since he was "responsible for the monies, for the counting of which he was promised "100 guilders a week."

A certificate states that grants of land near Stuyvesant's bowery, were made in 1659 and 1660 to divers negroes; the negroes' names are given, 1660. 20

Because of complaints "That the Scout of Harlem doth not execute his Office, and y^ several disorders are committed, and y^ inhabitants hinder'd of their accustomed Rights," the governor orders that the "Magistrates now in being, do Act as formerly, and in case the Scout do not Execute his Office and others that do assaults do justice in his place, for the good of the Towne, and to decide all matters, that doth, or shall happen there, not exceeding the value of one hundred guilds" in Wampum.—N. Y. S. B. Bull., Hist. N. Y., 2, 163-66. 19

Petrus Stuyvesant visits the city court and informs the bench that his time is short and he is about to depart for Holland (see April 2), he wishes them "every luck and happiness," sentiments which the court reciprocates. He requests the court, if proper in their eyes, to "accord to him a certificate of his comportment," which may "aid him or his children today or tomorrow." After due consideration, the court issues him a certificate, stating that he has "during about eighteen years' administration conducted and demeaned himself not only as a Director General, according to the best of our knowledge ought to do, on all occurring circumstances, for the interest of the West India Company, but besides as an honest proprietor and patron of this Province and a supporter of the Reformed Religion."—Rec. N. Am., V, 253. 4

Pieter Wolphemansen van Couwenheven and others appear in court and are told about the governor's resolve, "that for the good of the place an assessment list is made of what each shall have to give per week as long as Gov. Nicolls shall be from home or at least for six weeks, as the soldiers may not be quartered in Burgers houses that they were found unwilling to contribute the same" (see April 19). Their reasons are demanded. They reply "that the money was not expended as well as it ought and that the soldiers notwithstanding envoie their insinuations also that the assessment was unjust, because one is taxed in proportion higher than the others." The board endeavours in a "friendly way" to pacify the objectors, on the ground that it is only for six weeks' time. They then agree to bring in what they are assessed. Some women came into court, to whom the situation was explained, and the court allowed each of the women to "give according to her ability." So, more was gained by friendly intervention than by force.—Rec. N. Am., V, 252-53. 18

Gov. Nicolls bolds out inducements to Gov. Winthrop to settle in New York City, addressing him by letter thus: "If your resolutions are, not to accept of the Government of Connecticut the Year ensuing, I was considering it to be for the comfort of the City of N. Yorke with y^ family, where probably some matters considerable may be put in practice by y^ assistance and knowledge. To which end whatever you shall command me I will readily performe, and one thing I doe promise you that in fourteen daies Notice I will provide for y^fie and family one of the best houses in N. Yorke, which shall cost you nothing but the acceptance, wherein also you will extremely oblige."—Winthrop Papers (XIV), 165, in Mass. Hist. Soc.

Jacob Fledder, of Albany, bought, in 1656, a plot of land from the heirs of Jan Jansen Damen, on the south side of Wall St., between Pearl and William Sts., which he subdivided and sold off in small parcels, reserving a strip in the rear on the East River side (now Pearl St.). He has been notified by the city court "to build up and line the bank" of this lot on the waterside, with planking against the wash of the tide. His direction leads the court on this date to write to the court magistrates at Albany, requesting that court to notify Fledder by their court messenger to comply, as a further neglect will be followed by the sale of his lot and confiscation of his rights therein.—Rec. N. Am., V, 253-54. 19

Hendrick Willemens, the baker, living on Bridge St., corner of Bayard St., was ordered to数码 his complaints. That the Magistrates do not reside in his place, for the good of the Towne, and to decide all matters, that doth, or shall happen there, not exceeding the value of one hundred guilds in Wampum.—N. Y. S. B. Bull., Hist. N. Y., 3, 1636-66. 23
1665 and orders by the court, she did nothing, and the case dragged along for almost three years.—Ibid., V. 200, 342, 343-45, 351. Finally, on May 19, 1668, the court ordered the sheriff to have one of the city carpenters "finish the Watercourse," and "to seize upon 100 more and hire (21s.)" for one week, to pay for the total costs of the work and the charges of the court.—Ibid., VI: 127. This decree seems to have been carried out (ibid., VI: 158), but it does not appear to have been done to the satisfaction of Willemsen, for he complained again (Dec. 5, 1671). The court then ordered the execution of former orders without delay.—Ibid., VI: 578.

An order from Gov. Nicolls directs Cornelis van Ruyven to adjust just accounts with Warner Werevell "for the farmes hee hired the last yeare, of the West India Company, and also, to Account with him, what is due from him to the said Company, on any former Account." Van Ruyven was authorised to adjust accounts with Jonas Barlowes, weighmaster.—N. Y. S. L. Bull., Hist. No. 2, 274.

A municipal government, of mayor, aldermen, and sheriff, is established for the first time. By the governor's proclamation, this English form displaces that of the Dutch schout, burgomasters, and scheepsen. The leaves which contain the order of "Reversion of the form of office from the Dutch schout to the English Mayoralty, and Scheepsen" (June 13, 1665), and the charter of Gov. Nicolls, establishing a court of mayor and aldermen (June 12, 1665), are missing in the original minutes of the court, under June 13, 1665. In the printed Rec. N. A. Am. ed. by Pernow, these two documents were published as "discovered in" the "city book," which was destroyed in the capital fire at Albany in 1911.—Rec. N. A. Am., V: 248-50.

In the "Revocation," the change in the form of government is indicated by Nicolls as follows: I "do Revoke and discharge the form and Ceremony of Government of this His Majesty's Towne of New York, under the Name or Names, Style or Styles, of Scout Burgomasters and Scheepsen... I do further declare, That by a Particular Commission, Such Persons shall be Authorized to put the Laws in Execution, in whose abilities, Prudence and good Affection to his Majestie Service, and ye Peace and happiness of this Government, I have especially reason to put Confidence, which persons do constitute the service of ye County, and the service of ye Name and Style of Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs, according to the Custome of England in other his Majesty's Corporations." See also editorial in N. Y. Times, June 27, 1921.

In the "Mayor and Aldermen's Commission," Nicolls further states that he has found it necessary to change the form of government under the name of "Scout, Burgomaster and Scheepsen, which are not known or Customary, in any of his Majesty's Dominions; To the end that the course of Justice for the future, may bee Legally, equally and impartially administered to all his Majesty's Subjects as well Inhabitants as Strangers; Know All Men by these Presents, That I, Nathanael 120, Do Ordaine, Constitute and Declare, That the Inhabitants of New York, New Harlem with all other his Majesty's Subjects, Inhabitants upon this Island, Commonly called and Known by the name of the MANHATTAN ISLAND, are, and shall bee for ever, accounted, Nominated and Established, as one Body Politique & Corporate, under the Government of a Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs, and I doe by these Present Constitute and appoint, for one whole years... Mr Thomas Willett [see Feb. 4] to bee Mayor, Mr Thomas Delavall, Mr Oloffe Stuyvesant, Mr John Bruges, Mr Cornelius van Ruyven and Mr John Laurence, to bee Aldermen, and Mr Allard Anthony to bee Scheepsen, "with an annual allowance [see June 23] and "to increase the emoluments and fees for writing by allowing [him] to charge them silver value, or sewaat three for one," keeping Nevis "a month or two on trial."—Rec. N. A. Am., V: 250-52.

Gov. Nicolls, in accordance with his majesty's commission of Feb. 22, 1664, declares himself President of the Courts, Estate, both Reall and Personall, Debts and Credits, belonging to the said West India Company, are constituated to the use and Service of his Majesty.—N. Y. S. L. Bull., Hist. No. 2, 174-75. See Dec. 24, 1664, and June 22, 1665. Brodhead states that the old West India Company went into liquidation soon after the conquest of New Netherland in 1664 and the new corporation took no interest in its recapture.—Brodhead, Hist. State of N. Y., 209, footnote.

The newly organized city court of mayor, aldermen, and sheriff (see June 12) holds its first meeting. They vote to continue Johannes Nevis as secretary of the city, at 200 guilders seawant as an annual allowance (see June 23), and "to increase the emoluments and fees for writing by allowing [him] to charge them silver value, or sewaat three for one," keeping Nevis "a month or two on trial."—Rec. N. A. Am., V: 252.

Clases van Elisland and Pieter Schaadbach, who served as city messengers under the court of schout, burgomasters, and scheepsen, are now "continued in their offices as Towne Serjeants" by the newly organized city court of mayor, aldermen, and sheriff, at the same wages as heretofore.—Ibid., V. 252. On Oct. 10, they both represented in court, "that they were employed on all occurring occasions by the General [Nicolls], Capt. E. van Rensselaer [Deyl], Secretary of the Treasury and other officers without receiving any pay therefor," and requested "some allowance," since their regular income was insufficient for their support. The court asked Mayor Willet to consult the governor and other provincial officers about it.—Ibid., V. 301. Hendrick Obe was posted constable and tobacco keeper, to preserve the peace and prevent its infringement; to "truly execute such warrants" as were handed to him by the court, and, in his

June 15, 1666, for his reappointment.

The newly-organized court of mayor, aldermen, and sheriff orders the "Court of Haarlem and the Constable Resolveant Waldron by letter" to be present at their session on the 17th, for the purpose of receiving their orders.—Rec. N. Am., V: 252-53. According to the day named, Waldron, who was not notified of his election to the post of "Constable of N. Haarlem," accepted and took the oath. The magistrates, who came with Waldron, were then "discharged from their office," and Waldron, as constable, was authorized "to select three or four persons," as overseers, who were "to decide any disputes, and to determine the extent of five pounds sterling to be paid for the same, and that on higher," if any party was dissatisfied with the decision, he could appeal therefrom to the city court of New York, upon payment of six st. to the constable and the costs of proceeding before the city bench.—Ibid., V: 254.

The new city court resolves "to draft a placard relative to the observance of the Sabbath."—Rec. N. Am., V: 253.

"Whereas the provision regarding the City revenue as well from the Burghers as tapsters excise on wines and beer consumable within the jurisdiction of this City is somewhat high, inasmuch as the Londoners and the citizens of the city of Amsterdam in like manner pay five per cent, the city court "resolved to observe the strictest economy therein; also to order the Treasurer and Collector to appear next Saturday afternoon at two o'clock here in the City Hall to render a good account of their administration."—Rec. N. Am., V: 254, 255. See note 13.

The churchyard of the city (Castello Plan, II: 224-22, and Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 927) is "very open and unfenced," so that the hogs root there. The mayor's court sends for the churchwardens, one of whom, Govt. Loockerman, appears. He is told of the condition and "the necessity of repairing the same." He replies that such repairs can be made easily enough if there is "money in the chest," and that it will cost $500 guilders to do the work properly. It is concluded to raise the sum by "a collection."—Rec. N. Am., V: 253. See note 15.

The mayor's court votes "that from now henceforward," and until Gov. Nicolls shall "order otherwise," there shall "be raised weekly from the Commonalty" a levy of "two hundred guilders in sewan," according to assessment, "for the support of the soldiers as heretofore."—Rec. N. Am., V: 254-55. See also April 19.

The mayor's court resolves "that both the Burghers' and tapsters' permits, passed by the Collector," shall be "brought every evening to the town hall by the labourers of the highgale and the beer drawers," and that the "Weigh house Labourers and beer carriers" shall appear at the city hall on the next Monday, at nine in the morning.—Rec. N. Am., V: 255. On that day (19th), Bayard was notified that he was to be furnished thereafter "with the several beer and wine and the mayoral as well by the Burghers as tapsters and tavernkeepers" in the city's jurisdiction, "to be executed by the Collector Tymothoos Gabry, whereof he shall be bound to keep a register; and that he should "sit, every Court day, with the Secretary Nevius in Court, and keep the minutes" of what was "transacted in English, translate the same into Dutch, make extracts thereof in English, and . . . agree with the . . . Secretary for the writing both of the same and of the Dutch." At the same time, the court reinaugurate the ordinance relative to the duties to be performed by the weigh-house and beer porters, of whom Barent Jacobsen Kool was foreman, and the men took the oath as the following instructions.—Ibid., V: 255.

Paulus Leendertsen vander Grit, the city treasurer, and Timotheus Gabry, the collector (see June 15), appear before the city court and produce their accounts "relating to the income, receipt and expenditure of the City's domain."—Rec. N. Am., V: 253.

The city court determines "to abolish the office of Treasurer and the monies as well of the Burghers as tappers excise," to "be received by the Collector Tymothoos Gabry," who is "to disburse the same on the order and signatures of Mayor Tomas Willet and the Secretary Joannes Nevius;" and the secretary of the city is "scheduled to keep the books thereof and to keep the orders."—Ibid., V: 255. On June 16, Gabry, the collector of the city, pronounced the court "to conduct himself honestly" in his office, and took the formal oath.—Ibid., V: 255-56. See June 5, 1667.

A riot, caused by some soldiers from the fort, takes place about seven o'clock this evening on the Bridge by the East River, during which several persons are struck with swords, and the constable, Hendrick Obis, is wounded.—Rec. N. Am., V: 266-67.

The mayor's court orders the bakers of the city "to furnish this day to Secretary Nevius an account of what they . . . baked here during five months in cakes and hard bread, to whom delivered and how much they still have on hand."—Rec. N. Am., V: 255.

The mayor's court on the 20th transacted the reappointment of the city hall on next Saturday (24th) in the afternoon, "bringing with them their last obtained tapsters license."—Rec. N. Am., V: 260.

On the 24th, Secretary Nevius was "ordered to give the tapsters a license" on the following Monday (26th), "to enable them to tap four men for a year."—Ibid., V: 265.

Gov. Nicolls directs the civil and military officers of the three ridings of Yorkshire to put their jurisdictions "into such a Posture, and readiness," for the defence of New York against the contumelious visit of the Dutch fleet under Admiral De Ruyter, that "upon the first notice they shall "immediately repair to the ferry, over against New York" as a place of rendezvous under arms.—N. Y. Col. Docs., XIV: 457-68.

Yorkshire was the name which was given to Long Island by Capt. Nicolls when New Netherland came into the hands of the English.—N. Y. Col. Docs., III: 105.

This day, "after the usual ringing of the City Hall bell three times," is "put in order by the Collector in like manner five per cent," the city court "resolved to observe the strictest economy therein; also to order the Treasurer and Collector to appear next Saturday afternoon at two o'clock here in the City Hall to render a good account of their administration."—Rec. no Cathenegall answer was given." —Rec. N. Am., V. 265-6.

Neither asks for his discharge from the office of secretary of the city (see June 15), on the ground that he cannot support himself and family, having "no other income than that received from the City," which is inadequate. The court grants his discharge. —Rec.
N. Am., V. 265. He was succeeded in the secretariaship by Nevius Bayard, but Nevius continued to hold possession of "the old books and papers." At these were "frequently" needed in administration, the court, on July 18, ordered him to hand over to Bayard, 1665 having, by some "detectable and wicked Arts, commonly called Witchcraft and Sorcery," caused the sickness and death of George 2 Van Lennep, child of Rd. van Lennep, of Seatuckto, Long Island. Both plead "not guilty," and the jury renders the following verdict: "Wee having seriously considered the case committed to our Charge, against y'rs Pinson" at the Barr, and having well weighed ye Evidence, wee finde that there are some suspizions by the Evidence, of what the woman is Charged with but nothing considerable of value to take away her life. But in reference to the man wee finde nothing considerable to Charge him with." The court sentences the man to be "bound Body and Goods for his wives Appearance" at each session of the court as long as they remain in the government, and meanwhile "to bee of y'rs good Behaviour." After entering into a recognizance in accordance with the sentence they were freed. Nearly three years afterwards, Aug. 21, 1668, Gov. Nicolls released them from this recognizance.—Dec. Hist.N.Y., (1890 ed.), I: 87-88.

Evert Dayke Yingh, Hendrick Willemsen, and Thomas Hall, the first-wardens of the city, are authorized by the mayor's court "from now henceforth to inspect," as often as they consider it proper, "all chimneys and fireplaces" in the city, and to fine those whose chimneys and fireplaces are "four," as well as to "remove those of wood or other Improper ones."—Rec. N. Am., V: 298.

Forster Struyven, former director-general of New Netherland, memorializes the states-general concerning his conduct in the surrender of the province to the English expedition commanded by Col. Richard Nicolls, and accompanies his memorial with a report and papers as evidence of the "real circumstances of the case." He states that he was sent to New Netherland to ascertain through the unwillingness of the Militia, the protests and menaces of the Burgurers, the weakness of the Fort, the scarcity of provisions and munitions of war, and the small number of soldiers.—"Y. T. Col. Des., II: 364, ff.; and Jameson, N. Y. Neth., 458 (dated Oct. 17)." For his memoir, see "Some Letters," in Y. T. Col. Des., II: 377, ff.

Egidius Luyck, "late Principal of the Latin School in New Amsterdam, in New Netherland, aged about twenty-four years," makes a deposition about the surrender of New Amsterdam in September, 1664 (see Aug. 27, 1664, O. S.—Y. T. Col. Des., II: 409 (where the years are recorded erroneously as 1664 and 1665). Mayor Willet explains to his associates on the city bench that Gov. Nicolls has informed him that he intends "to proceed with the inquieturings of his Soulurers in Burgher's houses to the Number of 80 heads," and the mayor asks the court for their judgment thereon. The court thinks it "best to Call about 40 of the Inhabitants together, of whom, we have been Ordered to Quarter the Soulurers by the time [i.e. at the time] of the Bergenmasters [see April 19], & to see if [we] if they could dispose them to the inquieturings Voluntarily," as in the articles of surrender "it was agreed the Inhabitants should not be forced with the inquieturing of the Soulurers till the 28th day this month," divers of the Inhabitants of the Towne New Yorke) were summoned to court. The mayor told them that, "want of Sufficient Lodging into the fort," it was resolved by the governour "to inquiet Ur Soulurers for this followinge winter into the Inhabitants houses." The terms were given them, and voluntary promises were made for quartering 41 men, as listed on the 19th.—Rec. N. Am., V: 302-3. Difficulties arose in connection with the collection of the weekly assessments and an insufficient treasury; hence, on Dec. 12, the court authorized the sheriff, Allard Anthony, to give notice to those in arrears to pay up within three days at "the house of Jan Jilissen Kok" or, if in default, to suffer a fine double the amount of their arrears.—Ibid., V: 311, 328.

Timothoe Gahey, having been ordered to appear before the mayor's court, is asked to render an account of the burgurers' excise on wine and beer, and cattle slaugtherd in the city. He did so, and it was found that the city was "in debt" to him at this date, in the sum of 536 fl. besides his commission:—Rec. N. Am., V: 302.

Christopher van Laer purchases from the estate of Rachel van Tilhoven a lot on the corner of Broad St. and Exchange Pl.—Liker Daedae, An. 7 (N. Y. County). Van Laer had erected a tan mill by July 12, 1666. A dispute arose between him and Adrian van Laer over the "partnership of the tan-mill."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 245-46. Both Van Laers were again in court on Sept. 27, in a suit brought by the carpenter Abram Jansen, for the building of the mill.—Ibid., V: 298. For location of this mill, see Loundmark Map Ref. Key, III: 962.

From a mayor's court record of this date, it is apparent that Oct. 24, "All Saints' day" (Nov. 1) was "usually the day for the termination of leases."—Rec. N. Am., V: 304.

The carters of the city are summoned to the mayor's court and ordered "henceforward not to stand any more on their carts," because this is dangerous to traffic.—Rec. N. Am., V: 309.

In the mayor's court, Sheriff Allard Anthony brings suit against Abraham Piesken Coeymans. The latter has been arrested "by Capt. John Joseph Young" authorized thereto by special warrant from the General [Gov. Nicolls] for having sold strong beer to the Indians in opposition to the order of the General made therein." Corbyns says he sold only beer to the Indians and was not aware of the prohibition, and had a verbal pass to pursue that trade. Mayor and aldermen, not perceiving that strong beer was "directly forbidden by the last order enacted for this purpose," refer the parties to Gov. Nicolls, especially because the commissary of Capt. Jough provides "that the culprit be brought before his Honour," the governor.—Rec. N. Am., V: 311. See Aug. 21, 1666. For location of tavern of Abraham Peterson, see Castello Plan, III: 312-3.

The sworn butchers of the city petition the mayor's court for an increase of "their fees and wages for slaughtering," and ask that unauthorized persons who slaughter in the city be prohibited. The court decrees, that the rates established on Nov. 3, 1662 (q. v.), shall stand as to small cattle, and allows them an increase of one guilder for killing an ox or a cow; also that nobody save the sworn butchers be allowed to slaughter within the city, unless the sworn butchers give their "general consent" to do so.—Rec. N. Am., V: 312. The sworn butchers were expounded, on Nov. 13, from slaughtering any animals without a written and signed "ticket of Comission from the Collector" of the city, except only those to be killed for Gov. Nicolls.—Ibid., V: 312-13.

Gov. Nicolls, in a letter to the Duke of York, writes "I have now before me a copy of a letter to the Duke through the same channel at the same time I was engaged in troubles with the Indians also at Fort Albany, in which I found it necessary to augment the number of my soldiers, and consequently many incident charges have arisen this summer, with all which I have struggled even to the utmost of my own monies and credit in the Country still depending on the promised supplies till now, that the winter is come and no ships appear, the want whereof is a general Calamity, but it falls most heavy upon me in particular who am not able to support so heavy a burden any longer. I do not value the sight of my own ruins in point of fortune, but my reputation lyes at stake to the Country having so often (in confidence of a small supply) assured the Inhabitants of the care which was taken for their releife; who depending thereupon are now left akeed to the rigour of the winter; The whole trade, both inwards & outwards is lost for want of shipping, but the charge of 1st Garrison with all their fortifications and supplies falls upon me.—"Y. T. Col. Des., IH: 265.

Ibid., V: 312-13.

The church-wardens, Lockermans and Johannes de Peyster, are asked by the bench if they now have enough money "in the Church Treasury" to "finance the grave yard" of the city (see June 15). They reply in the negative, and add that there are "still many small debts . . . due here and there," which they were unable to pay on account of the trifling income. The mayor's court then resolves "to advance from the Burgurers excise" of the city "to the Church wardens" a sum sufficient "for the fencing off of the grave yard, on condition the same be repaid from the first incoming money—"the abovenamed Church wardens promise to do."—Rec. N. Am., V: 312. For an account of the hog nuisance in the city, see Peterson & Edwards, N. Y., as in 18th Cent. Municipality, 99-98.

The deputy-mayor tells the members of the city bench that Gov. Nicolls has proposed "to allow the Burgurers to watch anew." Each man is "to bring on his watch two sticks of firewood," and there is to be one lantern at every watch. Moreover, the court thinks it better "still to continue the two night watches," and resolves "to agree civilly with them, together with two other volunteers," who can then "undertake to watch on the other nights."—Rec. N. Am., V: 319-20. See Aug. 22.

CHRONOLOGY: THE ENGLISH PERIOD: 1664–1763

Feb. 16. Isaac Grevenaar sets forth, in a petition to the mayor's court,

"that he hired to the late Burgomasters of this City his house standing in the Broadway for 220 a year, commencing first of May last" (see April 16, 1666); as the house, "he desires payment of the rent and also a settlement for the damages done to the windows, hinges, etc., due to the improper use by the house by the soldiers. The court appoints a committee of three "to estimate the committed damage," and orders payment of the balance before June 1, 1666. Act. 7

This house, the first barracks of the English soldiers, was situated on the east side of Broadway, just south of Exchange Pl.—See Castello Plan, II: 237.

"In the mayor's court, Sheriff Anthony declares that Omfricley keeps "a very unorderly house," and that he is living "with a woman as man & wife, with whom he is not lawfully married. Withal Contrary to all godly Laws." The sheriff requests that Cleh be deprived from drawing drink any more, and be required "to depart this Towne." Clely replies, "that as long as I have kept ordinare there hath beene twice quarter At this house & further that he hath taken the 4 Woman for his wife," and he proffers "to depart from hence" as with the first once, Wether. The court gives him until the end of the next month (March) "to depart this Towne," and, in case he shall stay longer than the time mentioned, the court orders Clel to give security for his appearance before the court of assizes.—Rec. N. Am., V: 338.

13

To the mayor's court, Sheriff Anthony has William Katherine Mills with keeping "a very unorderly house," and that, on a recent Saturday, "Several Souldiers beinge very drunken" came "out of her house, which made a great tumult in the Streets & abused & beatted the People whom they did meete withal." The sheriff recommends that the "roughnesse" of Liberty to drawl in any more," but "be ordered to depart this Towne." She declares the quarrel did not occur on her premises, but "after they were gone from her house," so the sheriff is instructed to bring in his evidence at the next session of the court.—Rec. N. Am., V: 353.

May 6

"The court ordered her "from henceforth" to "draw noe drinke, or Keepe ordinarie [in] any more, & further to be summoned to appear in [her] owne Person" at the next court. Apparently she kept an inn in the house rented from William Hofmeyer.—Ibid., 341.

Thomas Lambert receives a patent by way of confirmation of a conveyance to him by Abraham Ver Planke, dated July 15, 1664, for a certain lot of ground lying on the west side of Broadway without the gate of the city, bounded on the south by land belonging to Peter van Couwenhoven; on the west by the land of Abraham Verplanke on the north by that of Hendrick van der Wall, and on the east by a line which continues 56 ft. and in length 10 rods.—Liber Patents, IV: (Albany).

Gov. Nicolls writes to Gov. Winthrop: "Wee have beene bound vp this Winter with a longer frost than was ever known in these Parts . . . This Morning about Eight of the Clock two extraordinary great Rainbowes were seene and about a quarter of an hour after three Suns were visible to the whole Towne the Rainbows parted the 3 suns."—Wintring Papers, XVI: 1. For other unusual phenomena, see Sept. 7, 1668. A letter written by John Davenport of New Haven recites that Gov. Nicolls had a drawing made of the rainbows and sent to Gov. Winthrop.—Van Rensselaer, Hist. City of N. Y., II: 141.

Evert Pietersen asks the city court "that a suitable allowance be granted to him, inasmuch as the W Court had, on the 19th of 7 ft last [p. 230], promised that an order should be made also regarding his stipend, when the preachers were granted their salary, which has now been done." The city court "decree absolutely, that he shall receive some satisfaction for his service. But whereas the City Treasury is at present so low, that the daily expenses can scarcely be met, the petitioner is requested to wait still a while."—Rec. N. Am., V: 340. See April 16, 1668.

Mar. 1

An order of this court is sent to "Mt Tho Hall and the other farmers both on this and on the other side of the Fresh Water to nominate six proper persons and send them in" to the court, "as Overseers of the Roads and Fences lying around this City."—Rec. N. Am., V: 342. See March 20.

James Deane, the surveyor, who first laid out the village, is directed by Gov. Nicolls to draw a line from the river, near the middle of the town, one mile directly into the woods in such a direction as to provide the greatest "convenience of range for the cattle.—Riker, Hist. of Harlem, 259–51.

The court considers the nominations made for overseers of roads and fences (see March 6) and elects "from the same Dick Sicken and Principals and no Langestraet," and the court messenger, Ehlend, is "ordered to summon them by the next Court day to take the oath of fidelity."—Rec. N. Am., V: 345. They came into court on the 27th, and took "the oath of fidelity," promising to "render justice according to the instructions given them, touching the fees they shall be called to, without distraction or regard of persons."—Ibid., V: 346. See April 16, 1667.

Joost Goderis (of Harlem) and Gerrit Hendrickse are accepted as "public carriers and labourers at the Weighthouse" by the mayor's court and take the required oath of fidelity.—Rec. N. Am., V: 347.

Pieter Jansen receives a patent by way of confirmation for a lot on the west side of William St., near Wall St., now included in the site of the Atlantic building.—See Liber Deeds, B: 90 (New York); Map of Dutch Grants; C. Pl. 87, and its description, II: 357.

Complaints having reached the ears of the mayor's court, "that through the expiration of the office of the previous Surveyors, such case and attention "are "not paid to the subject of surveying" as is desirable, but "[t] is [a]lmost altogether neglected; they, "being desirous to provide" against this state of affairs, elect as surveyors of the city "Sieur Frederic Philipansen and Pieter Wolphertsen van Couwenhouwen," who are "authorized to pay as much regard to the subject of surveying as is proper.—Rec. N. Am., V: 349.

Gov. Nicolls, writing to the Earl of Clarendon, makes note of the severity of the winter season thus: "from the beginning of November till now we have beene frozen up, which hath not happened formerly to main Memory." As one of the king's commissioners to New England, he prepares a report of his official findings which he encountered in Massachusetts: "Thus ended our affairs at Boston so that as Commission our wee have setted only the bounds of the three Colonies of Connecticut Plymouth & Rhode Island & yet have not fully visited Connecticut. Where indeed at our coming thither will not bee two or three, to work it, or at least the appearance of a refractory disposition . . . ." The report continues: "My Lord I have according to your Lordships Comand . . . used all my Endeavor to keep up the spirits both of the Merchants Planters & Souldiers in daily hopes of the supplies mentionned, I have rouse my selle into debt both here & at Boston, I have consum'd a considerable sume which I brought of my owne, I have charged my small Estate & friends to England with near two thousand pounds sterling by bills of Exchange . . . knowing that his Royal Highness will not sufer mee to perish under the burden, for had I not thus engaged my selle & friends, The souldiers must haue bee neither paid nor victuald so that the Planters must haue bee eaten out, who haue enoue worke to support their owne meane Conditions & families; Our neighbors of Boston have made good use of our Necesityes in rayning the price of their Goods . . . [S]: Dongan's financial embarrassments Feb. 27, 1692). My Lord I could urge the protection given to criminal persons already, but there are so many other contingencies of greater moment that I shall only mention two which wee cannot but expect hereafter; The one is that his Royal Highness by Patent hath all Hudsons River with all the Customes profitts &c granted by his MaV. The Duke hath given away all the tract of land to the West of Hudsons River with all his Rights thereunto, Now whether the Duke meant to give away the Customes & profitts which cannot but swime upon Hudsons River— not express, or clear to mee, However I did not exact any from Capl Carterty Here neither are Islands mentionned in the Grant, yet hee has putt in his Clayme to Staten Island, whereby wee must see o' selves absolutely besieg'd on all sides, The River will remaine but the Customes are lost. . . ."

The other contingency is a probability that the expansion of New Jersey as a colony will provoke war with the Indians, which will also involve New York. To the east of them are amongst the Indians, how farre it was probablc I would take part or revenge any mischife done in New Jersey, T'was concluded they would not doe any violence without my leave, because I have with guilts and a good Garrison, gained some Interest & power amongst them. Yet they are of late years so enrag'd by the Dutch that the Dutch always supplied them with Plenty & upon easy Terms so that both Christians & Pagans generally suffer by the death of the Trade." Nicholls argues other trade disasters unless "his Royall Highness can obtain either a General Liberty for some Termes of 7 years and better see parties Dutch, why may not (the war ended) a permission bee given onely to four or six Holland Ships to trade yearly betier with Comodities of their owne Growth & Manufacture, & from hence to reture directly home, paying onely dutys to his Royall Highness.

Such like Overture for Trade must be accepted or this Colony is ruin"d . . . at this present during the Warres with Holland wee cannot expect the good affects of the Dutch here to the English, but this I presume to affirme, that in all other occasions they would manifest their good Obedience to his Majestie in better Termes than some of the United Colonies.

"My Lord I have repled for confirmation to his Royall Highnesse the present Lawes of this Colony collected out of the Lawes of the other Colonies, onely with such Alterations as may revive the Memory of old England amongst us, for Democracy hath thrown so deep a Roote in these parts, that y"e very name of a Justice of the Peace is an Abominations, wherefore I base upon due Consideration of his Majesties Interest layd the foundations of Kingly Government in these parts so farre as is possible, which truly is grievous to some Republicans, but they cannot say that I have made any alteration amongst the English for they had no settled Lawes in Europe of thew kinds before.

"These Lawes have beene put in practice the space of one yeare with some Amendments upon Reviewe, & such is the unfortunate Condition of these parts, that some Points of the Lawes Must of Necessity admit of Alterations or Abolitions yearly, & yet the Duke Instructions I am narrowly bound up to the space of a year for his Highnesse Confirmation, otherwise the Law is voyd, By which Instruction fully executed, wee should at this present have no Law in force; I hope his Royall Highness will give a larger Latitude to the next Governour in that point, & dispatch this New body of Lawes in print without Alterations."—Glaenades Papers, in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1866), 113-19.

In a letter to Lord Arlington, Gov. Nicholls anticipates Stuyvesant's recommendations regarding tenancy in trade regulations with Holland (see Oct. 23, 1667). As at least three-quarters of the inhabitants are Dutch, and "their estates as well as relations interwoven with their correspondents and friends in Holland, unless His Majestie pleaseth to grant them some extraordinary infranchise, the sudden interruption of the factory wth Holland will absolutely destroy all the present inhabitants, who . . . will prove better substitutes than we have found in some of the other Colonies, and with a moderate permission both furnish this government better than can be reasonably expected from new comers of owne nation, who at first (as wee find by experience) are blowne up with large desigons, but not knowing the knacke of trading here to differ from most other places, they meet with discouragements and stay not to become water."—N. Y. Col. Docs. III: 114.

May

Gov. Nicholls grants a charter to New Harlem, confirming the lands unto the owners thereof, and describing the bounds as follows:

that "from the west side of the fence of the said Town, a line be due West four hundred English poles, without variation of the compass, At the end wherefo the line being drawn to run North and South, with the variation, that is to say, North, to the very end of a certain piece of meadow ground commonly called the Round Meadow, near or adjoining to Hudson's River, and South to the Sea about a half mile distant, commonly called Felixkam Island; It shall be the West bounds of their lands. And all the lands lying and being within the said line, so drawn North and South as aforesaid, eastward to the Town and Harlem River, as also to the North and East Rivers, shall belong to the Town.

The inhabitants were granted the privileges of a town, but this was to be "immediately depending on this City." They were allowed to go farther west into the woods for more range for their horses and cattle, the lands lying within the bounds being intended for "plowing, house pastures and meadow grounds only," and no person was to be allowed to build nearer than two miles from the town bounds without the consent of the inhabitants.

After making the preceding grants, certain conditions were imposed. The town was to be called Lancaster instead of New Harlem; all houses within the bounds must be of brick or stone; a higher form of government without a mayor, captain, and from the Main; and were to be subject to the "acknowledgments and duties" which are or shall be ordained by the Duke of York or the governors who are set over them.—Libar Patents, I: 571 (Albany), cited by Riker, Hist. of Harlem, 252-53.

Riker says: "It is putting it in mild terms to say that this patent was not approved by the Harlem people, . . . The change in the name of the town . . . was a most offensive feature, and was never adopted. The bench of justice or local court, and, in general, such rights as they had enjoyed in common with the other villages, were indeed comprehended under the word 'business,' but as it made all, without limitation, 'depending dependent' on this city,—this condition might impose untold burdens. In the vital matter of taxation, it left them quite at the mercy of the Duke . . . Nor did it fully cover their landed interests, as it omitted to name the meadows appertaining to their farms, but separated by the Harlem River." So, while the patent remained record and was never "recalled," the people merely abided their time for securing a better one.—Riker, Hist. of Harlem, 257-54.

Van Rensselaer, Hist. City of N. Y., II: 37; Finston, The Dutch Grants, Harlem, Patents, etc. (1889), 10. For a later charter, see Oct. 11, 1667.

The secretary of the city delivers to the mayor's court an account "of the weekly assessment collected by Claes van Elsant from 18th December 1665 to [the last of] April 1666, being 10 weeks." It is found that "many persons" are "in arrears in a large sum," but that Elsant has already sent over the collector only the fl. 209.009, leaving fl. 284.18 still due, after deducting his commission. When Elsant is asked by the court to clear himself, he declares he "paid in to the Secretary all the money he had received." The court then resolves to elect Jacques Covertz in his place, as collector of the weekly assessment for the use of the soldiers, until Elsant has "called in the remainder of his list and . . . paid his arrears."—Rec. N. Am., V: 532-33. See May 8.

Rent to the amount of 260 fl. is due Casper Steynmets for the use of his house as a "City school" for one year, and he demands payment from the mayor's court. He is "told to wait yet awhile, as there is at present no money in the chest."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 4. His house was on the site of the present No. 10 Stone St.—Castello Plan, II: 260. Similar petitions to the court appear frequently during the next four years (ibid., VII: 86, 177, 221). Payments for the schoolhouse as well as for the schoolmaster (see Feb. 10) were made reluctantly by the English court in New York.

Resolved Waldron, constable at New Haerlem, has requested and received his discharge from office by the mayor's court of New York City. That bench now orders the inhabitants of New Haerlem "to nominate by plurality of votes two persons" from that village by the next trade, who shall be the next constable for the ensuing year.—Rec. N. Am., VII: 4. From the nominations delivered to the court, on the 15th, Johannes Verveneden was elected to the vacancy and at once took the oath of fidelity.—Ibid., VII: 8. For the original Harlem patent, see May, supra.

Jacques Covertz, who was recently named by the mayor's court as "Collector of the weekly assessment for the behoof of the soldiery" (see May 1), reports to the court that he "made the collection last week," but has fallen so far behind in the receipts, that the surplus is scarcely enough to cover his commission. He, like his predecessor, has been allowed five per cent. of the collections, but he now seeks an increased allowance of seven and one-half per cent, which the court allows, binding him "to make good" any shortage "in the money to be collected."—Rec. N. Am., VII: 4-5. See Oct. 9.

June

This date marks the anniversary of the appointment of the first borough of mayors named "Harlem," which the old bench held its last session and yielded to a new magistracy the next day (q.v.).—Rec. N. Am., VII: 15-18.

The deacony of the city appear in the mayor's court against Timothius Galby, the "Vander Master" (see Nov. 29, 1666), and claims that "the city" allowed the "doctor," which they have delivered to him to be told.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 16. This seems to be the earliest reference in the New York records to a veterinarian.

Nicolaes Bayard, the secretary of the city, petitions the mayor's court "to confirm his allowance." As the revenue of the City is at present very small, he is "allowed from the commencement of 12 "The inhabitants of New Haerlem make return to the mayor’s court of nominations for overseers of their village, and the court elects six men, William Stout, Alderman, John Vos, Daniel Lametre, and Niels Mattysen; Jan Montague is named as secretary. They, together with Daniel Terneer, the under sheriff, or his deputy, and the constable of their village, are empowered "to judge and absolutely determine all questions and matters occurring between man and man in their town and brought before them, without regard to persons, up to the sum of 200 gld. in seawort, according to the laws established in this country, and all inhabitants of the town of N. Haerlem" are "ordered and charged duly to respect the foresaid persons as their Overseers." —Rec. N. Am., VI: 15.

On June 19, the under sheriff and the overseers took their oath of fidelity.—Ibid., VI: 21.

A new court was chosen annually; for the next one, see Aug. 6, 1667. For the first court at Harlem, see Aug. 16, 1666. For the original Harlem patent, see May, 1666.

13 A new mayor, Thomas Delavall, and a new board of aldermen, have come into office, presumably by the governor’s appointment on the preceding day, June 15. Out Loudon appears the services of Capt. Willett who are still retained as a member of the bench.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 18. For Delavall’s terms as mayor, see M. C. C., VIII: 149. For brief sketch of his life, see Man. Com. Coun. (1853), 380; Willett, Mem. Hist. N. Y., II: 49.

The term of the "War of Kirkmeisters" having expired, the mayor’s court appoints Paulus Leenselander vander Grift and Jeronimus Ebbingei to be "Kirkmeisters of this Towne one whole year" from this date; they are to receive from their predecessors "all the Books, accounts, & what Estate" belonged "to the Church yet under their Custody." —Rec. N. Am., VI: 18.

Hendrick Hendricksen Ope is reappointed by the city court bench "as Constable of this Towne" for another year (see June 15, 1667), after which he takes "the oath of allegiance." —Rec. N. Am., VI: 21.

A few days later, Ope was chosen to be collector of the Orange Republic of New Netherland, and to act in the same time named as controller thereof. His salary were stipulated to be "six of the hundred," four per cent. for the collector and two per cent. for the controller.—Ibid., VI: 24.

The laborers at the weigh-house are bounted by oath "not to draw out or work at any wine or beer or other strong drink without a proper permit..." first obtained from the Collector. —Rec. N. Am., VI: 37.

25 It is ordered by the magistrates of New Haerlem that no inhabitant, under penalty, shall be permitted to let any of his hogs run at large without being yoked, nor "to fodder his Cattle within the general bounds of the city," or his lands as long as the same is not "acknowledged as made by force of the Act or law," or by the mayor’s court. —Rec. N. Am., VI: 28. The city’s secretary, Nicolaas Bayard, asks the mayor’s court how much he be to "receive for the receipt and expendi- ture of the money of the soldiers," as there is "great loss in seawort and extraordinary trouble in the receipt and disbursement of the same." He is allowed five per cent. "of the receipt and disbursements." —Rec. N. Am., VI: 29. See also May 8.

9 Complaints to the mayor’s court about the violation of ordi- nances by the baker of the city who sold "both brown and white bread" of inferior quality and under weight, leads the court to choose Christoffier Hoogland and Hendrick Willemsen as inspectors, who are to make the rounds and in the presence of the sheriff inspect the bread.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 30. See Jan. 21, 1668.

18 The bakers of the city petition the mayor’s court "to forbid the transport of any goods, which are to be delivered to the Indians, that all hucksters and forestellers of bread both within and without the City... be abolished." The court enjoins the peddling of "any sort of bread or cakes along the houses," and allows selling "at retail in their houses," provided the bread is "of due quantity and quality..." and that "the city bench..." be "forbidden to transport any bread or cakes from this City to the Indian planta- tion, in order to expose for sale and sell the same there on commission to the Indians or others," yet "everyone" is "free to buy as much bread" as he requires "and to carry, transport and sell it," wherever he thinks proper.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 30-31.

In the mayor’s court, Sheriff Anthony charges that Abram Pietersen Carpyn "lodged 9 Indians on the night of 19th of July last, without having returned any of the said lodgers," Carpyn denies the Indians came "without his knowledge, after he had gone to sleep." The court condemns him to pay a fine of five guilders for each Indian harboured, and "quit the house" he occupied within eight days, since it is "sufficiently notorious" that he has resided there "only for the purpose of carrying on trade in friendly with the Indians." —Rec. N. Am., VI: 32. Because of this liquor trade with the Indians "out of the House Paulus Leenselander vander Grift’s rear building occupied by Abram Pietersen Carpyt," the court orders that "said little house shall no longer be occupied by anyone," and that, if the present occupant do not quit it within 14 days, the house shall be pulled down.—Ibid., VI: 33. See Castillo Plan, III: 323-325. See Oct. 31, 1665.

The great fire of Loodon occurs. See Addenda.

Three men, including Daniel Tourneur, president of the court, are brought before the bench at New Harlem "for fetching hay on private property," and to have the official record appear. The court orders the hay and canoe to be taken into custody by the constable until redeemed. —Harlem Recs. (MS. translation), I: 44. See Oct. 9.

A young woman, for immorality and attempting to murder her child, is condemned by the mayor’s court to be "taken to the Wip- pings post and then & there to Receive two hundred Shillers with Rods, and then to Remain in Prison the time of 24 hours and to be brought out the Townes Gate."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 35.

There is a case of slander before the New Harlem bench in which the plaintiff is Daniel Tourneur, the president of the court. Elizabeth Nightengale is accused of calling him a "Villain of Villains," and declares further that he has designedly taken the life of a man in France with his sword. The bench refers the case to the mayor’s court.—Harlem Recs. (MS. translation), II: 45-47. In the mayor’s court, on Oct. 9, the defendant asked for time to get proof of her stockist property with which she is accused; the court denied her, and she was required to "acknowledge her fault in open Court at Harlem and declare she did wrong and pay costs."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 39-40.

Daniel Tourneur and Claude Lemaistre appear before the New Harlem court, of which both are members. The former accuses the latter of mowing in the plaintiff’s meadow land and "demands the mowed grass as his own." Each takes oath that the meadow is his property. Subsequently (Jan. 25, 1667) they adjusted their differ- ences and agreed on a division of the meadow land.—Harlem Recs. (MS. translation), II: 45-60.

Daniel Tourneur, against whom action by the New Harlem court was recorded on Sept. 15, 1667, is carried to the mayor’s court his case "against the Magistrates of N. Haerlem," without much satisfaction. He is condemned to pay a fine of 25 guilders, and the defend- ants are ordered to return the hay. In case the President of the Court shall forget himself hereafter during his abovementioned Office, his colleagues are ordered "to address themselves to the honorable Mayor’s Court."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 36.

Jacques Cossart (see May 8), "Collector of the monies promised by the inhabitants for the support of the Clergy," comes before the mayor’s court and asks for an allowance "for the collection of said money." He is granted four per cent. of all he collected.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 40. On the 26th, he informed the court from whom he was "to get his commission of 4 per cent.," and the court decreed he should be paid "out of the money" he collected "for the behalf of the Clergy."—Ibid., VI: 44.

In a letter to the Earl of Clarendon, Gov. Nicolls acknowledges the arrival of ammunition and clothes for the soldiers and urges that "shipping may come byther early in the spring."—Claremond Papers in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Collections (1869), 125.

The mayor’s court decides that the weighmaster shall "hence- forth take for sugar no more than 25½ stv. at a time," and that no person shall be "allowed to take his goods weighed except on receipt from foreign places;" also that a proper order shall be given "for the regulation of the Weigh Master and trader." Such an order was made out and received the confirmation of Gov. Nicolls, on March 27, 1667. This legislation was the direct outcome of a case before one of its justices, John Laurence, was the defendant, and Jonas Barthehn, weigh- master, the plaintiff.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 47.

Stoeff Michielen, the city crier, upon his petition to the mayor's court, "is allowed henceforth to demand and collect twenty stivers "zwaert for each cry" he makes." — Rec. N. A. M., VI: 48.

In this year, John Milton's Paradise Lost, written during the years 1668-1665, was first published.

Verreeven's ferry at Harlem was erected during this year. — Riker, Hist. of Harlem (ed. 1855), 168. The location of this ferry tavern (on the modern plan) was on the north side of 123d St., 500 ft. west of Pleasant Ave. Vide infra, Jan. 3.

One of the requirements of the patent granted by Gov. Nicolls, in 1666, to the city of New Amsterdam, was the establishment of a ferry. Early in 1667, Mayer Delavall, who owned land on Van Keulen's Hook extending to Montagnes Kill (outlet of Harlem Creek into East River just below 185th St.—Landmark Map Ref. Key, III: 966), made certain proposals to the magistrates of Harlem, which involved the development of his own property as well as the establishment of a ferry to be used instead of the fording-place at Spuyten Duyvil. Delavall's project included building a grist-mill and stone house upon his lot; but before undertaking it he wished to be assured of the establishment of such lines of travel as would make the mill easy of access from the surrounding country. On Jan. 3, he presents the following petition to the authorities:

"First. That they make one half of the road from this place to Manhattan or New York, and that to Spuyto deuel be stopped up [see Feb. 22 and 23, 1669]."

"Secondly. That the same rate be taken for a suitable Ordinary [tavern] for the convenience of persons coming and going and also for the Village: and he promises the nails and the making of a Schouw (Ferry-boat) provided that the Ferry-man shall remain holden upon occasion to again repay the Honoroble La Val.

"Johannis Verreeven agrees to take the Ferry and the Ordinary for six years, giving his oath thereupon that he will not lay tiquo to the Indians and promises accommodations for travellers, such as victualls & drink, lodgings &c.

"Thirdly. That it be resolved that the Inhabitants of the Town shall make the Dam, since other Towns promise to make a dam if so be he please to build the mill near them.

"Fourthly. Requests to have leave to build a stone house behind his land, near the Mill & to fortify the same, as for a refuge for the Village in time of need."

"Fifthly. Requests to leave a draw straight fence from the fence now standing to the stone-bridge upon Van Keulen's Hook, and to use the land and meadows so enclosed."

"Sixthly. Requests that the Inhabitants of the Town shall set off the meadow land on little Barren's Island, in case they wish to hold it; as the said Island belongs to him; but being further willing to the Town, to no inconvenience, he offers them the Island provided they will free the meadows.

"Seventhly. Whereas the Bronx land has been sold to him for two thousand guilders in beavers, and he thinks that it had better fall to the Town, he therefore offers to let the town have it for that sum. To which having given consideration, to advise & make known to him."

On the following day the proposals of Delavall were considered and resolutions adopted. On the first point they agreed to stop up the Spuyten Duyvil Road, and with regard to the road to the "Manhattan," to "make a road as far as practicable." Johannes Verreeven was accepted as ferry-man and keeper of the ordinary. They agreed to build the dam, provided they might enjoy its benefits according to usage; they agreed to the erection of a house on the mill, and to giving the mill the use of the land and meadow mentioned in the fifth point. No definitive action was taken by the authorities on Barren's Island or Bronx's land.—Harlem Recs. (MS. translation), I: 52-54.

The mill-dam was built across Harlem Creek a little west of the present Third Ave., and the mill was erected near the north end of the dam, but Delavall's return to England interfered with the plans for building the stone house.—Bikker, Bibl. Haerlem, 239-65. For lease of ferry to Verreeven, see July 3. For the Harlem patent, see May, 1666. See also Fossien's The Dutch Grants, Harlem Patents and Tidal Creeks regarding Van Keulen's Hook, Montagne's Kill, etc.

The mayor's court orders the sheriff, with the constable, to "give due warning to all them that are indebted, to the Weekly assessment to pay their debts, according to the order Published the 12th of this Instant." — Rec. N. A. M., VI: 53. The original order does not appear in the records.

Karren Seeling, servant, and Daniel Tournear, master, appear before Jan La Montage, "Secretary of this Town admitted by the High and Honorable the Mayor's Court residing at New Haerlem, and" acknowledge with one another to have agreed and bargained "concerning their respective rights and duties. According to the agreement consummated, the former promises to serve his master with all diligence in all honest and lawful service" for one year; while the latter agrees to "command his said servant in no other than honest and lawful labor, and at the expiration of the term of service to pay to the aforesaid Karren Three hundred guilders in Seventy and, and the same pair of stockings."—Harlem Recs. (MS translation), I: 57-58.

Hendrick Obe, the collector of the excise, asks the mayor's court how much he shall "charge for excise on cider or apple-drink." The court decides, in view of the scarcity of wine and large consumption of cider at this time, that the collector shall thereafter "levy for each anker of cider, ten stivers for Burgers excise and three guilders for tappers excise on the same." — Rec. N. A. M., VII: 55-56.

The city court decides that Paulus Leendertzen vander Grift Feb. shall "be paid for lodging the soldiers from the Burgers excise at the same rate as the others" (see April 19, 1665, for rate).—Rec. N. A. M., VII: 57-58.

Mayor Delavall informs the city bench that it is Gov. Nicolls's pleasure that "this Town" shall "maintain for one Yeare Longer one of the Minift's of this place," and as several persons have departed the city or are designing to do so, being persons who have subscribed during the last year in aid of the maintenance of the minift, the court orders some of the inhabitants summoned to court, to learn if they will raise by voluntary subscriptions "the sums withb they promised the Late Years to pay towards the Maintainance of the Minift." This results in voluntary subscriptions by 26 persons.—Rec. N. A. M., VII: 58-59. See June 18.

Gov. Nicolls, writing again to Gov. Winthrop, says: "I may have forgotten in my former Letters to acquaint you that I am very proud of a wall in the fort which I caused to be made last summer beyond the Imagination of the Dutch, who would [not] believe it till they saw it finish, which produces very good water."—Winthrop Papers, XVI: 11. This well within the fort is shown on PL 23, Vol. 1. It is the earliest public well of which we have any record. For a later well "in the State-House-Yard," see June 19, 1671. The town was dependent upon these two wells until Feb. 28, 1677, when the common council ordered that six be made "for the publick good."

Eliau Doughty deeds to John Archer "four Score Acres of Mar. land, and Thirty Acres of Meadow lying & being betwixt Brothers River and the Wattering Place at y^e End of the Island of Manhat- tans." This deed was not recorded until Sept. 24, 1671. On Sept. 18, 1669, Doughty made a deed to Matthew Betts and George Lippett on the maintenance of the mill, and it was noted that Mr. John Archer is to have the freshest Boggy Meadow that lyeth on y^e South side of Westchester Path."—Ex. Coun. Min., I: 155-96. In 1665, the town of Harlem complained that Archer was enroaching on its land and succeeded in getting judgments against him.—Ibid., I: 197, 205-6. Archer had controversies, in 1669 and 1670, with William Betts and George Lippett in regard to his land at Fordham and Spuyten Duyvil (see July 31, 1669).—Ibid., I: 210-15. On Oct. 18, 1671, his land was ordered to be laid out by Jacobus Cortelyou, and, after the surveyor's report on Nov. 9, Betts and Lippett were warned against trespassing on Archer's property.—Ibid., I: 216-19. On Jan. 9 and 31, 1671, Mathias Nicolls sold to Mathias Nicolls, "Reserving the Royalty of the Same, with the rest of the Mannor, from the which it is nott to be divided but on the Contrary as an acknowledgement the 5th Matthias Nicolls, his heirs and assigns, are to pay . . . Every New Years day unto the 5th John Archer, his heire or assigns to wait on . . . Spuyten Duyvil . . ." A meeting is held at New Harlem and a petition prepared to the governour requesting the grant of a general ground-brief or patent in accordance with the new survey made by his Excellency's land surveyor, Mr. Hubbard. Portions of the petition are as follows: "The Inhabitants of the Town of New Haerlem, . . . represent, that they are informed that a placard has been issued, that each Inhabitant must get his ground brief renewed within fourteen days, expiring April 1st of this year; and whereas the most of your Excellency's petitioners even till now have no ground briefs, they therefore pray that your Excellency may please to grant them a general ground brief or patent, in accordance with the last survey made by your Excellency's last Mayor, Mr. Hulstaert, that his wise Council shall find good and proper, as also that therein may be included the meadows which are lying at the other side, and belonging to the land.

"Your Excellency; Whereas through ignorance of your Excellency's placards, some faults might be committed by your Excellency's last Mayor, Mr. Hulstaert, that his wise Council shall find good and proper, as also that therein may be included the meadows which are lying at the other side, and belonging to the land.

"The heirs of Anneke Bogardus receive a patent by way of confirmation of a certain parcel of land lying on the Island Manhattan, towards the North River, which in the year 1656 was the Land and Bowery of Anna Bogardus, to whom and to her husband, Roeloff Jansen, it was first granted by the the Dutch Governor.

Roderick van Twiller, at which time the said Roeloff Jansen first began to enplane the land from the sea shore to the landward, and that he and those who afterwards did then begin from the fenceline of the House by the Strand side so running northeast to the fenceline of Old Jans Land in its length 210 Rods, then going along the fenceline of the said Old Jans Land southeast it reacheth to a certain swamp and is in breadth 100 Rods; and from the said Swamp to its length it is in length 160 Rods. And from the Swamp to the Strand going west its breadth 50 Rods, in Land lying on the south side of the house to the fenceline of the land belonging to the Company and so the east side, begins at the fenceline and goes south to the Posts and Rails of the Company's land without any hindrance of the path; its in breadth 60 Rods in length on the south side along the Posts and Rails 160 rods; on the east side to the entrance of the Chalke Hooke, in breadth 50 Rods, and along the said Chalke Hooke, on the north side, to the fenceline of the land before mentioned, goes west, is in length 100 Rods; amounting in all to about 62 Acres; for which said parcel of land, the Widow and Relic of Donjon Everardus Bogardus had heretofore a Patent or Ground Brief from the late Dutch Governor, Petrus Stuyvesant, bearing date the 4th day of July, 1654. Now, for a Confirmation unto the Children and Heirs of the said Anneke Bogardus, see Liber Patent, IV: 28 (Albany).

The bakers of the city are ordered by the mayor's court to make a return in eight days of the amount of grain each has in store and how much he ordinarily consumes.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 66. A week later, the bench selected from the bakers, who came in court, four persons to make a close inspection "among all the bakers and merchants," to ascertain the amount of grain in the city and make a return thereof to the court in writing.— Ibid., VI: 67-68.

Cornelis Jansz Copper receives a patent by way of confirmation of a transport made to him by Maria Peeter: the wife of Jan Peeler, Feb. 25, 1666, for a house and lot in the Smith's Valley, having to the east the land of Lawrence Cornelissen; to the south the Strand of the East River; to the west the Maid's Path, and to the north the pasture that belongs to the lot of Oloff Stevens van Colndall; containing on the south side, 4 rods 4 ft.; on the west, 17 rods 4 ft., 3 in. 2 ft.; on the north, 7 rods 7 ft.; and on the east, 10 rods. Liber Patent, IV: 38 (Albany).

A letter from the Duke of York to Gov. Nicolls is read "in full Court" (mayor's court?);—Rec. N. Am., VI: 67. No information has been found regarding its contents.

The mayor's court resolves to enact an ordinance for "nullifying all persons, who have powers of attorney for real estate from persons, at present residing in Holland or elsewhere, but not at peace with His Majesty, to present 8 copies powers to Mayor and Aldermen."— Rec. N. Am., VI: 68. See Sept. 26.

Jan Jansen Langergaart, Thomas Hall, and Kier Walters are elected by the mayor's court overseers of roads and fences for one year.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 69. The number of overseers is this year was increased by one. See March 20, 1666.

The carters of the city petition the mayor's court to confirm them "in their actual number and no more, in form of a Guild like those of the House labourers" and that all new carters may be found and bid to cart within the city. The court grants the request for the time being and until more carters are needed in the city. Eight men, named, are then "confirmed as City carters," on condition of binding themselves "to repair to the fire on the ringing of the fire bell and to render all possible assistance in extinguishing the Rames," on forfeit of their privileges in case of dereliction.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 70. See June 8 and Nov. 29, 1670. Cf. Peterson and Edwards, N. Y. as an 18th Cent. Municipality, 65-66.

There is still preserved at Albany a document bearing this date, 1667, containing "A list of the Lands & Grants within this County not canvocated to the use of his Royall Highness during the time of the late Warre" between the English and Dutch. Among such property mentioned as "within this City," is that of Peter Hartjen, Michiel Muyen, Johannes Gillisen Verbrugge, Arent Janse Jacobs, Jacob Gillis Drinker, and Gillis Petersen van Brug. Included also are "Islands in the East River," the "two Barnes Islands herefofe belonging to Wouter van Twiller," and "Vercken's [Blackwell's] Island together with about fifty acres of land on Long Island lying over 468."—Hist. MSS., Eng., XXII: 16-20 (Albany), Sept. 26.

Gerret Hendrikens receives a patent by way of confirmation for land conveyed to him by Jan Vigne, May 17, 1663, lying east of the of the Broadway without the land port, having to the north the land of Pieter Nys, to the east of that of said Jan Vigne, to the south of that of Claes Jansens, and to the west the Broadway; containing in breadth on the west side of the way, 6 rods, 8 ft.; on the east side, 6 rods, 9 ft. and the tenth part of a rod; on the north, in length 12 rods, and on the south, 12 rods.—Liber Patent, II: 22 (Albany).

David Desmarroes and Joost van Olibnis, of New Harlem, make arrangements with the herdsman, Wouter Morisse, to herd the cattle of the village. Morisse agrees to herd the "Cattle from the middle of April till all Saints day, either fourteen days before or after, as the weather may set in, or the pasture fail, and promises to make good all the Cattle that may be lost through his negligence;—for the sum of Forty Hundred guilders in Seaward and one half pound of butter for each cow."—Harlem Rees. (MS. translation), I: 71.

William Abraham is granted a patent (Liber Patent, II: 37) by Albany by way of confirmation of a transport made by Jan Jansen de Jongh, dated May 9, 1666, to Pieter Nys, since sold and transported to Abraham, of a parcel whose location on modern maps would be at the southeast corner of Broadway and Maiden Lane.

Haage Bruynsens is granted a patent upon a transport made by Dirick Volckertsen, dated Oct. 15, 1653, to Haage Bruynsens, for a certain lot lying in Smith's Valley, between land of Lambert Heybertsen Mol and the lowestmost remaining lot of the said Dirick Volchertsen; containing in breadth towards the Strand or Highway, 24 RHINELAND ft. and, behind, 21 ft.; stretching next to the lot of Dirick Volchertsen and also that of Lambert Heybertsen "as they do both stretch in length, being distant the space of 2 ft. from each of their houses,"—Liber Patent, II: 41 (Albany).

Andries Rees receives a "patent granted to a purchase made by Andries Jochemsen in the yeare 1659 of the Burgomasters and Court of this city, for a certain house and lot in the Smith's Valley, without the Strand Gate, which he afterwards transported to Hendrick Bonnem who since hath sold the same to Andries Rees, the said lot by the measure given by the Surveyors, containes on the west side, 29 feet; on the east side, 11, on the north side, 95, and on the south side, 98 feet, all wood measure."—Liber Patent, II: 40 (Albany).

The carters come into court and complain that Stoffel van Laer is "employing other ways for carting his trade," and "cannot not to be," as it is "in direct contravention to the privilege accorded . . . to the carters on the 16th April past [p. 20]." The Defence of Van Laer is, that he hired the wagon of Kier Woltersen "by the day to ride his tan from the bush to the stores of the city and again to bring it to his house." Woltersen was the overseer of roads and fences, which may have been the reason why the court ruled that Van Laer might continue "for the present . . . with his work," whilst agreeing to promulgate "an ample ordinance on this subject."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 73-74. Such an ordinance was provided for on June 11. It limited public carting, "whether for Burghers or merchants" in the city, to those alone who were "the appointed carmen," but anyone was "free to convey his own goods as well as all goods from without or from the bush, by land," to the city. The public carters were allowed for each load within their "gates, a fine of ten stivers, and on more under a penalty of 15 st., for the first, double as much for the second, and deprivation of license for the third offence."—Ibid., VI: 76.

The members of the mayor's court bench received from Gov. Nicolls "a Commission & order Wherby the present Mayor, Aldmen, & Sheriff" are "Empowered to Continue in their respective offices [see July 5] until the 24th of July next ensuing, as more by large appearances by the 9th Commission, bearing date the 11th of June 1667."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 74. They are at this date: Capt. Thomas DeVavall, mayor; Thomas Willett, Obb Stevenson van Cordoo, John Laurence, Cornelien Steenwyck, and Johannes de Peyster, aldermen; and Allard Anthony, sheriff.

The mayor's court "established the fees of the Sheriff, Secretary, Messenger, and Attornies" of the city, "as more fully appears by the Acte made thereof."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 77.

A small transfer was prorogued for a few days. Meadow lying along Montague's Kill, west of the hills of the Rocky-hook till the end of the Creek on the North side of the said Kill, for the consideration that the Church erl behind shall extend out into his house lot (erf) four rods in length and five rods in breadth, it being well understood on the North side.

"An Montague was permitted to have in case of exchange, the Church lot's meadow lying in the bend of the Hellgate, provided he leave behind a piece of meadow lying south of the great meadow & belonging to Number 1" (described as No. 1 by the spring). A footnote says "The Rocky Point, appears to be the rocks which ran south from Mount Morris. The meadows between these rocks and the creek west & north west were those here referred to, it would seem. Those which Montague exchanged with the town for the meadows in the Bay of Hellgate were at the Great Meadow,Sherman's Creek."—Harlem Recs. (MS. translation), I: 74. See Sept. 27, 1666.

As "divers complaints" have been made to the mayor and aldermen "regarding the non payment of the promised and fixed salary of the Ministers of the city" (see Feb. 7), the mayor's court orders, "by and with the advice of Gov. Nicolls, that all the inhabitants to be in arry or be in arry to promptly pay up, and that the deacons of the city, accompanied by Jacques Coussart, the city's collector, shall exercise "all possible means to promote the collection of said arrearage."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 79. See Oct. 29.

Secretary Bayard requests payment of his salary, according to account amounting to fl. 283.64, which the city court allows and orders Hendrick Obe, the city's collector, or Willem Abrams, to pay on the city's account.—Rec. N. Am., VI: 80.

The mayor's court resolves, "at Johannes Vervecken's request," to speak to Gov. Nicolls "about the Haarlem Ferry money."—Rec. N. Am., VI: 80. The terms of a lease were determined subsequently (see July 5). For the earliest suggestion of a ferry at Harlem, see March 4, 1668.
